THE TIMES LAW REPORTS,

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 5, 1926.

Prob., Divorce, and Adm. Div. (Hill, J.) } 1926. Oct. 12.

PEPPER v. PEPPER AND BAKER.*

Divorce—Wife's petition—Husband and married woman made respondents—Decree nisi—Costs against both—Limitation to separate estate in case of married woman—Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925 (15 and 16 Geo. V., c. 49), s. 177.

This suit was the first in the records of the Division in which a woman with whom a husband was alleged to have committed adultery had been made a respondent in an action by a wife petitioning for divorce.

Mrs. Jessie Winifred Pepper, née Reekes, of Cambridge-road, North Harrow, petitioned for the dissolution of her marriage with Horace Harvey Pepper, a solicitor's clerk, on the ground of his adultery with Mrs. Gertrude Hyde Baker, the licensee of the Crown Hotel, Diss, Norfolk, who was also a respondent in the suit. The petition was undefended.

Mr. L. J. ACTON PILE, for the petitioner, said that in this suit the first successful application had been made since the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, came into operation for an order to make the woman accused of adultery with the husband a respondent against her will. The application had been made to his Lordship on June 28 under section 177 of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, re-enacting section 28 of the Act of 1857, and had been strenuously opposed by counsel on behalf of Mrs. Baker. The order had been made, but Mrs. Baker had entered no appearance and made no defence. The object of the application was to secure an order against her for the costs of the action. As regards her separate means, she had signed cheques in payment of the alimony due from Mr. Pepper to his wife.

Mrs. Pepper, in reply to counsel, said that the marriage took place at St. Gabriel's Church, Willesden, on August 14, 1906, and one child was born, a son, now aged 19. The witness described the circumstances of her husband's leaving her, and other evidence was given to the effect that adultery had taken place between Mr. Pepper and Mrs. Baker.

His LORDSHIP held that adultery had been proved.

Mr. ACTON PILE asked for a decree nisi, and for an order for costs to be paid by Mrs. Baker, and that any costs not recovered or recoverable from Mrs. Baker should be paid by the husband. He pointed out that in many cases women named in wives' petitions had intervened and orders for costs had been made against them. In this case Mrs. Baker had been brought in against her will, but was in the same position in regard to costs as an intervener. As regards Mrs. Baker's separate estate, she was an hotel licensee, she was separated from her husband, and the cheque for £1 which he (counsel) produced had been drawn and sent by her in payment of Mr. Pepper's alimony.

His LORDSHIP said that an order for costs against two parties could be satisfied by execution on either, and granted a decree nisi, with costs against both respondents, but limited the order in the case of Mrs. Baker to her separate estate.

JONES v. HARRIS.*

Agriculture—Minimum wage—Benefit or advantage reckoned as payment—Set-off—Onus of proof—Misrepresentation of age by worker—Agricultural Wages (Regulation) Act, 1924 (14 and 15 Geo. V., c. 37), s. 7 (1), (2), (3), (11).

The employer of an agricultural worker is not entitled in proceedings under the Agricultural Wages (Regulation) Act, 1924, to set off as a debt due from the worker the amount of any benefit or advantage which he is prohibited from reckoning as a payment in lieu of payment in cash.

Where an employer is charged with paying a worker in agriculture less than the minimum rate of wages applicable, the onus of proof is on the prosecution to show what is the minimum rate applicable, and, as one of the elements on which the rate depends, to prove the age of the worker. When the prosecution have established what the minimum rate is it is for the accused (under s. 7 (2) of the Agricultural Wages (Regulation) Act, 1924) to prove that he has paid not less than that rate. The rate payable is governed by the actual age of the worker, and it is no defence that he misrepresented his age.

This was a case stated by Monmouthshire justices. Two informations were preferred on September 17, 1925, by William Morgan Jones (hereinafter called the appellant) against Francis John Harris (hereinafter called the respondent) for that he on July 25, 1925, and August 1, 1925, at Bettws Farm, Raglan, in the County of Monmouth, being a person who employed Frederick Daniel Pugh, a worker in agriculture, did not pay wages to the said Pugh at a rate not less than the minimum rate as fixed under the provisions of the Agricultural Wages (Regulation) Act, 1924 (14 and 15 Geo. V., c. 37), and the Order of the Agricultural Wages Board made thereunder No. 70, dated March 10, 1925, and the Orders of the Agricultural Wages Committee for the said County of Monmouth, Nos. Mon. 1 and 2, and dated March 7, 1925, and July 4, 1925, respectively. On September 26, 1925, the respondent was convicted and fined the sum of 2s. 6d. in respect of the offence committed on August 1, 1925, and was also ordered to pay the said Pugh a sum of 3s. 7d., being arrears of wages due to the said Pugh for the week ending August 1, 1925, being the sum which appeared to be due to the said Pugh on account of wages in accordance with the provisions of the Agricultural Wages (Regulation) Act, 1924, and the Order of the Agricultural Wages Board aforesaid.

Upon the hearing of the said informations, the following facts were proved or admitted :—

(a) That the appellant was a person duly authorized by law to institute proceedings under the said Agricultural Wages (Regulation) Act, 1924, and that he accordingly laid the said informations against the respondent on September 17, 1925.

(b) That the Orders of the Agricultural Wages Board and the Agricultural Wages Committee for the Administrative County of Monmouth material to this case were :—

(i.) An Order of the Agricultural Wages Board (No. 70), dated March 10, 1925.

(ii.) An Order of the Monmouthshire Agricultural Wages Committee (No. Mon. 1), dated March 7, 1925.

(iii.) An Order of the Monmouthshire Agricultural Wages Committee (No. Mon. 2), dated July 4, 1925.

Copies of the said Orders were annexed to and formed part of the case.

(c) That the respondent on or about August 11, 1924, did enter into a contract with the said Pugh whereby the respondent was to employ the said Pugh as a worker in agriculture—namely, a general farm labourer on respondent's farm called Bettws Farm, Raglan, in the county aforesaid, at a weekly wage of 8s., together with board and lodging to be provided by the respondent, and that the said Pugh continued in the service of the respondent until August 6, 1925, under the said contract.

(d) That the value of the board and lodging provided by the respondent was 17s. per week.

(e) That at the time when the said contract of service was entered into the said Pugh informed the respondent that he was 18 years of age, whereas at the hearing it was stated that he was then 21 years of age, though no certificate of birth was produced. The said Pugh did not at any time, while in the employment of the respondent, inform him that he was 21 years of age.

It was contended on behalf of the appellant :—

(a) That as and from the date of the Order of the Monmouthshire Agricultural Wages Committee, dated July 4, 1925, above referred to, the respondent was prohibited from reckoning as payment of wages the benefit of the board and lodging provided by the respondent, and that the respondent was bound to pay the said Pugh such wages in cash without any deduction or set-off for any amount which might be owed by the said Pugh for board and lodging.

(b) That inasmuch as the said Pugh was at all material times in fact over 21 years of age, the respondent was bound to pay the said Pugh wages in cash at a rate not less than the minimum rate fixed for workers of that age by Order of the Agricultural Wages Board, dated March 10, 1925, above referred to, and that the respondent was not excused from paying wages at a rate less than the rate fixed by the said Order for workers of 21 years and over by reason of his belief in the truth of the statement made by the said Pugh.

(c) That under the provisions of section 7, subsection 3, of the Act, the Court was bound to make an order for the payment by the respondent of all such arrears of wages as might be found to be due to the said Pugh in respect of the period between March 28, 1925, and August 6, 1925.

It was contended on behalf of the respondent :—

(a) That the respondent was entitled during the whole period of the employment of the said Pugh to set-off against wages payable to the said Pugh the value of the board and lodging provided by the respondent as a debt due to the respondent.

(b) That the respondent was not bound to pay wages to the said Pugh at a rate higher than the minimum rate applicable to workers of the age of the said Pugh as stated by the said Pugh to the respondent.

(c) That the wages paid by the respondent to the said Pugh were in fact at no material time less than at the minimum rate applicable to the said Pugh.

Upon the facts proved or admitted the justices held :—

(a) That there was no obligation on the respondent to pay out to the said Pugh the full amount of his weekly wages in cash without having regard to any sums which might be due from the said Pugh to the respondent in respect of board and lodging, but that the respondent was entitled to set-off as a debt due to him the amount of any weekly rent for board and lodging due and payable under any agreement in force entered into between him and the said Pugh in arriving at the amount payable by him to the said Pugh.

(b) That inasmuch as no agreement had in fact been arrived at between the respondent and the said Pugh as to the amount which should be payable by the said Pugh as rent for board and lodging aforesaid, the respondent was not strictly entitled to treat the said sum of 17s. a week as a debt due from the said Pugh (although such sum of 17s. was in the opinion of the justices a reasonable sum for him to pay), and that a technical offence had been committed by the respondent.

(c) That a sum of 3s. 7d. was in fact due from the respondent to the said Pugh. [The case did not state how this sum was arrived at.]

The justices therefore in the circumstances convicted the respondent and imposed upon him a fine of 2s. 6d., and ordered him to pay the sum of 3s. 7d. to the said Pugh.

The Agricultural Wages (Regulation) Act, 1924, section 7 :—

Subsection (1) : "Where any minimum rate of wages has been made effective by an Order of the Agricultural Wages Board under this Act, any person who employs a worker in agriculture shall, in cases to which the minimum rate is applicable, pay wages to the worker at a rate not less than the minimum rate, and, if he fails to do so, shall be liable on summary conviction in respect of each offence to a fine not exceeding twenty pounds, and to a fine not exceeding one pound for each day on which the offence is continued after conviction.

(2) In any proceedings against a person under this section it shall lie with that person to prove that he has paid wages at not less than the minimum rate.

(3) In any proceedings against an employer under this section the Court shall, whether there is a conviction or not, order the employer to pay in addition to the fine, if any, such sum as may be found by the Court to represent the difference between the amount which ought at the minimum rate applicable to have been paid to the worker during the period of six months immediately preceding the date on which the information was laid or the complaint was served and the amount actually paid to him during that period. . . .

(11) Subject to any definition under this Act of the benefits or advantages which may be reckoned as payment of wages in lieu of cash and the value at which they are to be reckoned, and to any limitation or prohibition under this Act of the reckoning of benefits or advantages as payment of wages in lieu of cash, the Court may, in any proceedings under this Act, reckon as a payment of wages such amount as in the opinion of the Court represents the value of any benefits or advantages (not being benefits or advantages prohibited by law) received by a worker under the terms of his employment."

Section 8 gives power to the Minister of Agriculture to make regulations for requiring wages committees to define the benefits or advantages which may be reckoned as payment of wages in lieu of payment in cash, and to prohibit the reckoning of benefits or advantages.

The Order No. 70 of the Agricultural Wages Board, dated March 10, 1925, gave effect to the schedule of minimum rates fixed by the Monmouth Agricultural Wages Committee ; the Order No. Mon. 1, dated March 7, 1924, defined certain classes of employment ; the Order No. Mon. 2, dated July 4, 1925, stated that "The Agricultural Wages Committee for the area comprising the administrative County of Monmouth . . . do, by this Order, prohibit the reckoning of any benefit or advantage as payment of wages in lieu of payment in cash for the purpose of the application of any minimum rate of wages fixed by the said Committee."

The Attorney-General (Sir Douglas Hogg, K.C.) and Mr. Hubert Hull appeared for the appellant ; Mr. J. E. Singleton, K.C., and Mr. W. H. Williams for the respondent.

By an oversight the information as to July 25 was not dealt with by the Justices, but the Attorney-General did not ask for the case to be sent back for a formal decision upon it.

The Lord Chief Justice.—This is a case stated by justices, and the questions to which it gives rise have to do with the true interpretation of certain provisions of the Agricultural Wages (Regulation) Act, 1924. It is not necessary, I think, to re-read the facts of the case. In substance, there are two questions. The first is : Whether in arriving at the amount of wages payable to an agricultural worker coming within the provisions of this statute a deduction may be made on account of board and lodging provided for him by his employer, and the answer to that question depends not only upon the terms of the statute itself, but also upon the Orders made under it. The second question is a question relating to the age and the mode of proof of the age of the worker concerned in the present case on the facts of this case.

Now, so far as the first question is concerned it is, I think, clear from the way in which this case was stated, whether one looks at the contentions of the appellant or at the contentions of the respondent or at the findings of the justices, that the main contest was whether it was right to reckon as payment of wages any benefit of the board and lodging received by the respondent.

[His Lordship read the contentions and findings and proceeded] :—

Now the terms of the Act, one would think, are sufficiently clear on that point. This undoubtedly drastic statute imposes the clearest statutory duty to pay a certain sum, and if there is default in payment the matter is not to be reckoned as one limited to the individual employer and the individual labourer. It is a matter in which the public has a concern because of the purposes sought to be accomplished by the Agricultural Wages (Regulation) Act, 1924. The section goes on in subsection (11) to make provision with reference to the benefits or advantages which may be reckoned as payments. That Act having come into force the various stages subsequently fulfilled have been made plain by the production of statutory Rules and Orders, and it is enough to say that this Agricultural Wages Committee having been duly empowered to limit or prohibit the reckoning of benefits or advantages as payment of wages in lieu of payment in cash for the purposes of any minimum rate which has been fixed under the Act the Committee proceeded on July 4, 1925, to prohibit the reckoning of any benefit or advantage as payment of wages in lieu of payment in cash for the purposes of the application of any minimum rate of wages fixed by the said Committee. Now it is apparent that in the earlier stages of this case at any rate it was contended that although after that prohibition the provision of board and lodging could not be treated as payment in lieu of cash, nevertheless in proceedings of the present kind under the statute there might be an equivalent set-off. That contention is no longer adhered to. On the contrary, Mr. Singleton frankly admits that the point about the reckoning of benefits and advantages was wrong, and ought not to have been taken before the justices. The matter is indeed made plain, not only by the words of the statute itself, but also by the case of Williams and Others v. North's Navigation Collieries (1889), Limited (22 The Times L.R., 372 ; [1906] A.C., 136), where the Lord Chancellor, Lord Loreburn, at page 140, speaking of the Act of Parliament there in question, said : "A reference to section 23 shows, to my mind, that this would be a wrong interpretation even if the language of the Act admitted of it. Section 23 provides, with elaborate care, and under strict safeguards, the cases in which debts due from the workman may be deducted from the wages due to the workman when the employer is paying the wages. These provisions would be wholly unnecessary if an employer were already authorized by section 3 to deduct anything that the workman owed him and to pay in coin merely his balance." Those observations seem to me to be applicable a fortiori to the question raised on this first point under the Agricultural Wages (Regulation) Act of 1924. It is apparent, therefore, that in the present case, as from July 4, 1925, there was an improper deduction of the sum of 17s. per week, and by subsection (3) of section 7 of the statute there is an imperative duty laid down : " In any proceedings against an employer under this section the Court shall "—(not " may," but " shall ")—" whether there is a conviction or not, order the employer to pay in addition to the fine, if any, such sum as may be found by the Court to represent the difference between the amount which ought at the minimum rate applicable to have been paid to the worker during the period of six months immediately preceding the date on which the information was laid or the complaint was served and the amount actually paid to him during that period." It is now, in the course which the argument has taken, common ground that as from July 4, 1925, the sum of 17s. was improperly deducted.

With regard to the other question it has been argued, or at any rate suggested, that under the provisions of section 7, subsections (1) and (2), the whole burden of proving the age of the worker referred to falls upon the employer. That seems to me to be an erroneous interpretation of these subsections. The first subsection provides that : " Where any minimum rate of wages has been made effective by an Order of the Agricultural Wages Board under this Act, any person who employs a worker in agriculture shall, in cases to which the minimum rate is applicable, pay wages to the worker at a rate not less than the minimum rate." It is provided by another section, section 9, subsection (4), that : " Any officer so appointed shall have power in pursuance of any special or general directions of the Minister to take proceedings in respect of offences against this Act," and by section 7, subsection (2), it is provided : " In any proceedings against a person under this section it shall lie with that person to prove that he has paid wages at not less than the minimum rate." What is the meaning of those provisions ? In my opinion, it is the duty of the prosecution in proceedings of this nature to establish a prima facie case. The prosecution does not get the case upon its legs, so to say, unless and until it appears that something less was paid than that which ought to be paid, unless indeed there is some provision of the statute to which no reference has been made in the course of the argument. To say that less has been paid than the minimum rate which is applicable assumes, and must assume, that there is a certain minimum rate applicable, and when one looks to the schedule it is apparent that the rate which is applicable depends upon the age of the worker ; unless therefore there is some provision in the statute to which our attention has not been directed the prosecution here ought to have begun by showing the age of this worker, so as to put the Court into a position to do the arithmetical sum, and to ascertain whether the proper number of pounds, shillings, and pence had been paid. The prosecution having then made it appear that a less sum was paid than ought to have been paid, a thing which is based upon the proposition that a particular sum should have been paid, the burden shifts to the defendant to prove that he has paid wages at not less than the minimum rate. Now here, so far as the prosecution was concerned, it is tolerably obvious from this case that the chronological and logically fundamental question : What was the age of this young man at all material times ? was left vague. He went into the box and said that somebody had told him he was born somewhere at such-and-such a date ; he also admitted that he had told his employer when he entered his employment that he was 18 years of age ; he now said he was 22 years of age, and he further admitted that he had never informed his employer at any time during the employment that he was as much as 21 years of age. In those circumstances, the justices appear—I say " appear " because the matter is not by any means certain—to have come to the conclusion that they were entitled to accept the evidence of the employer that the youth had said he was 18 years of age, and that age not being contradicted by any satisfactory evidence of any other age, they were at liberty to treat the youth as being of that age. It is obvious that where the amount of a minimum rate of wages depends on the age of the worker, what is in question is his true age, not statements which he may have made about it, because it is not to be forgotten that in proceedings of this kind it is an official acting on behalf of the community, and in the interests of the community, who is raising the question. The test is : What was the true age, and what was the minimum rate applicable to the true age ?

When one passes to the further question, the present case having taken the course which we now know, ought the prosecution to have the opportunity of amending its case and offering at a later stage evidence as, for example, a certificate of birth, which should have been offered at the outset ? I think not. I do not think that we ought to give the prosecution a second opportunity of proving that matter, and, therefore, although I am clearly of the view that what is of real importance is the true age, I think that, for the purpose of the present case, we must take it that the justices were not satisfied, and were entitled not to be satisfied, that this young man's age was different from the age which he had represented to his employer.

In these circumstances, I think that the case must go back to the justices with the direction that they took a wrong view about the deduction of the estimated value of the board and lodging, and that that sum be calculated for the appropriate period after July 4, 1925. To that extent, I think that this appeal succeeds.

Mr. Justice Avory.—I concur in the judgment which has just been delivered, and I only wish to add that notwithstanding what Lord Bowen once described as the tutelary shelter which the Legislature has thrown around the workman in this case, subsection (2) of section 7 ought not to be construed in the way in which it was suggested it might be construed—namely, that whenever a summons under the Act is taken out against an employer, the whole burden is at once cast upon him of proving that he has not committed any offence under the statute. That would be so contrary to the principles on which the penal and criminal laws are administered in this country that one ought to seek by any means to avoid such a construction of this subsection. I agree that what it means is, that the prosecution, as in every other case, must at all events present a prima facie case against the accused person, and in order to present a prima facie case here, it was essential that they should give some evidence of the age of this worker. In the circumstances, as the matter stood, the justices were entitled, I think, to assume that this worker was 18 years of age only, and to deal with the case on that footing. In dealing with it on that footing, it does not appear that there was any evidence of any arrears due to him for the period prior to July 4. Upon the admission which has been made on that, the real error into which the magistrates fell was in holding, as they did, that if there was an agreement to set-off the amount of any weekly rent for board and lodging the employer could deduct that. The magistrates calculated the sum of 3s. 7d. on the footing apparently that that might be set-off if there were any agreement, and apparently, according to the admission made at the Bar in arriving at that sum of 3s. 7d., they must have taken into account in some way that 17s. which they describe as a reasonable sum for the board and lodging. I agree that the case must go back for them to determine what amount of arrears were due since July 4, up to the date when these proceedings were taken.

MR. JUSTICE SALTER.—I am of the same opinion. The important question in this case is the construction of subsection (2) of section 7. I think that subsection (2) applies both to subsection (1) and to subsection (3). With regard to its effect upon subsection (1) I have nothing to add to what has been said by my Lord and Mr. Justice Avory, with which I agree. With regard to its effect upon subsection (3), I think that the prosecution have to prove the total minimum amount payable by the accused to the worker during the period of six months as defined in the subsection. For that purpose, they have to prove the relation of employer and employed, that there was a worker in agriculture, and they have to prove the age of the person alleged to have been underpaid in order to establish the amount due. When the total amount payable has been proved by the prosecution the onus is upon the accused to prove that he has paid within the period not less than the sum named, and in so far as he fails to prove that, the Court is to make an order for the payment of the difference.

GROSS, SHERWOOD, AND HEALD, LIMITED v. ESSEX COUNTY COUNCIL.*

Arbitration—Lands—Compulsory acquisition—Illness of arbitrator—Replacement—Authority of Reference Committee—Acquisition of Land (Assessment of Compensation) Act, 1919 (9 and 10 Geo. V., c. 57), s. 1.

Where an arbitrator, appointed by the Reference Committee under s. 1 of the Acquisition of Land (Assessment of Compensation) Act, 1919, becomes incapable of continuing a particular arbitration, the authority of the Reference Committee includes the power to replace him by someone else.

This was a motion by the plaintiffs, Gross, Sherwood, and Heald, Limited, to restrain the defendants, the Essex County Council, from proceeding with an arbitration in the following circumstances :—

The plaintiffs were the owners of certain lands situated on the banks of the river Witham, which were acquired compulsorily for the purpose of constructing a bridge to carry one of the new arterial roads. An arbitrator was appointed to determine the compensation which was payable. While the matter was in the course of hearing the arbitrator fell ill. The plaintiffs alleged that he was removed from his office by a Government department, and another arbitrator appointed. They sought to restrain the defendants from proceeding with any arbitration otherwise than before Sir Anker Simmons, the official arbitrator appointed by the Reference Committee.

By section 1 (1) of the Acquisition of Land (Assessment of Compensation) Act, 1919, "Where by or under any statute . . . land is authorized to be acquired compulsorily by any . . . public authority, any question of disputed compensation . . . shall be referred to and determined by the arbitration of such one of a panel of official arbitrators to be appointed under this section as may be selected in accordance with rules made by the Reference Committee under this section."

By rule 6 of the Acquisition of Land (Assessment of Compensation) Rules, 1919, "The Reference Committee may, in the case of the death or incapacity of the arbitrator, or if it is shown to the Committee that it is expedient so to do, in any other case, at any time before the arbitrator has made his award, revoke the reference of the question to the selected arbitrator and select another arbitrator for the purpose of determining the question."

Sir Lynden Macassey, K.C., and Mr. Swords appeared for the plaintiffs ; the Solicitor-General (Sir Thomas Inskip, K.C.) and Mr. Giveen for the defendants.

SIR L. MACASSEY said that the case raised a very important question—namely, whether a Government department could for reasons which they thought fit intervene in an arbitration and take the matter out of the arbitrator's hands and give it to another. Before 1919 those matters were dealt with under the Lands Clauses (Consolidation) Act, 1845. In 1919 a new and different procedure was established in the case of lands acquired for public purposes. Under the new Act, the Acquisition of Land (Assessment of Compensation) Act, 1919, rules were made by the Reference Committee established thereunder, consisting of the Lord Chief Justice, the Master of the Rolls, and the President of the Surveyors' Institution.

The arbitrator had resigned on account of ill-health from the panel, but subject to the completion of any existing arbitration. There was no power to appoint another arbitrator where one had already been duly appointed under the rules.

His LORDSHIP.—Suppose he became non compos mentis ?

SIR L. MACASSEY.—That is not this case. There was no power to make the rule under which the authority purported to act.

His LORDSHIP.—The resignation apparently empowered them by the rule to appoint another arbitrator.

SIR L. MACASSEY submitted that that was not so.

The Solicitor-General was not called on to argue.

MR. JUSTICE EVE, in giving judgment, said that the object of this action—it being agreed to treat the motion as the trial of the action—was to obtain a declaration that the notice served by the secretary of the Reference Committee in August was ultra vires, and to ask for consequential relief. In order to see whether that was so one must look at the statutory powers and also see how those powers had been exercised. (His Lordship referred to them and continued.) No point was raised about the appointment of the first arbitrator. In the course of the hearing he became seriously ill, and on June 11 wrote to the secretary that with great regret he must resign his appointment as official arbitrator.

* Reported by A. W. CHASTER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

In the interval before the resignation became effective his health improved, and it appeared that he had been attending to the business of his own firm. He therefore was treating his position as a member of the panel as determined under the Act. On August 1 his position as arbitrator was determined. In those circumstances the question was whether the rule was ultra vires. One must realize that a person appointed might die or become hopelessly incapacitated, and it must be assumed that the Legislature intended not that the power of selection should be exhausted by one exercise of it, but that it should be a recurring power.

On the facts he was quite satisfied that the man first appointed had become incapable of continuing the arbitration under the panel. The authority of the committee included the power to replace him by someone else. That was what they purported to do. The action would be dismissed, with costs.

The SOLICITOR-GENERAL said that Sir Lynden Macassey had described the reference committee as a public authority. That was not so. It consisted of the Lord Chief Justice, the Master of the Rolls, and the President of the Surveyors' Institution.

STEVENSON v. FLORANT.*

Canada—Quebec—Custody of a child—Rights of tuteur and parent.

The appointment of a tuteur to a child under the provisions of the Civil Code of Quebec does not deprive the mother of her natural rights in regard to the custody and education of the child.

This was an appeal, by special leave, from an order of the Supreme Court of Canada affirming a decision of the Court of King's Bench for Quebec (Appeal Side) and a decree of Mr. Justice Coderre, sitting in the Superior Court of Montreal, who, under section 1114 of the Quebec Code of Civil Procedure, ordered the appellant to surrender to the respondent (the mother) the care and custody of Gertrude Stevenson, a girl between nine and ten years of age.

Mr. A. S. Bruneau (of the Canadian Bar) appeared for the appellant; Mr. P. Lacoste (of the Canadian Bar) for the respondent.

SIR THOMAS WARRINGTON, delivering their Lordships' judgment, said:—

This is an appeal, brought by special leave of his Majesty in Council, from an order of the Supreme Court of Canada, affirming an order of the Court of King's Bench, Appeal Side, which itself affirmed an order of the Superior Court of Montreal.

The last-mentioned order was made upon an application under section 1114 of the Quebec Code of Civil Procedure, and ordered the appellant to surrender to the care and custody of the respondent a child named Gertrude Stevenson, at that time (the 22nd May, 1924) of the age of nine years and six months or thereabouts.

The respondent is the mother of the child. The appellant is her paternal grandfather and was duly appointed her tuteur under the provisions of the Civil Code of Quebec.

The questions raised by the appeal are:—

1. Whether the tuteur can successfully resist the mother's demand for the custody of her child by asserting his position as tuteur.

2. Whether proceedings under section 1114 of the Code of Civil Procedure were proper for the purpose of determining the question.

3. Whether on the merits and in the interest of the child the order for her delivery into the care and custody of the mother ought to have been made.

These questions have all been answered by the Canadian Courts in the respondent's favour.

The child is the daughter of Archibald Stevenson and the respondent. Her parents were married on April 30, 1912.

The respondent is a Roman Catholic. Archibald Stevenson was brought up as a Protestant, but shortly before his marriage was baptized as a Roman Catholic. The marriage took place in a Roman Catholic church.

Archibald Stevenson died on February 26, 1914, the child was born at the house of her maternal grandmother on September 19, 1914, and was baptized as a Roman Catholic on the following day.

The respondent was left entirely without means to support herself and her child, and in the month of November, 1914, when the child was about two months old, she and her mother went to live with the appellant and his wife at their farm at St. Sophie, about 30 miles from Montreal.

After a time, however, the respondent desired to return to Montreal and endeavour to make her living, and it was ultimately arranged that steps should be taken to obtain the appointment of the appellant as tuteur, the respondent surrendering her right to be appointed tutrice.

The family council was accordingly summoned and advised the appointment of the appellant, and on December 28, 1914, the parties all appeared before a Deputy Prothonotary of the Superior Court of Quebec, who ratified and confirmed the advice of the council and ordered that the appellant should be and remain tuteur to the child, the mother (the respondent) having renounced the charge of tutrice.

From that time the appellant and his wife (now dead) have had the sole custody of and have maintained and educated the child, but the respondent has frequently visited her and has taken her presents of clothes, toys, and so forth. The child has been educated as a Protestant.

The respondent had a hard struggle to make a living, but towards the end of 1923 she was in the employment of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, receiving a salary of $100 a month. She then, considering herself in a position adequately to support her child, requested the appellant to place her in her charge, informing him that for the purpose of education she proposed to place her as a boarder at a Pensionnat in Montreal kept by nuns and to make such arrangements for holidays as would enable her to see as much as possible of her grandparents. The appellant, however, refused to give her up and, after an ineffectual attempt to obtain possession of her by force, the present application was made under section 1114 of the Code of Civil Procedure, being in substance of the same nature as an application in this country for a writ of habeas corpus.

The result in Canada of these proceedings has been stated above.

The Courts in Canada have all come to the conclusion that it is in the best interests of the child that the care and custody of her person and the direction of her education should be entrusted to her mother, the respondent. Their Lordships agree with this view. The tuteur, her grandfather, is now over 80 years of age. Since the commencement of the present proceedings her grandmother has died, and the only female influence of which there is any evidence is that of a great-aunt, who must be of considerable age, and a school teacher of the Jewish faith. On the materials before the Courts in Canada there was no suggestion of any immorality or other defect in character on the part of the respondent which would disqualify her from having the care of her daughter. Under these circumstances it seems to their Lordships that the Courts in Canada were right in holding that it is in the interests of the child that she should now have the advantage of the natural care of and association with her mother, and learn to treat her home as her own and to look up to her as the person having authority to direct her education and conduct. As to the question of religion, the child is now under 12 years old; at the time of the institution of the proceedings she was more than two years younger. It is not likely that she has formed such definite views on religious matters that a possible change in this respect would be a serious shock to her, and their Lordships, therefore, do not think that there is anything on this head which would counterbalance the advantages of a change of custody and control already referred to.

Under these circumstances the appellant is driven to attack the order appealed from on legal and technical grounds only.

The first and principal ground of attack is founded on the contention that, according to the true construction and effect of the Code Civil, the tuteur, so long as he occupies that position, is the only person entitled to have the care of the child, and that accordingly before the mother can exercise her parental authority she must obtain the removal of the tuteur by an order of the Court after consideration of the advice of the conseil de famille.

On this question their Lordships have the advantage of a carefully considered and reasoned judgment of Mr. Justice Rinfret, concurred in by Chief Justice Anglin and Justices Duff, Mignault, and Newcombe. Of these five judges two—Mr. Justice Rinfret himself and Mr. Justice Mignault—have special experience in the law of Quebec, and Mr. Justice Mignault is the author of a well-known commentary on the Code Civil. The judgment is illustrated by copious references to authorities.

Their Lordships have read this judgment several times with the assistance of counsel on both sides, and in particular with the help of the criticisms of counsel for the appellant. This part of the judgment concludes with the following passage:—

"Il faut donc décider que la qualité de tuteur de l'appelant ne lui confère pas sur la personne de Gertrude Stevenson des droits qu'il puisse opposer à l'autorité paternelle de l'intimée, qui est la mère. C'est donc à la mère et non au tuteur, qu'appartient le droit de garde et d'éducation de Gertrude Stevenson."

This decision their Lordships accept as correct, and they must, therefore, deal with the remaining objections of the appellant on the footing that according to the true construction and effect of the Code Civil, and in view of the fact that to give effect to the mother's right to the exercise of her authority is in the interests of the infant, the order appealed from is correct unless the technical objection to the form of the proceedings now to be mentioned is to be sustained.

The objection is that at the date of the issue of the writ the infant was in the custody of the appellant "under an order in a civil matter granted by a Court or judge having jurisdiction," viz., the order appointing him tuteur, and that a return to the writ stating that fact is a sufficient return.

The answer to this objection as it seems to their Lordships is that, holding as they do that the authority of the mother and her right to the custody of her child ought to prevail over the authority conferred on the tuteur by the order in question, and, further, that a transfer of custody from the tuteur to the mother is in the interests of the infant, they would not be disposed to treat these proceedings, in which the whole question has been considered on the merits by three Canadian Courts, as ineffective by reason of a defect in procedure, and to require the respondent to institute proceedings in another form which (according to their Lordships' view) would end in the same result.

If there be a valid technical objection to the form of proceedings, and if they ought to have been instituted by an ordinary writ of summons, the Court would properly in the interests of both parties and acting under Article 3 of the Code of Civil Procedure set aside the objection and make the order which would have been made if the form had been strictly correct.

On the whole, their Lordships are of opinion that the order appealed from is correct and the appeal ought to be dismissed, with costs, and they will humbly advise his Majesty accordingly.

There is, however, a further matter to be mentioned. A petition was presented to this Board asking leave to adduce further evidence, the object of such evidence being to attack the moral conduct of the respondent in the period immediately succeeding the death of her husband, now 12 years ago. Their Lordships are of opinion that this petition cannot be entertained and should be dismissed, with costs, but without prejudice to any fresh application which may be made to the Courts in Canada founded on further evidence, and they will on this matter also humbly advise his Majesty accordingly.

IDEAL FILMS, LIMITED v. RICHARDS AND OTHERS.*

Practice — Striking out claim — Representative action — Unregistered association — Trustees joined as defendants—Claim against trustees —Order XXV., r. 4.

The plaintiffs brought an action of contract against certain members of an unregistered association, who were sued as representing the general body of members, and against the trustees of the property of the association. The plaintiffs by their statement of claim asked (inter alia) for an order directing the trustees to pay the sum claimed and the costs of the action out of the property of the association. On an application to strike out the names of the trustees as defendants on the ground that so far as they were concerned the statement of claim was frivolous and vexatious,

Held, that the plaintiffs were entitled in a representative action to insert this particular form of claim against the trustees, and the application must be refused.

This was an appeal by the plaintiffs from an order of Mr. Justice Horridge, made in Chambers on July 29, striking out from the statement of claim under Order XXV., r. 4, the names of certain defendants sued as trustees.

When the appeal came on for hearing on October 13 the matter was adjourned to give the plaintiffs the opportunity of amending their statement of claim under Order XXVIII., r. 2.

The statement of claim as amended was as follows. (The words in italics constitute the amended portion) :—

(1) The Llanbradach Workmen's Hall and Institute is an unregistered association of miners and other workmen employed at Llanbradach, South Wales. The first 11 defendants are and were at all material times members of the said association, and also are and were members of a committee appointed by the general body of members to conduct the affairs of the association on the members' behalf, and are sued as representing the general body of the members. The remaining defendants are and were at all material times the trustees of the said association, and the funds of the association and certain leasehold premises situate at Llanbradach the property of the association are and were vested in them as such trustees. The said funds and premises are and were at all material times the common property of the members of the association and vested in the trustees upon trust for the members.

(2) The said association has for some years carried on upon the said premises a cinematograph theatre for the benefit of the members, and has hired films for the purpose of exhibition at the said theatre.

(3) By various contracts in writing made between the plaintiffs and the said committee acting for and on behalf of the members of the said association by one W. T. Jones, the secretary of the said association, the plaintiffs agreed to supply the films therein mentioned for exhibition at the said theatre upon the terms and at the prices specified in the said contracts. The plaintiffs duly supplied the said films together with posters ordered by the said committee acting as aforesaid, and the sum of £234 7s. 8d. is due and owing to the plaintiffs in respect of the said films and posters and the carriage thereof.

The plaintiffs claim :—(1) A declaration that the sum of £234 7s. 8d. is due and owing to the plaintiffs from the members of the association. (2) An order directing the trustees to pay the said sum, together with the costs of this action, to the plaintiffs out of the property and assets of the association in the hands of the trustees. (3) An order charging the property and assets with payment of the said sum and costs to the plaintiffs.

Mr. Justice Horridge made an order striking the names of the trustees out of the writ of summons and statement of claim.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Mr. W. E. P. Done appeared for the appellants ; and Mr. A. W. Cockburn for the respondents.

Lord Justice Bankes, in giving judgment, said that the statement of claim, as originally framed, was open to objection, and that the Judge below was justified in the course which he took. Upon the statement of claim as now amended, however, it seemed to him that it raised a question of very general importance. As to the form of the statement of claim it seemed to him to be impossible to say that it should be struck out as being frivolous and vexatious in so far as it referred to the persons named as trustees of an unregistered association.

His Lordship then proceeded to contrast the two statements of claim, and said that, in view of the decision of the Court of Appeal in Walker v. Sur (30 The Times L.R., 171 ; [1914] 2 K.B., 930), the present claim in its revised form had been correctly drawn for the purposes of a claim against representative members of an unincorporated society. The references which had been made to trade union cases were no real help to a correct appreciation of the particular form in which this claim had been put forward. In the case of trade unions the rights and obligations were all statutory, and the question in those cases had always been whether the action was maintainable having regard to the provisions of the particular statute. The present case was quite free from any such statutory provisions, and the only question was whether the plaintiffs had a right to this particular form of claim against trustees, and whether any inconvenience was caused by their having it.

On behalf of the respondents, that right had been contested. It was said by them that the proper course to adopt was to obtain a declaratory judgment and then to apply for the specific remedy. He (the Lord Justice) could see no reason why the plaintiffs were not entitled in a proper case to insert this particular form of claim in a representative form of action. He thought that authority for a claim of that kind was to be found in the speech of Lord Lindley in Taff Vale Railway Company v. Amalgamated Society of Railway Servants (17 The Times L.R., 698 ; [1901] A.C., at p. 443) when contrasting trade unions and unincorporated societies. What Lord Lindley said there was :—

"I have myself no doubt whatever that if the trade union could not be sued in this case in its registered name, some of its members (namely, its executive committee) could be sued on behalf of themselves and the other members of the society, and an injunction and judgment for damages could be obtained in a proper case in an action so framed. Further, it is in my opinion equally plain that if the trustees in whom the property of the society is legally vested were added as parties, an order could be made in the same action for the payment by them out of the funds of the society of all damages and costs for which the plaintiff might obtain judgment against the trade union."

That was a direct authority of a Judge of great experience in this class of case that these plaintiffs were entitled to do what they had done in this case. Confining himself to the facts of this particular case, he thought that it was impossible to say that the statement of claim, as now amended, should be struck out. It seemed to him to be a convenient way of enforcing an alleged liability against an unregistered association of individuals who had incurred liabilities in respect of which there was difficulty in recovering judgment. The appeal must therefore be allowed.

Lord Justice Scrutton, after stating the facts, said that he did not wish to lay down any general principle, but it appeared to him that it would in some cases be convenient to join persons, who were alleged to be trustees, as parties to the original action, so that they might be present at the trial, when the question would arise whether a declaration of liability should be made against them. In this particular case he could see no difficulty in the trustees remaining as defendants to the action.

Court of Appeal.
1926. Oct. 25.

IN RE DEBTORS (NO. 771 OF 1926).*

Bankruptcy—Bankruptcy notice—Act of bankruptcy—Validity of notice disputed—Fresh bankruptcy notice issued—Whether debtor bound to comply with fresh notice—Bankruptcy Act, 1914 (4 and 5 Geo. V., c. 59), ss. 1 (g), 2, 37.

Creditors having obtained judgment issued a bankruptcy notice for £945 and served it on the debtors. The debtors paid a sum of £100, including £5 for costs, nine days later, but in the belief that the notice would be disputed the creditors issued and served a fresh bankruptcy notice about two months later for £857, and, that notice not having been complied with within seven days, a petition based on the fresh bankruptcy notice was presented and served. The debtors gave notice of an application to set aside service of the petition, but the Registrar refused to do so, and made a receiving order on the fresh bankruptcy notice. On appeal, Held, that the debtors could not refuse to comply with the fresh bankruptcy notice on the ground that as the previous notice had resulted in an act of bankruptcy this had put it out of the power of the debtors to make any payment in compliance with the fresh notice or otherwise deal with their property. If, however, they did make a payment in compliance with the fresh notice it might be that if a trustee were appointed under the previous bankruptcy notice the payment might be set aside, and the money made available for the general body of creditors.

Ponsford, Baker and Co. v. Union of London and Smiths Bank (22 The Times L.R., 812 ; [1906] 2 Ch., 444) explained and distinguished.

These were two appeals from decisions of Mr. Registrar Warrington, in Bankruptcy. Three bankruptcy notices were issued upon a judgment debt (afterwards reduced) of £1,452. The first was withdrawn and the second was disputed, so a third was issued. The debtors then contended, inter alia, that they were not bound to comply and could not comply with the third notice as an act of bankruptcy had supervened upon the second notice and they were thereby debarred from making any payment to the creditors or dealing with any assets in their business. The facts are more fully stated in the judgment of the Master of the Rolls. The Registrar refused to set aside the service of the petition and made a receiving order, and the debtors appealed.

Mr. Edward Clayton, K.C., and Mr. Oscar Kean appeared for the appellants ; Mr. R. Fortune for the respondents.

By the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, section 1 (1), "A debtor commits an act of bankruptcy . . . (g) if a creditor has obtained a final judgment or final order against him for any amount, and, execution thereon not having been stayed, has served on him in England, or, by leave of the Court, elsewhere, a bankruptcy notice under this Act, and he does not, within seven days after service of the notice, in case the service is effected in England . . . either comply with the requirements of the notice or satisfy the Court that he has a counterclaim set-off or cross demand, which equals or exceeds the amount of the judgment debt or sum ordered to be paid, and which he could not set up in the action in which the judgment was obtained, or the proceedings in which the order was obtained. . . ."

By section 2 : "A bankruptcy notice under this Act shall be in the prescribed form, and shall require the debtor to pay the judgment debt or sum ordered to be paid in accordance with the terms of the judgment or order, or to secure or compound for it to the satisfaction of the creditor or the Court, and shall state the consequences of non-compliance with the notice, and shall be served in the prescribed manner. . . ."

The Court dismissed the appeals.

The Master of the Rolls, in giving judgment, said that these were two appeals from the Registrar, one against his refusal to set aside service of a petition, and another from a receiving order in bankruptcy made by him. It appeared that the debtors were partners in a business known as the King's Galleries, Chelsea, until January 27, 1926. They had been entrusted with certain pictures to be sold by the petitioning creditors, Captain and Mrs. Hibbard. The pictures were not sold or returned, and an action in detinue was brought against the debtors claiming the pictures or their value, which was put at £1,452. Judgment was given for the return of all the pictures, and fourteen pictures were in fact returned, but five pictures valued at £945 were not returned. It was plain that at all material times part of the judgment remained unsatisfied.

It was said that on January 27, 1926, the partnership was dissolved and ceased to exist and that the debtors' business and premises were assigned to a company. But on the facts as found by the learned Registrar it was impossible to accept the evidence that the firm had ceased to exist and that the company had taken its place. The firm was still carrying on, but its business was in course of being wound up.

On February 17, 1926, the first bankruptcy notice was served. On February 27 notice was given to dispute this notice and it was withdrawn on March 2. On the latter date a second bankruptcy notice was issued and served by a solicitors' clerk on one of the debtors at the business premises of the firm. It was not complied with, so the act of bankruptcy was complete on March 10. On March 11 the debtors paid a sum of £100, being £95 on account of the debt and £5 on account of costs. On May 14 a third bankruptcy notice, No. 1329, was issued for the £857 3s. 4d. and costs then remaining due on the judgment. On May 31 it was served on the lady debtor at 55, King's-road. It was not complied with, and the act of bankruptcy was complete on June 8. For the purpose of there being an available act of bankruptcy section 4 (1) (c) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, must be complied with. The act of bankruptcy must have taken place within three months before the presentation of the petition. The period of three months ran out on June 10, and it became impossible to found the petition on the second bankruptcy notice. It was argued that there was no service of the third bankruptcy notice sufficient to comply with the terms of the Act and the rules. For the reasons he had given, he (his Lordship) thought that the service was a good service. The first appeal to set aside service of the petition must therefore fail.

* Reported by H. Langford Lewis, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

On July 28 a receiving order was made on the petition, the Registrar having on July 27 refused to set aside service of the petition. On the second appeal, however, a different point was taken. He (his Lordship) had pointed out that an act of bankruptcy had been committed by failure to comply with the second bankruptcy notice. But it was argued for the debtors that when the third bankruptcy notice was issued during the currency of the second notice, there was an available act of bankruptcy dating from March 10, in which the debtors were put in an uncertain position as to whether they would be made bankrupt under it. It appeared to be by no means an uncommon practice to issue more than one bankruptcy notice, leading to more than one act of bankruptcy. But it was said, however, that there was a principle which gave a right to the debtors to refuse to comply with a second bankruptcy notice while a previous one was pending. In Ponsford, Baker and Co. v. Union of London and Smiths Bank (22 The Times L.R., 812 ; [1906] 2 Ch., 444) Lord Justice Fletcher Moulton, delivering the judgment of the Court, said :—

"For the purpose of deciding this point it is necessary to examine carefully the exact legal position of a man who has committed an act of bankruptcy under the statutes at present in force. Until commission of the act of bankruptcy he was, of course, the beneficial owner of whatever assets he possessed, but by the act of bankruptcy his title to be regarded as such beneficial owner is no longer absolute, but is contingent on no bankruptcy petition being presented within three months of the date of the act of bankruptcy which leads to a receiving order being made. If such receiving order be made the whole of the assets vest in his trustee as from the date of the act of bankruptcy. He is, therefore, in the position that should such a contingency occur he is from the date of the act of bankruptcy something less than a mere trustee of his assets for the creditors in his bankruptcy. Until this state of suspense has been removed either by a receiving order or by lapse of time, he has no right to deal with those assets that were in his hands, and can give no title in them to any transferee with notice."

It was argued that applying that doctrine, a debtor against whom there was an available act of bankruptcy could not and ought not to comply with a fresh bankruptcy notice, for if compliance were made there would be an offence committed by him in paying money, as he had no right to deal with any assets in his hands. To deduce such an argument was to place much too wide an interpretation on the judgment referred to. His Lordship then read section 2 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, and proceeded : Therefore the bankruptcy notice was a notice to the debtor that the money due must either be paid, secured, or compounded for to the satisfaction of the creditor or the Court. It might be that the debtor if he paid did not give an indefeasible title to the money paid, for his trustee might demand the money for the creditors as a whole. There was no statement by Lord Justice Fletcher Moulton to suggest that the debtor had no right to comply with a second bankruptcy notice, and a debtor could not use a previous act of bankruptcy to refuse to comply with it. His Lordship then referred to In re G. E. B. (a Debtor) ([1903] 2 K.B., 340). In that case a debtor claimed that he ought not to be compelled to comply with a bankruptcy notice, because if he did he would have a right of set-off against the very debt which was the foundation of the bankruptcy notice, but which he could not set up in the action against him. The Court felt the difficulty and the hardship that might be involved if the debtor were compelled to pay, but Lord Justice Vaughan Williams said that the debtor must have an effective and not a mere inchoate right of set-off. Regard must be had to the terms of the Act, and not to some other right which might supervene. When, therefore, the third bankruptcy notice was served there was no right on the part of the debtors to refer to the previous notice served upon them and to refuse to comply with the third one. The decision of the Registrar was right, and the appeal must be dismissed.

Lord Justice Sargant, after dealing with the facts and the first point, said that the second point argued raised a very much more important question, and a decision in the appellants' favour would have far-reaching effects. If the contention was correct it was one which must apply to any previous bankruptcy notice or act of bankruptcy. It would involve the startling result that the payment by the debtor of his creditor's debt after a bankruptcy notice would be illegal. Upon the proper interpretation of the judgment in Ponsford, Baker and Co. v. Union of London and Smiths Bank (22 The Times L.R., 812 ; [1906] 2 Ch., 444) the question there was not whether it was illegal for the debtors to pay the money to the bank, but whether if they did so the bank would obtain an indefeasible title to the money. Lord Justice Fletcher Moulton pointed out that the debtors had no absolute right to the money, but only a title liable to be defeated by subsequent adjudication in bankruptcy. Here, if the debtors had made a payment to the petitioning creditors under the third bankruptcy notice, all that would have happened would have been that the creditors might have had to repay the money to the trustee if and when appointed under the second bankruptcy notice. Objections had been taken to the second bankruptcy notice which had not been conclusively satisfied, and therefore a third notice was issued.

Lord Justice Lawrence agreed.

Leave to appeal to the House of Lords was asked for and was refused.

CLEMENT v. D. DAVIS AND SONS, LIMITED.*

Master and Servant—Compensation for injury by accident—Compensation paid during incapacity—Death resulting from injury—Sum payable to dependants—Right to deduct weekly payments—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906 (6 and 7 Edw. VII., c. 58), Schedule I. (1) (a)—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1923 (13 and 14 Geo. V., c. 42), ss. 24 (2), 30.

Section 24 (2) of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1923, which abolishes the right of the employer to deduct weekly payments made to an injured workman during his lifetime from compensation payable to his dependants upon his death so as to reduce the sum payable to the children of the workman under s. 2 of the Act, or to reduce the amount payable under the principal Act below £200, does not apply to a case where the accident happened before January 1, 1924, when the Act of 1923 came into force.

This was an appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal affirming an award of the Deputy County Court Judge of Glamorgan under the Workmen's Compensation Acts.

An accident happened to a workman before January 1, 1924, entitling him to compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, and his employers paid compensation to him during incapacity. The workman died, as a result of the accident, after January 1, 1924. The question raised by the appeal was whether the employers were prevented by the operation of section 24, subsection 2, of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1923, from deducting from the amount claimed by the dependants of the deceased workman the sum paid by the employers to the workman by way of weekly compensation. In other words, the question was whether this subsection applied to cases where the accident happened before the date of the commencement of the Act.

The Deputy County Court Judge held in favour of the respondents that the subsection did not apply. His award was affirmed by the Court of Appeal (the Master of the Rolls, Lord Justice Scrutton, and Lord Justice Sargant), without argument, on the ground that the case was governed by the previous decision of that Court in Moakes v. Blackwell Colliery Company (41 The Times L.R., 296 ; [1925] 2 K.B., 64).

The facts are fully stated in the opinion of Lord Dunedin.

Mr. Upjohn, K.C., and Mr. A. T. James appeared for the appellant ; Mr. E. W. Cave, K.C., and Mr. Victor Evans for the respondents.

Viscount Dunedin.—My Lords,—George Clement, the husband of the appellant, was employed by the respondents as a collier, and on November 28, 1918, personal injury was caused to the said George Clement by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment. The respondents admitted their liability under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, to pay compensation to the said George Clement in respect of the said injury, and paid him compensation from the said November 28, 1918, to the date of his death, which occurred on January 24, 1925. These payments were, between the said November 28, 1918, and the said January 24, 1925, a total sum of £533 18s. 5d., being as to the sum of £363 7s. 6d., part thereof, weekly compensation at the rate of £1 per week from November 28, 1918, to January 1, 1924, and at the rate of £1 15s. 0d. per week from January 1, 1924, to January 24, 1925, and as to the sum of £170 10s. 11d., the additional compensation payable to the said George Clement under the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation (War Addition) Acts, 1917 and 1919.

The appellant, after the death of her husband, filed a request for arbitration, claiming for herself and dependants the sum of £200. The respondents did not admit that any sum was due, the sum already paid to George Clement in his lifetime having exceeded £300, and being deductible from the compensation otherwise payable on his death to his dependants under the provisions of paragraph 1 (a) (i.) of the First Schedule to the Act of 1906. That paragraph is as follows :—

"The amount of compensation under this Act shall be—(a) Where death results from the injury—

"(i.) If the workman leaves any dependants wholly dependent upon his earnings, a sum equal to his earnings in the employment of the same employer during the three years next preceding the injury, or the sum of one hundred and fifty pounds, whichever of those sums is the larger, but not exceeding in any case three hundred pounds, provided that the amount of any weekly payments made under this Act, and any lump sum paid in redemption thereof, shall be deducted from such sum, and, if the period of the workman's employment by the said employer has been less than the said three years, then the amount of his earnings during the said three years shall be deemed to be one hundred and fifty-six times his average weekly earnings during the period of his actual employment under the said employer. . . ."

The appellant founded her claim on section 24 (2) of the Act of 1923. Section 24 (2) is as follows :—

"No deduction shall be made under paragraph (1) (a) (i.) of the First Schedule to the principal Act, as amended by section 2 of this Act, in respect of the amount of any weekly payments made under the principal Act, so as to reduce the sum payable in respect of the children of the workman under the said section 2, nor so as to reduce the amount payable under the principal Act below two hundred pounds."

By subsection (3), "Paragraph (1) (a) (iii.) of the First Schedule to the principal Act shall have effect as if 'fifteen pounds' were substituted for 'ten pounds.'"

This last subsection referred to burial allowances.

The sole question in this case is therefore whether subsection (2) applies to the case of liability arising out of an accident which occurred before the coming into operation of the Act of 1923, to wit, January 1, 1924. The learned arbitrator and the Court of Appeal, both finding themselves bound by the judgment of the Court of Appeal in the case of Moakes v. Blackwell Colliery Company (41 The Times L.R., 296 ; [1925] 2 K.B., 64), decided by the same Court of Appeal, decided against the appellant. The present case is therefore an appeal against the decision in Moakes's case (supra), in which case the opinions of the learned Judges of the Court of Appeal will be found.

The other sections of the Act which must be quoted are sections 2 and 30.

Section 2 of the Act of 1923 provides under (a) and (b) certain additional benefits to the scale of compensation under the principal Act, and in a proviso says that the total amount of compensation payable to the dependants shall in no case exceed £600.

Section 30 provides that the provisions of sections 2 to 10 of the Act shall not apply to any case where the accident happened before the commencement of the Act.

The terms of the Interpretation Act, 1889, have been prayed in aid by some of the learned Judges. Strictly speaking, it does not apply, as it only deals with repealing Acts, not with amending Acts, but in truth that matters not, for the Interpretation Act, 1889, is only putting into statutory form a canon of construction which would be applied independently of it. When you are construing an Act which makes changes in the law, which changes can be well referred to what the law is to be after the passing of the Act, you will not construe the words, unless they are clearly to that effect, so as to upset vested rights and liabilities which are complete in themselves.

Applying that canon to the construction of the provisions now in question, one finds that in the case of accidents arising out of and in the course of employment in the past, certain rights and certain liabilities accrue at once to the workman and his dependants on the one hand, and the employer on the other. The exact pecuniary amount had to depend on the particular circumstances of the quality of the injury, the supervention of death, and the state of the workman's family, but the method of calculation was fixed once and for all, and therefore it would not be probable that an Act which was greatly extending benefit and liability would apply to the accidents of the past, and section 30 makes this quite clear to a great extent by expressly declaring that the additional benefits conferred by sections 2 to 10 are not to enure to any class out of accidents in the past. This, however, is only a general proposition. If the words are clear they must be given effect to, although they may lead to a result the opposite of that antecedently expected.

Now, the argument of the appellant has two main points : she says, first, that section 30 excludes as regards past accidents sections 2 to 10, but it does not mention section 24 (2), and she says, secondly, that section 24 (3) clearly applies to present accidents, and that therefore prima facie the whole section so applies. Now, an argument based on the brocard Exclusio unius est inclusio alterius, when applied to sections of an Act of Parliament, is only powerful when the section which is sought to be included is so framed that it needed an exclusion ; if in its terms it is so conceived as not to be included, then the argument has no weight, and here it is that the second argument hurts the first. Section 24 (3) is expressed absolutely without any reference to the excepted sections, and there is no reason why it should not apply in terms to all accidents. Therefore, says the appellant, the whole subsections should so apply. But section 24 (2) has a marked difference of expression, and by reference includes some of the sections excepted in the case of old accidents.

My Lords, I am of opinion that the result come to by the Court of Appeal is right. The direction as to a deduction not being allowed to reduce the amount payable to less than £200 is only as to a deduction which is to be made from the sum calculated on paragraph 1 (a) (i.) of the First Schedule as amended by section 2, and the schedule as amended by section 2 is a schedule which can only apply to new accidents, because the amendments effected by section 2 are specifically excluded from applying to old accidents.

I am therefore of opinion that the proper interpretation of the section is in accordance with, and not against, the antecedent probability of what would have been expected. I move, therefore, that the appeal be dismissed with costs.

Lord Shaw of Dunfermline concurred.

Lord Sumner (read by Lord Shaw of Dunfermline). —My Lords,—The event out of which liability under the Workmen's Compensation Acts arises, is the injurious accident in the course of the workman's employment. In the present case this happened in 1918. The appellant's husband, the injured workman, died after the amending Act of 1923 came into operation. Under this Act, by section 24 (2), "no deduction shall be made under paragraph (1) (a) (i.) of the First Schedule to the principal Act, as amended by section 2 of this Act, in respect of the amount of any weekly payments made under the principal Act, so as to reduce the amount payable in respect of the children of the workman under the said section 2, nor so as to reduce the amount payable under the principal Act below two hundred pounds." The appellant claims the benefit of this section. She has therefore to show, that the Act of 1923 is retrospective so as to apply these new provisions to a case in which the initial injury was sustained before the Act came into force, and that it alters the provisions of the Act of 1906, under which the sum payable on death might be exhausted by previous weekly payments, which were to be set off against it.

By the general rules for the construction of statutes the Act of 1923 is presumed not to be retrospective. If it were so, the effect would be to make a serious change for the worse in the position of the employer by mere implication. Before that Act an employer who had on his books a continuing present liability to make weekly compensation payments to an injured man, would also be entitled to write down, week by week, pro tanto his contingent liability, which would accrue in the event of that workman's death. In the present case the employers had thus written it off altogether. Week by week their payments had vested in them a corresponding right—a diminution of their contingent liability until it reached zero. Unless the Act of 1923 somewhere clearly states that the earlier legislation, under which that result had been automatically brought about before the Act of 1923 came into force, is retrospectively altered by its provisions, I am of opinion that the statutory presumption against a retrospective operation must prevail.

My Lords, after careful consideration, I have not been able to construe the Act of 1923 in the way which the appellant's case requires. Neither the fact that some sections are expressly stated not to be retrospective, among which the section in question is not mentioned, nor the fact that the allowance for funeral expenses, payable on the death of the injured workman, has been increased, in terms which I will assume, without deciding it, to apply to the death of a workman after the commencement of the Act from injuries received before it, appears to me to produce the result for which she must contend. The first provision does not necessarily involve that the Act is generally retrospective, except as to the named exceptions. The second is obviously intended to meet the well-known increase which has taken place in the cost of the necessaries of life and of death also. I think the case of Moakes (41 The Times L.R., 296 ; [1925] 2 K.B., 64) was rightly decided, and in this opinion I am confirmed by the fact that in the case of Talbot v. Vickers, Limited ([1925] 2 K.B., 669), two Lords Justices, who were not parties to the earlier decision, specially expressed their agreement with its reasoning instead of merely bowing to its authority.

Accordingly, my Lords, I think that this appeal fails.

Lord Wrenbury.—My Lords,—The accident having taken place on November 28, 1918, and death having ensued on January 24, 1925, the question is whether upon the true construction of section 24 (2) of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1923, deduction is or is not to be made so as to reduce the amount payable to the dependants. Under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, First Schedule, paragraph (1) (a) (i.), deduction would be made. If section 24 (2) of the Act of 1923 applies it will not. The accident being before and the death after the date at which the Act of 1923 came into operation (viz., January 1, 1924), the question is whether deduction is to be made or not. The appellant says that section 24 (2) of the Act of 1923 applies and that deduction is excluded.

On looking through the Act of 1923 I find that a principal purpose of the Act is to enlarge the benefits which the workman and his dependants are to have. Sections 2 to 6, both inclusive, are all to this effect. They form a group under the heading "Amendment of benefits under principal Act." Sections 7 to 10, both inclusive, deal with some further advantages to be given to the workman. But section 30 of the Act provides that sections 2 to 10 shall not apply when the accident happened before the commencement of the Act. The additional benefits created by the Act by the sections above mentioned are therefore not to be enjoyed when the accident was before the Act. It is with this in view that I come to look at section 24 (2). Am I to read that section as applicable to every case, including that in which the amendment made by section 2 of the Act of 1923 does not apply—or in other words, including that in which the benefits to be enjoyed by the workman are not enlarged—or am I to read it as confined to the case in which section 2 of the Act does apply and the Act is enlarging the benefits which the workman is to enjoy? My Lords, I think I must do the latter, and must read section 24 (2) as if after the words "as amended by section 2 of this Act" there were inserted the words "in any case to which the amendment made by section 2 of this Act applies."

The intention of the Act, in my judgment, is that where the accident happened before the Act neither the increased benefits given affirmatively by sections 2 to 6 nor those resulting from the absence of deduction under section 24 (2) shall be enjoyed by reason of the accident.

For these reasons I am of opinion that this appeal fails.

Lord Blanesburgh.—My Lords,—It is clear on a careful consideration of the terms of paragraph 1 (a) (i.) of the First Schedule to the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, that while there is no fatal accident to a workman in respect of which the sum payable under that Act on account of dependants can exceed £300, the sum of £150 mentioned in the paragraph represents in the case of very many such accidents the maximum amount so payable. And in arriving at these maxima any payments under the Act made to the injured workman himself before his death in respect of the same accident, whether in the form of weekly payments or a lump sum, are to be brought into account by way of deduction. If these simple facts are borne in mind, they will, I believe, be found to supply the clue to the solution of the problem in this case presented to the House.

My Lords, the Act of 1923 modified or amended that paragraph 1 (a) (i.) of the principal Act in several respects, two of which are here relevant.

First of all, the Act of 1923 provided—and the form of words may be found to be material—that the paragraph in question "shall have effect as if for the words 'one hundred and fifty pounds' there were substituted the words 'two hundred pounds'"—section 3. That is to say, the sum of £200 was to take the place of the £150 already referred to. Secondly, the total amount of compensation payable to the dependants might now reach, but was in no case to exceed, £600—section 2.

But these variations or amendments of the principal Act, contained as they were in sections 3 and 2 of the Act of 1923, are not, as a result of section 30, to apply to any case where the accident happened before the commencement of that Act, that is to say, before January 1, 1924. Accordingly, it being conceded by the appellant that no claim to any further compensation is now competent to her under paragraph 1 of the First Schedule to the principal Act—and it is not suggested that any claim is competent to her under any other provision of that statute—it follows that her present claim can only be made good if it is brought within some provision of the Act of 1923 which does not in turn presuppose alterations or amendments of that paragraph, operative only with reference to an accident happening after the commencement of the later Act.

The only provision of the Act relied upon for this purpose is section 24 (2). The true effect of that subsection in the light of the facts already stated becomes accordingly in the result the only question at issue upon the appeal. For convenience of reference, I venture again to transcribe the subsection at length:—

"No deduction shall be made under paragraph 1 (a) (i.) of the First Schedule to the principal Act, as amended by section 2 of this Act, in respect of the amount of any weekly payments made under the principal Act, so as to reduce the sum payable in respect of the children of the workman under the said section 2, nor so as to reduce the amount payable under the principal Act below £200."

My Lords, in terms, that subsection in the first branch of it applies only to the provisions of paragraph 1 (a) (i.) of the First Schedule to the principal Act "as amended by section 2 of this Act." That branch, at any rate, has no application to any accident which happened before January 1, 1924. The only question therefore which remains is whether the £200 referred to in the second branch of the subsection is in like case, as being in truth none other than the £200 referred to in the third section of the Act, or whether it is a new sum now referred to for the first time and only accidentally coincident with the £200 which by section 3 is in paragraph 1 (a) (i.), and in relation only to accidents on or after January 1, 1924, to be substituted for the original £150.

My Lords, to the question so presented it appears to me there can be only one answer. The subsection in this second branch of it is dealing with a "principal Act" which imposes, as a relevant liability in every case exigible, a sum of at least £200. The deduction in respect of weekly payments is not to "reduce" the amount payable under the principal Act below £200. Such a provision is inapplicable to an Act under which no more than, say, £150 may, in this behalf, be payable.

That this was the position under the principal Act, unamended by the Act of 1923, I have already shown. A "principal Act" with a liability in the same behalf extended to £200 is only brought into existence by section 3 of the Act of 1923, and then exclusively in relation to accidents of which the fatal accident to the workman here was not one.

Accordingly, my Lords, it appears to me to be clear that the sum of £200 mentioned in this subsection can be none other than the £200 referred to in section 3 of the Act, and that the second branch of the subsection does not any more than the first apply to accidents which happened before the commencement of the Act. If a further reason in support of this conclusion be needed it will be found in this consideration, that the alternative construction would, in effect, write out of the Act as otiose the express provision of section 30, by virtue of which section 3 has no application to any such accidents. Possibly the particular phraseology of section 3 may explain why it is that what is in effect an amendment thereby made in paragraph 1 (a) (i.) of the principal Act is not in section 24 (2) so referred to.

It was, my Lords, conceded by Mr. Upjohn that if, on construction, the figure of £200 mentioned in this subsection could be held to have direct reference to the "two hundred pounds" in section 3, the case of the appellant was at an end. His contention, of course, was that the two sums were only accidentally identical and had no connexion the one with the other.

That contention is, in my judgment, and for the reasons I have given, erroneous, and on this short ground I am of opinion that the decision of the Court of Appeal in Moakes v. Blackwell Colliery Company (41 The Times L.R., 296 ; [1925] 2 K.B., 64) was right.

There are other and more general grounds upon which, as it seems to me, the same conclusion may be reached. But I prefer to rest my judgment on what appears to be a neat point of construction.

This appeal should, I think, be dismissed.

SWAYNE v. HOWELLS AND ANOTHER.*

Rating—Fishery—Licensee of fishing rights—No deed of grant—Non-liability of licensee to to be rated—Rating Act, 1874 (37 and 38 Vict., c. 54), ss. 3, 6.

A person who has an exclusive licence to fish a river, but who holds no deed of grant of the fishing rights, is not liable to pay rates thereon.

A question of interest to anglers was raised in this case stated by Herefordshire justices. A complaint was preferred by the respondents, Aaron Howells and Thomas Williams, the overseers of the parish or township of Longtown, Herefordshire, under the Rating Act, 1874, against George Champeny Swayne, the appellant, for failure to pay rates amounting to £41 16s. 10d. in respect of 1924 and 1925. The justices ordered a distress warrant to issue, but stated a case.

The rates in question were levied in respect of certain alleged fishing rights enjoyed by the appellant in the rivers Monnow and Eskley. Subject to the objections that there was no right to rate the appellant and that his name was wrongly placed on the rate book, it was admitted that the rates in question had been duly made, published, and demanded, and were unpaid, and that if any sum were due the sum of £41 16s. 10d. was correct.

The appellant had for a considerable number of years obtained an exclusive right to fish over reaches of the said rivers by payment of an annual sum to each of eight different owners or occupiers in respect of separate holdings which together made up the whole.

Before November 19, 1924, neither the respondents nor their predecessors had rated the appellant in respect of the fishing. In one year the appellant paid over £106 in all for the exclusive right of fishing, and he exercised that right in each case during the times covered by the rates in question. In July, 1925, the appellant gave up the fishing of two of such owners or occupiers, and their fishing was thereafter let to someone else.

The appellant was assessed in one assessment in respect of the fishing obtained by him. He appealed to the assessment committee on the grounds that he was not the person liable to pay and that the fishing was extravagantly rated. The assessment committee confirmed the assessment.

There was no deed of grant to the appellant of the fishing rights.

Mr. Croom-Johnson appeared for the appellant ; Mr. Blanco White for the respondents.

Mr. Croom-Johnson contended that the right of fishing being an incorporeal hereditament lying in grant must be transferred by deed, and that in the absence of such a deed the appellant had a mere licence to fish, which did not make him rateable. In the absence of a legal severance by deed of the fishing rights there was no rateable hereditament on which a rate could be levied. Before the Rating Act, 1874, sporting rights were not assessable at all ; that Act was designed to get over the difficulty by making incorporeal hereditaments rateable, but there must still be a legal severance, which was a term of art, and not a mere licence. He referred to Duke of Somerset v. Fogwell (5 B. and C., 875) ; Bird v. Higginson (2 Ad. and E., 696) ; Kenrick v. Overseers of Guilsfield (5 C.P.D., 41).

Mr. Blanco White drew attention to the practical importance of the question. If fishing rights were rated with agricultural land they paid only a quarter of the ordinary rates ; if rated separately they were liable to full rates. Therefore overseers preferred if possible to rate them separately. He cited Alton U.D.C. v. Spicer (20 The Times L.R., 296 ; [1904] 1 K.B., 678). It was held in Holford v. Pritchard (3 Ex., 793) that there could be "use or occupation" of fishing rights.

Mr. Justice Salter.—You have no right to rate the appellant except under the statute. The four questions are : (1) Is there a right of sporting ? (2) If so, is it separated from the land ? (3) If so, is it let ? (4) Is it occupied ?

Mr. Blanco White contended that there was a demise in equity though not at common law, and that it would have been specifically enforceable.

Mr. Justice Salter.—The appellant could not maintain an action for trespass in his own name.

Mr. Blanco White.—In fact and in equity he is the occupier of the right which was made rateable by the Act of 1874. Mr. Croom-Johnson had said that "severance" was a term of art ; it was an ordinary English word of which everyone knew the meaning, and which was treated in some cases as interchangeable with "separated," which was the word used in Reg. v. Inhabitants of Thurlstone (1 E. and E., 502). If the appellant's contention was correct the question whether the sporting rights were to be rated at their full value or at one-quarter of it depended on whether the owner affixed a seal or merely signed his name to a letter.

Mr. Croom-Johnson, in reply, said that equity so far resembled nature that it did nothing in vain. and never granted specific performance of an agreement to take land for a year which might expire before the decree became enforceable. An incorporeal hereditament lay only in grant, not in livery, and could never be conferred except by deed.

The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE read the following considered judgment of the Court :—The question which this case involves arises out of the complaint preferred by the respondents, Aaron Howells and Thomas Williams, the overseers of the parish or township of Longtown, Herefordshire, against the appellant, Mr. George Champeny Swayne, for that he being a person duly rated and assessed to the relief of the poor in certain sums had not paid the several instalments and had refused to do so. The justices having heard the information made an order that a distress warrant issue against the appellant. The question raised by this case is whether in so deciding the justices were right in law.

The rates which were in question were levied in respect of certain alleged fishing rights enjoyed by the appellant. It was admitted that subject to certain objections the rates had been duly made. The case adds that the appellant had by payment of an annual sum obtained an exclusive right to fish, and had fished, over the rivers referred to for a considerable number of years, and that his right to do so was obtained each year from eight different owners or occupiers, each in respect of a separate holding making up the whole.

Before November 19, 1924, neither the respondents nor their predecessors had ever rated the appellant in respect of that fishing. The appellant paid an annual sum to each of the owners or occupiers for the fishing, and in one year the total came to over £106. For that payment the appellant obtained the exclusive right of fishing over the rivers in question. The appellant was assessed in one assessment in respect of the fishing so obtained by him. The appellant appealed to the assessment committee on the grounds that he was not the person liable to pay and that the fishing was extravagantly rated. The assessment committee, howver, confirmed the assessment. Finally it is found that there was no deed of grant to the appellant of the fishing rights.

On those facts the appellant contended that he had merely a licence to fish, and that, as the licensee, he was not rateable in respect of the fishing rights. Moreover, he contended that the right of fishing, being an incorporeal hereditament lying in grant, must be transferred by deed, and that in the absence of such a deed, no such right was at any material time vested in him ; and that there had been no severance of the fishing rights, and, therefore, there was no rateable hereditament on which a rate could be levied. The respondents contended that no legal severance was required under the Rating Act, 1874 ; that sporting rights were rateable when severed from the occupation of the land ; and that the term "severed from the occupation of the land" did not contemplate a legal severance. The justices found as a fact that the appellant enjoyed the beneficial occupation of the fishing, and that he was liable to be rated.

By section 3 of the Rating Act, 1874, rights of sporting, which include rights of fishing when severed from the occupation of the land, were brought within the category of rateable hereditaments, and, if the Act had contained no further provision with respect to them, the liability to be rated would have fallen on the person in beneficial occupation or enjoyment of the right. But in our view, section 6 of the Act must be read as prescribing the person upon whom this liability is to fall, and unless the appellant is shown to be a person liable under that section, he is, we think, entitled to succeed on this appeal.

Subsection 1 of that section applies to a case where the owner of the land has let the land, reserving to himself the rights of sporting—Rogers v. St. Germans Union (40 J.P., 807). In that case the right of sporting is not to be separately rated. Subsection 2 appears to apply only to a case where the sporting right is let on lease, and it, therefore, has no application to the present case.

The question remains whether the appellant can be said to be "the owner of the right of sporting" within the meaning of subsection 3 of section 6, construed in the light of subsection 4. It is difficult to suppose that the word "let" in subsection 4 was intended to be construed in a different or wider sense than in subsection 2, but in either view, looking at the latter part of subsection 4, we do not think that a person who has only a licence to fish is contemplated as owner of the rights of sporting within the meaning of section 6. The Legislature must, we think, be taken to have known when this Act was passed that these sporting rights are frequently let for the season only, and, therefore, made special provisions that, in the absence of a lease, the landlord should be deemed to be the occupier.

It was further contended on behalf of the appellant that, there being in this case no grant by deed of the fishing rights, there was in law no severance from the occupation of the land. The cases of Rogers v. St. Germans Union (supra) and Brigstocke v. Rayner (40 J.P., 245) appear to support this view, but, in any case, for the reasons given, we are of opinion that the appellant was not rateable and that the appeal should be allowed. That is the unanimous judgment of the Court.

The appeal was accordingly allowed, with costs.

K.B. Div. (Roche, J.) } 1926. Nov. 2.

GALE v. MOTOR UNION INSURANCE COMPANY, LIMITED.

LOYST v. GENERAL ACCIDENT FIRE AND LIFE ASSURANCE CORPORATION, LIMITED.*

Insurance (Motor Car)—Policies excluding risk covered by another policy—Provision for rateable contribution—Construction.

G. took out with the M. company a motor-car insurance policy covering himself and any friend driving with G.'s consent, and providing as follows :—"Condition 6.—The extension of the indemnity to friends or relatives of the insured is conditional upon such friend or relative being a licensed and competent driver and not being insured under any other policy.

"Condition 10.—If at the happening of any accident, injury, damage, or loss covered by this policy . . . there shall be subsisting any other insurance or indemnity of any nature whatever covering the same, whether effected by the insured or by any other person . . . then the company shall not be liable to pay or contribute towards any such damage or loss more than a rateable proportion of any sum payable in respect thereof for compensation."

L., who was G.'s brother-in-law, took out with the G. company a similar policy providing that "The insured will also be indemnified hereunder while personally driving a car not belonging to him provided . . . that there is no other insurance in respect of such other car whereby the insured may be indemnified," and that "If at the time of the occurrence of any accident loss or damage there shall be any other indemnity or insurance subsisting whether effected by the insured or by any other person the corporation shall not be liable to pay or contribute more than a rateable proportion of any sums payable in respect of such accident loss or damage."

While L. was driving G.'s car with G.'s consent it had a collision and L. had to pay damages. G., as trustee for L., claimed against the M. company, and L. on his own behalf claimed against the G. company.

Held, that in each policy the provision as to rateable contribution qualified the preceding clause and each company was liable to pay the claimants half the amount claimed.

This special case, stated by an arbitrator under section 7 of the Arbitration Act, 1889, raised a question of the liability of insurance companies under motor-car policies.

Mr. Blanco White and Mr. Handcock appeared for the claimants; Mr. Montgomery, K.C., and Mr. Wallington for the Motor Union Insurance Company; and Mr. Le Quesne, K.C., and Mr. Hilbery for the General Accident, &c., Assurance Corporation.

The claimant Gale, as trustee for the claimant Loyst, sought against the Motor Union Insurance Company, under a policy dated September 30, 1924, issued by that company to Gale, an indemnity in respect of monetary compensation which Loyst had been compelled to pay in the circumstances hereafter stated.

Loyst claimed on his own behalf against the General Accident, &c., Assurance Corporation, under a policy dated November 3, 1924, issued by them to him, an indemnity in respect of the said monetary compensation.

The claims were referred to the arbitration of Mr. Craig Henderson, K.C., and he stated his award in the form of the following special case.

1. By a policy of insurance dated September 30, 1924, the Motor Union Insurance Company insured the claimant Gale from August 14, 1924, to August 13, 1925, in respect of his A.B.C. two-seater motor-car.

The said Motor Union policy contained, inter alia, the following provisions:—

"Section A. The company shall indemnify the insured or (subject to provisions of condition 6) any relation or friend driving with the insured's consent against the payment of all sums which they shall become legally liable to pay for compensation in respect of accidents caused by any motor vehicle belonging to the insured and described in the above schedule:—(a) To any third person . . . (b) to any property or animal belonging to a third person. . . .

"Provided always that the due observance and fulfilment of the conditions and qualifications indorsed on this policy shall be a condition precedent to any liability of the company under this policy.

". . . Condition 6.—The extension of the indemnity to friends or relatives of the insured is conditional upon such friend or relative being a licensed and competent driver and not being insured under any other policy.

"Condition 10.—If at the happening of any accident, injury, damage, or loss covered by this policy . . . there shall be subsisting any other insurance or indemnity of any nature whatever covering the same, whether effected by the insured or by any other person . . . then the company shall not be liable to pay or contribute towards any such damage or loss more than a rateable proportion of any sum payable in respect thereof for compensation."

2. By a policy dated November 3, 1924, issued by the General Accident, &c., Assurance Corporation to Loyst, he was insured from October 31, 1924, to October 31, 1925, in respect of his Morris Cowley two-seater motor-car.

The policy contained, inter alia, clauses as follows:—

". . . the corporation will, subject to the terms conditions and limitations contained herein and of any indorsement hereon, indemnify the insured . . . in respect of any car described in the schedule against. . . .

"Sec. 2: (1) all sums which the insured shall become legally liable to pay in respect of any claim by any person . . . for . . . accidental bodily injury or damage to property . . . caused by through or in connexion with such car. . . .

"(2) The insured will also be indemnified hereunder while personally driving a car not belonging to him provided . . . that there is no other insurance in respect of such other car whereby the insured may be indemnified."

The conditions indorsed on this policy included the following:—

"(5) If at the time of the occurrence of any accident loss or damage there shall be any other indemnity or insurance subsisting whether effected by the insured or by any other person the corporation shall not be liable to pay or contribute more than a rateable proportion of any sums payable in respect of such accident loss or damage."

At the foot of the conditions was an indorsement:—

"The due observance and fulfilment of the provisions and conditions of this policy . . . shall be a condition precedent to any liability of the corporation to make any payment under this policy."

3. The claimant Gale was a brother-in-law of the claimant Loyst.

4. On April 4, 1925, Loyst was driving the A.B.C. motor-car belonging to Gale, with Gale's consent, and came into collision with a motor cyclist. The cyclist brought an action for damages in Brentford County Court, and, by a judgment given on October 9, 1925, in that Court, he recovered £93 17s. 4d. damages, and costs, which were subsequently ascertained at £60 2s. 11d. Loyst paid these sums to the cyclist and also incurred costs, which he had not yet paid, in defending the action.

5. Loyst claimed under both the insurance policies. The Motor Union Insurance Company repudiated all liability and suggested that the General Accident, &c., Assurance Corporation were liable: that corporation also repudiated liability and suggested that the Motor Union Insurance Company were liable. In the result, Loyst had to defend the county court action at his own expense. Subsequently, formal claims for arbitration were made by Loyst against the General Accident, &c., Assurance Corporation, and by Gale, as trustee for Loyst, against the Motor Union Insurance Company. By the consent of all parties the claims were referred to Mr. Craig Henderson, K.C.

6. On behalf of the claimants it was contended at the arbitration :—

(1) That Loyst must be covered by one policy or the other, and that each insurer must indemnify him so far as he was not indemnified by the other. (2) That, on a true interpretation of the two policies, having regard to condition 10 of the Motor Union Insurance Company's policy, and condition 5 of the General Accident, &c., Assurance Corporation's policy, the two insurers were liable to pay a full indemnity, each contributing rateably to the insured values of the A.B.C. motor-car, insured by the Motor Union Insurance Company for £120, and the Morris Cowley, insured for £155 by the General Accident, &c., Assurance Corporation.

On behalf of the Motor Union Insurance Company it was contended :—(1) That, prima facie, each insurer intended to indemnify the person to whom the policy was issued, and that any provision extending the right of indemnity to any other person must be interpreted strictly ; (2) that Loyst was "insured under another policy," viz., the General Accident, &c., Assurance Corporation's policy, and therefore was not covered by the Motor Union Insurance Company's policy ; and that (3) condition 10 of the company's policy did not apply, and there could be no liability of both companies.

On behalf of the General Accident, &c., Assurance Corporation it was contended :—(1) That the liability of one insurer excluded the liability of the other, and the conditions of the policies as to contribution by the insurers in rateable proportions did not apply ; (2) that motor insurance was primarily an insurance of goods, and the General Accident, &c., Assurance Corporation's policy primarily insured the Morris motor-car and third party risks incidental thereto ; the further cover given by section 2 (2) of the policy provided for another car, but only if there was no other insurance of that other car, and, as the A.B.C. motor-car was insured, the General Accident, &c., Assurance Corporation could not be liable ; and (3) that the words at the end of section 2 (2) of their policy, "whereby the insured may be indemnified," were words descriptive of the type of policy which must be in existence if their policy was not to be operative ; that those words must be construed strictly, and that the words were satisfied in this case because the risk was covered by the general words of section A of the Motor Union Insurance Company's policy, and condition 6 was fulfilled by Loyst and, even if not fulfilled, could be waived and might never be operative.

The arbitrator held :—(a) That the liability of one insurer excluded liability of the other, and that the conditions in both policies as to payment of the loss by the two insurers in rateable proportions did not apply ; (b) that, on a true construction of the material provisions of each policy, Loyst satisfied the requirements of condition 6 of the Motor Union Insurance Company's policy, and was entitled to be indemnified by that company, but not by the General Accident, &c., Assurance Corporation. He therefore awarded, subject to the opinion of the Court, that the claim of Loyst against the General Accident, &c., Assurance Corporation failed, but that Gale, as trustee for Loyst, was entitled to be indemnified by the Motor Union Insurance Company in respect of all sums which, in consequence of the collision on April 4, 1925, Loyst became legally liable to pay, and also in respect of costs incurred by Loyst in defending the action.

The question for the opinion of the Court was whether the award was correct in law.

Mr. Montgomery, in opening the case, said that it was really a fight between the two insurance companies ; for the claimants, he thought, might certainly recover from one or other, or from both rateably. The case would come under section A of the Motor Union Insurance Company's policy but for condition 6, which provided that the extension of the indemnity to the insured's relative depended on that relative's not being otherwise insured. Loyst was insured in respect of a car of his own by the General Accident, &c., Assurance Corporation's policy, and the material provision there was section 2 (2) (supra). In both policies there was a provision for payment of only a rateable proportion. Before the arbitrator the claimants alone relied on that provision, and neither company put it forward.

He would prefer, while not abandoning his contention that the Motor Union Insurance Company was not liable, to rely on the rateable proportion clause. Under that company's policy, construed strictly, the effect of condition 6 was that Loyst could not recover at all, because he was insured elsewhere. The provisions of the General Accident, &c., Assurance Corporation's policy were not so stringent. Section 2 (2), read with condition 5, showed that the intention was not that the claimants should not recover anything, but only that they should not recover more than a proportion of the loss.

The claimants wished to construe the rateability as proportional to the values of the two insured cars, but the insurance companies preferred to reckon by the extent of the risk covered ; if each company had insured the whole risk the contribution of each should be the same. Before the arbitrator the General Accident, &c., Assurance Corporation relied on Williams v. Baltic Insurance Association of London, Limited (40 The Times L.R., 668 ; [1924] 2 K.B., 282), but that case turned on the question whether there was an insurable interest and did not apply here.

Mr. Le Quesne submitted that the intention of section 2 (2) of the General Accident, &c., Assurance Corporation's policy was only to insure the strange car if it was not insured. The commonsense view, and the intention here, was that the company which insured the car which actually did the damage must be the company to pay, and the General Accident, &c., Assurance Corporation only went so far as to say that they would pay if the car was not insured at all. Here there was another policy in existence under which, in certain circumstances, Loyst might recover, so his clients' policy never attached. It was suggested in "MacGillivray on Insurance," p. 717, that as a matter of strict law in such a case as this the claimant could not recover against either company, but he (Mr. Le Quesne) did not contend that. From the business point of view the Motor Union Insurance Company must be solely liable, because they were the insurers of the car which actually did the damage.

Counsel for the claimants did not address the Court.

Mr. Montgomery was not called on to reply.

Mr. Justice Roche having stated the facts and read the material clauses of the policies, said that he saw nothing to support Mr. Le Quesne's argument that the General Accident, &c., Assurance Corporation's policy was only to apply where the car being driven was not insured at all. Each policy provided that if the risk was covered by another policy the insurers would not be liable. But each policy went on to provide that, where two policies were in existence, the insurers should pay rateably. Those provisions must be read together, and the effect of them when taken together was not, in his opinion, to deprive the claimants of any right whatever to recover. The provision as to rateable contribution qualified the preceding clause denying liability and showed that the intention was that where there were two policies each insurer must contribute rateably.

As to the proportions in which the contributions should be calculated, he did not think that the suggested contribution of each company according to the value of the particular car which it had insured was satisfactory. The right basis was that each of the respondents should pay the claimants one-half of the amount claimed, and he therefore ordered accordingly.

K.B. Div. (Wright, J.) 1926. Nov. 1.

W. FRANCE FENWICK AND CO., LIMITED v. THE KING.*

Ship — Requisition—Cargo—Government order not to discharge—Detention of ship—Ultimate requisition of cargo—Compensation for detention—Emergency Regulations, 1921, regs. 9, 11, 25.

The suppliants were the owners of a steamer which, in March, 1921, was chartered from them to bring a cargo of coal from Sunderland to London. The steamer arrived at Rotherhithe on April 1, but on April 2, before she could begin to discharge, a Customs official gave directions that, by reason of the coal strike, the cargo was not to be discharged. The ship was detained until April 21, when the Government requisitioned the coal. She was then ordered by the Board of Trade to take the coal to Erith, and to discharge it there. The discharge was completed on April 23.

The suppliants claimed damages for detention of the ship and asked for (a) a declaration that she was requisitioned by a Government Department, and that they were entitled under reg. 25 of the Emergency Regulations, 1921, to compensation for 21 days' detention, and (b) a declaration that they were entitled to compensation at common law.

Held, that the order not to discharge was not a requisition of the ship, and that the suppliants were entitled under the Regulations to compensation for a requisition of the ship for only two days, namely, April 22 and 23, and that a mere negative prohibition did not carry with it any claim to compensation at common law.

This was a petition of right presented by shipowners.

Sir Leslie Scott, K.C., and Sir Robert Aske appeared for the suppliants; the Solicitor-General (Sir Thomas Inskip, K.C.) and Mr. W. Bowstead for the Crown.

The facts on which the claim arose were the following:—

The suppliants were the owners of a steamer, the Lockwood, which, in March, 1921, was chartered from them to bring a cargo of coal from Sunderland to London for the South Metropolitan Gas Company. The steamer arrived at Rotherhithe on April 1. She was to have discharged there, but as the wharf was occupied by another steamer she had to lie out at a buoy.

On April 2, before she could begin to discharge, a Customs official came on board the Lockwood and said that, by reason of the coal strike, the Government had taken the cargo over. He said that it must not be unloaded, and that steam must be kept up, so that, if necessary, the steamer might take the coal to some other port. The Lockwood's boilers needed cleaning, but the Customs officials would not allow the work to be done. In the result the Lockwood was detained until April 21, when the Government requisitioned the coal. The vessel was then ordered to take the coal to Erith and to discharge it there. Discharge was completed at Erith on the afternoon of April 23.

The suppliants now claimed damages for detention; for the cost of keeping up steam; and for the payment of the crew during the period of detention. They asked for (a) a declaration that the Lockwood was requisitioned and taken possession of by a Government Department, and that the suppliants were entitled to compensation under reg. 25 of the Emergency Regulations, 1921; and (b) a declaration that the suppliants were entitled to compensation at common law for the interference with their rights.

The sum claimed was £1,225.

The Crown, by their answer, pleaded that they had acted under the Emergency Regulations, and that in the circumstances no compensation was payable.

The material sections of the Regulations referred to were:—

"Statutory Rules and Orders.

"1921. No. 440.

"Emergency Regulations, 1921, dated April 1, 1921.

"9. (1) The Board of Trade or any other Government Department approved by his Majesty . . . may make orders regulating, restricting, or giving directions with respect to . . . the terms and conditions on which the traffic is to be carried on, the ports at which cargo is to be loaded or discharged . . . (including directions requiring ships to proceed to specified ports for the purpose of loading or unloading cargo . . .) and other matters affecting shipping where it appears to the Department necessary or expedient to make any such order for the purpose of making shipping available for the needs of the country. . . .

"(2) The Board of Trade or any other Government Department . . . may . . . by order requisition or require to be placed at the disposal of the Department, in order that they may be used in the manner best suited for the needs of the country, any ships. . . .

"11. (2) Subject to the general directions of the Commissioners of Customs and Excise, the collector or other chief officer of Customs at any port or place in the United Kingdom may prohibit the unloading of any goods . . . from any ship . . . in that port or place. . . .

"13 (1) The Board of Trade may take possession . . . of

* Reported by W. B. Thompson, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

"(d) any stock of coal wheresoever situate and by whomsoever held. . . .

"(2) The Board of Trade may give directions

"(a) As to the management and user of any . . . property of which possession may be taken as aforesaid.

"(b) As to the . . . transport, storage . . . disposal, and use of any coal. . . .

"25. The compensation payable in respect of any property which is requisitioned or of which possession is taken under these Regulations shall be such as may be determined in default of agreement by a single arbitrator. . . .

Sir Leslie Scott, in opening the case, said that the delay in bringing the petition was due to the fact that it had been hoped that a settlement could be reached. The question at issue was whether what happened in this case was such a putting of the vessel at the disposal of the Government as amounted to a requisition. In fact, the Government used the Lockwood as a coal store for three weeks. Although the Regulations did not, in so many words, state that compensation was to be payable to persons whose property was seized, reg. 25 showed that it was assumed that compensation would be payable. The Crown had consented to the question of liability being decided by the Court.

He submitted that "requisition" was a general word which would cover any taking over. He referred to The Meandros (41 The Times L.R., 236; [1925] P. 61, at p. 65); The Broadmayne (32 The Times L.R., 304; [1916] P. 64, at p. 73); The Sarpen (32 The Times L.R., 575; [1916] P. 306, at p. 317); China Mutual Steam Navigation Company v. Maclay (34 The Times L.R., 81; [1918] 1 K.B., 33); Sutherland and Co. v. Compagnie Napolitaine d'Eclairage et de Chauffage par le Gaz (36 The Times L.R., 724); Bombay and Persia Steam Navigation Company v. Shipping Controller (7 Ll. L., 226); Federated Coal and Shipping Company v. The King (38 The Times L.R., 497; [1922] 2 K.B., 42).

With regard to the alternative claim for compensation at common law, he referred to Lord Atkinson's judgment in the de Keyser Hotel case (36 The Times L.R., 600; [1920] A.C. 508, at p. 542). A common law right to compensation would never be destroyed by a statute unless the statute expressly said so (Commissioner of Public Works v. Logan, 19 The Times L.R., 545; [1903] A.C., 355). He referred also to the Cannon Brewery case (35 The Times L.R., 552; [1919] A.C., 744, at p. 752); and Robinson v. The King (37 The Times L.R., 698; [1921] 3 K.B., 183).

Sir Robert Aske then called evidence in support of the claim.

The Solicitor-General contended that all that had happened was that a Customs officer went on board and forbade the unloading of the cargo. Nothing was said about the ship being kept at the disposition of the Government; the cargo only was dealt with. That direction as to the cargo was lawful under Regulation 11, and did not amount to a requisition or a taking possession of the ship. The cargo was, in fact, requisitioned later—on April 21—but the ship was never requisitioned at all. The mere prevention of unloading would give no right to compensation. After the coal had been requisitioned all that the ship had to do was to discharge at a particular place. The order so to discharge did not amount to a requisition, though it was an interference with the owners' right to use their ship as they liked.

Sir Robert Aske called William Milne, master of the Lockwood in April, 1921, who said that about 5.30 p.m. on April 2 Customs officials in uniform came on board and told him that he must not discharge the cargo; that the ship was requisitioned; that he must keep steam up; and that he must be prepared to go to any other port. The witness asked why, and they told him that there was a strike on. Later, on the same evening, a Customs launch came alongside and gave him the same orders. He then lay at the buoy until April 22. On April 22 he went to Erith, as ordered, and discharged the cargo.

Cross-examined by the Solicitor-General, he said that the Customs officers who gave him his orders in April, 1921, used the word "requisitioned."

The Solicitor-General called evidence for the Crown. A Customs preventive officer, stationed at Blackwall, stated the instructions which the Customs received at the material time. Their orders were to refuse permission to discharge coal cargoes, but they were not told anything about requisitioning vessels. He went to the Lockwood and told the officer not to discharge the coal without permission, but said nothing else to him.

Cross-examined, he said that he did not tell the captain that he must keep steam up.

Other evidence having been called, the Solicitor-General said that he agreed with the suppliants in their proposition that no particular form of words was required to constitute a requisition. The case fell into two periods—first, from April 1 to 21; and, secondly, the two days April 22 and 23. The evidence now given by the suppliants did not agree with the statements in the petition. He submitted that the only thing established was that the order was given that the ship must not be discharged. If anything at all was said about keeping steam up it might have been merely in conversation. The order was "Don't discharge." Bombay and Persia Steam Navigation Company v. Shipping Controller (supra) was an authority showing that such an order did not amount to a requisition.

Sir Leslie Scott replied. Even if the evidence as to what was said by the Customs officers was accepted in favour of the Crown, the question remained, what was the real effect of what the Government did? He claimed compensation under Regulation 25 because the ship had been put at the disposal of the Crown under Regulation 9. The order not to discharge implied that the ship must stay where it was and await further orders. Meanwhile it was to keep the cargo at the Government's disposal, which constituted a keeping of the ship at the disposal of the Crown within Regulation 9, whatever form of words might have been used. If the claim failed under the Regulations then he relied, alternatively, on the common law.

Mr. Justice Wright, in the course of a written judgment, said:—I find that no Customs officer gave any instructions until April 22, 1921, except that discharge was prohibited. The ship hauled into the jetty in the evening of April 2, 1921, but later was moved and moored at the Charlton Buoys lower down the stream. There she remained until orders were given on April 22, 1921, for her to go to Erith and discharge there. These orders were given by the Government, that is, the Board of Trade, by the Mines Department, which was in charge of these matters. A coal strike was in progress when the ship arrived. The Mines Department was concerned to see that the cargo was delivered where it was specially needed having regard to the general position of coal supplies, namely in Area 14, the discharging place being Erith. Attempts were made by the Mines Department to induce the consignees of the cargo to agree to surrender the coal to the Board of Trade, but they refused, and at length, on April 21, 1921, the Board of Trade sent a letter to the consignees requisitioning the cargo under their emergency powers. The Customs gave permission to discharge at Erith. The vessel was ordered to go and discharge there on April 22, 1921. This was done, and discharge was completed on April 23, 1921. The vessel while remaining at the Buoys had kept under banked fires.

On these facts the suppliants claim to be entitled to be paid for 21 days' detention—namely, from April 2, 1921, to April 23, 1921, either under reg. 25 of the Emergency Regulations, 1921, or at common law. These Emergency Regulations (Statutory Rules and Orders, 1921, No. 440) were issued on April 1, 1921, by reason of the then existing coal strike, and were made under authority of the Emergency Powers Act, 1920. It is not contended that they were in any way invalid. Under them the Board of Trade was empowered, where it appeared necessary by reason of the existing emergency, to take possession of various stores, road transport, coal mines, coal, and other things and places specified; but the Regulations also dealt with matters connected with shipping, in particular by regs. 9, 11, and 25, which I will take as read.

The dispute, so far as concerns the Regulations, turns on those paragraphs. The suppliants' original contentions were based on the allegations set out in paragraphs 4 and 5 of the petition, but I indicated that I was not likely to find these paragraphs proved, and Sir Leslie Scott, in a strenuous argument, contended that I should hold that the orders to discharge given on April 22, 1921, constituted a requisition and requirement within reg. 9 (2), giving a claim to compensation pro tanto under reg. 25; and that, equally, the earlier period when the ship was lying under banked fires waiting permission to unload came under reg. 9 (2). I did not gather that he relied specifically on reg. 9 (1). He contended that while the ship was waiting at the Buoys she was, in substance, being kept by the Board of Trade at their disposal; the Board had determined to take the cargo, and intended to keep the ship with the cargo on board at their disposal, so that at any moment at their convenience they could order her to go and discharge where they desired, and, meantime, the ship was a floating warehouse for the cargo, potentially, if not actually, belonging to the Government, a floating warehouse kept with main steam and full crew ready at any moment when the Board of Trade ordered it to go and discharge. Whatever words the Customs officer used he meant, it was contended, and the Board of Trade meant, and was understood to mean, that the ship was being ordered to keep the coal on board for the benefit of the Board of Trade, to stay where it was, awaiting further instructions, and to be ready to act on such instructions whenever received. In this sense, it was contended by Sir Leslie Scott, the ship was during that latter period required to be placed, and was placed, at the disposal of the Board of Trade. On the other hand the Solicitor-General for the Crown contended, though I think he did not press the point, as regards the days April 22 and 23, 1921, that the vessel merely acted on directions to discharge, given under reg. 9 (1), and was never requisitioned under reg. 9 (2) so as to give a claim under reg. 25. He contended as regards the period up to April 22, 1921, that nothing was done by the Customs or the Board of Trade except to give purely negative orders—namely, that the cargo was not to be discharged, which orders were justified by reg. 11 (2) even if the ship must wait where she was, because she could not leave without getting from the Customs an endorsement on the transire or the pass, which was all she would have needed by way of clearance, being a coastwise vessel. That circumstance, however convenient to the Board of Trade, resulted from collateral matters and not from any order given under the Regulations.

A number of cases were cited and I shall refer to them later. I think it better first to state the conclusion at which I have arrived on the construction of these Regulations.

Reg. 25 provides for compensation in respect of property the possession of which is taken under the Regulations, that is, under various regulations such as 13 (1) (d) "coal," which do not concern this question, and also in respect of property requisitioned. The word "requisition" seems to be elsewhere used only in reg. 9 (2), where it is coupled with the words "require to be placed" at the disposal of the Department. These latter words are, I think, inserted either by way of definition or amplification of the word "requisitioned" as used in reg. 25, where also some of the provisions with regard to road vehicles, &c., may be included. "Requisitioned" so used in reg. 25 means, in my judgment, some effective and positive dominion or control constituted by a definite order given under the Regulations. Thus the order to proceed to Erith and discharge constituted such a requisition. The vessel no doubt remained in the possession of the suppliants by their master and crew, but she was required to be placed, and was placed, at the disposal of the Department; she was performing the service which the Department ordered.

The position is, in my judgment, different whilst she was merely prohibited from unloading under reg. 11 (2). She was then not performing any service on the orders of the Government. There was no act which the owners were required to do or service to render. In effect, to attempt to unload the ship whilst under the prohibition, the validity of which is not questioned, would simply be to do an unlawful act, and it cannot have been intended that compensation would be paid to subjects for abstaining to do unlawful acts.

It is immaterial, in my opinion, that the ship waited where she was and was, in fact, available to discharge whenever and wherever the Department required her. That was merely a collateral consequence. Indeed, the Government might never have needed the coal or taken possession of it or given any orders to the ship; the strike might have suddenly ended and the emergency passed; or the coal might have been purchased by a voluntary arrangement from the consignees and voluntary arrangements made as to unloading. Whether there was a requisition depends, in my judgment, on the nature and quality of the order given and not on collateral considerations.

It was not, I think, contended by Sir Leslie Scott that the order not to unload was a direction within reg. 9 (1). I do not think it was, nor do I think any direction under reg. 9 (1) could in itself amount to a requisition. So to amount the direction must, I think, also come within reg. 9 (2) and amount to a requirement that the vessel be placed at the disposal of the Government.

On the Regulations I hold that the suppliants are entitled to compensation for the two days, April 22 and 23, 1921, but for no other days claimed.

I think this conclusion is also in accordance with the cases cited.

The word "requisition" appears from the Oxford dictionary to have been adopted from the French, and as early as 1837 was used by Carlyle as meaning "to require anything to be furnished for military purposes." It came, however, into official prominence during the Great War, and, in particular, was employed in the Proclamation by the Admiralty dated August 3, 1914, in connexion with the requisition and taking up of British vessels. It was employed in several of the Defence of the Realm Regulations, especially reg. 39 BBB, and in the Indemnity Act, 1920, section 2 (1). The nature of the requisition of vessels under the Admiralty Proclamation was explained by Lord Justice Pickford in the case of The Broadmayne (32 The Times L.R., 304 ; [1916] P., 64) and in the case of The Sarpen (32 The Times L.R., 575 ; [1916] P., 306). The same great Judge, when Master of the Rolls, again discussed the meaning of the word in the case of Bombay and Persia Steam Navigation Company v. Shipping Controller (7 Ll. L., 226). He was dealing with that word as used either in the Admiralty Proclamation or the Defence of the Realm Regulations or the Indemnity Act of 1920—it does not appear which—and he there said that the word at any rate does contemplate employment of some sort by the Government for Government purposes. He obviously would regard as a requisition a case where the Government, having taken possession of a cargo, kept it in the ship at their disposal, but he held that in the contest before him a mere direction to the ship to proceed to a particular port, the order being assumed to be lawful, did not constitute a requisition.

The case of Federated Coal and Shipping Company v. The King (38 The Times L.R., 497 ; [1922] 2 K.B., 42) mainly turned on the circumstance that if there had been a requisition it was a requisition from the owners, whereas the suppliants there were merely time charterers, but Mr. Justice Bailhache seems to assume that if a ship were ordered to lie in a port at the Government's disposal, such order being lawful, that would be a case not of requisition but of mere direction. The point, however, was not material, and, whilst it may be that a mere direction would be different from a requisition, a direction that the ship should be at the disposal of the Government would, I think, be a requisition as that term is used in reg. 9 (2) of the Emergency Regulations, 1921, or in reg. 39 BBB of the Defence of the Realm Regulations. That regulation was discussed by the Court of Appeal in the case of Sutherland and Company v. Compagnie Napolitaine d'Eclairage et de Chauffage par le Gaz (36 The Times L.R., 724). The steamer in that case had been directed to proceed to an Australian port and there load a cargo of grain for the United Kingdom for the British Government. That was held to constitute a requisition within the meaning of the charterparty, which provided for a suspension of the charter period during the requisition. The ship was so directed under reg. 39 BBB, which is in practically identical terms with reg. 9 of the Emergency Regulations, 1921. The members of the Court of Appeal did indeed abstain from giving any formal definition of the word "requisition," but I think their judgments support the conclusion that a direction to proceed to a place and load or discharge a cargo for the Government amounts to a requisition in the sense of the Regulations. I cannot find it suggested, still less decided, in any case that a mere direction by the Government for a ship to go to a place, or a fortiori a mere negative direction, such as not to unload without permission, can constitute a requisition or a requirement that a vessel should be placed at the Government's disposal within such a Regulation as the present.

I do not need to consider at any length the claim based on the common law right to compensation for interference with a subject's property. In the cases cited in argument the matter has been discussed by high judicial authority, and I do not think it necessary to express any opinion of my own, but I shall assume that the Crown has no right at common law to take a subject's property for reasons of State without paying compensation. But I think the rule can only apply (if it does apply) to a case where property is actually taken possession of or used by the Government, or where, by the order of a competent authority, it is placed at the disposal of the Government. A mere negative prohibition, though it involves interference with an owner's enjoyment of property, does not, I think, merely because it is obeyed, carry with it at common law any right to compensation. A subject cannot claim at common law compensation merely because he obeys a lawful order of the State. Hence, I think, there is no right at common law which the suppliants in this case can claim in respect of the period up to April 22, 1921 ; and as regards the two days April 22 and 23, 1921, the suppliants cannot be at common law in a better position than under reg. 25 of the Emergency Regulations, which indeed, in my opinion, has superseded any common law right, if such otherwise existed.

I am only asked to deal with the question of liability, and the result, therefore, is that I declare that the suppliants are entitled to recover £100 in respect of the two days April 22 and 23, 1921, but are not entitled to recover in respect of any further or other period.

HARMS (INCORPORATED) AND OTHERS v. EMBASSY CLUB, LIMITED, AND OTHERS.*

Copyright — Infringement — Musical work — Performance in public—Copyright Act, 1911 (1 and 2 Geo. V., c. 46), ss. 1, 2.

The question whether the performance of a musical work was a performance in public, so as to constitute an infringement of copyright, is a question of fact, and, in determining that question, the quantum of damage likely to accrue and the number and class of persons having a right to be present at the performance are factors to be noted.

Decision of Eve, J. (42 The Times L.R., 729 ; [1926] Ch. 870), affirmed.

This was an appeal by the defendants from a decision of Mr. Justice Eve (42 The Times L.R., 729 ; [1926] Ch. 870), holding that the performance by an orchestra of certain American dance music at a London dance club was a performance in public and therefore an infringement of the plaintiffs' copyright therein, and granting an injunction to restrain such performance.

The first plaintiffs were the American owners of the copyright of a musical play entitled Tip-Toes, and the second plaintiffs, Messrs. Chappell and Co.,

* Reported by H. Langford Lewis, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

were the musical publishers in England of the play. The defendants, Martan's Club, Limited, were the owners of the Embassy Club, a social and dance club in Old Bond-street.

The plaintiffs complained that the defendants had authorized the performance by their orchestra at the club on March 4, 1926, of an excerpt from Tip-Toes entitled That Certain Feeling. They claimed that this performance was an infringement of their copyright and brought an action for an injunction to restrain the defendants from performing the same in public at the Embassy Club, or elsewhere, without their consent, and for damages. The defendants admitted that the performance had taken place, but contended that it was not "in public."

The total number of members of the Embassy Club was 1,800, and on the night in question 130 members of the club had dined there, and some 50 guests were present during the performance of the music, when dancing took place. Members were entitled to introduce any number of guests on payment of 10s. for each guest introduced after 9 p.m. The play Tip-Toes had been produced in America, but had not at that date been produced in England, though a few copies of the music had been published simultaneously with the American publication.

Mr. Justice Eve held, applying the decision in Duck v. Bates (13 Q.B.D., 843), that on the facts proved, and having regard in particular to the large membership of the Embassy Club and the right of members to introduce visitors, the performance at the club was a "performance in public." He made a declaration to that effect, with liberty to apply for an injunction if the necessity arose.

The defendants appealed.

Mr. Vaisey, K.C., and Mr. Winterbotham appeared for the appellants; Mr. Gover, K.C., and the Hon. S. O. Henn Collins for the respondents.

Counsel for the respondents were not called upon.

The Master of the Rolls, in giving judgment, said that by section 1 (1) of the Copyright Act, 1911, copyright subsisted in every original literary, dramatic, musical, and artistic work, subject to certain conditions, throughout the parts of his Majesty's Dominions to which the Act extended. By subsection 2 of section 1 copyright meant the sole right to produce or reproduce or perform the work or any substantial part thereof in public. By section 2 (1):—

"Copyright in a work shall be deemed to be infringed by any person who, without the consent of the owner of the copyright, does anything the sole right to do which is by this Act conferred on the owner of the copyright. . . ."

His Lordship, having stated shortly the facts as found by Mr. Justice Eve, proceeded:—It was obvious that the words "in public" were not easy to define, and they were commonly used with regard to a number of activities in which people shared. Certain cases had been referred to by counsel for the appellant, particularly Wall v. Taylor (11 Q.B.D., 102) and Duck v. Bates (13 Q.B.D., 843).

It was quite true that the terms of the earlier Copyright Acts which were considered in these cases were quite different from those of the present Act. Dramatic copyright was first protected by the Act of 1833 (3 and 4 Will. III., c. 15), and by section 1 of the Act of 1842 (5 and 6 Vict., c. 45) the privileges in copyright given in the earlier Act were extended to musical compositions. The effect of these statutes was to give the author of a dramatic piece with music the right to prevent the performance of it in any place of dramatic entertainment without his consent. The words of the present statute were different, but it was necessary to consider the nature of the right given to the owner of a musical composition. Lord Esher, M.R., in Duck v. Bates (13 Q.B.D., at p. 845), said:—

"I agree that what was intended to be protected was the value of the author's invention, that is the key to the construction of the Act: he does not want sentimental protection: he has power himself to represent his drama, and to confer upon others the right to represent it. That power gives a value to his production. If an author performs his drama, and if it is performed also by another, the author will be injured."

The Copyright Act, 1911, gave protection to the author of a musical or dramatic work. It was true that the protection amounted to a monopoly, but no prejudice was to be attached to the use of that word.

The two cases referred to led to a discussion of the meaning of the phrase "place of dramatic performance," and the view of the Court was in each case that that meaning must to a certain extent be a question of fact. A similar view was taken by Chief Justice Tindal in the earlier case of Planché v. Braham (4 Bing. N.C., 17). In Wall v. Taylor (11 Q.B.D., 102) Lord Esher said that what was a representation or performance at a place of dramatic entertainment must to some extent be a question of fact. In Duck v. Bates (supra) Lord Justice Bowen at p. 850 said:—

"Then the question of fact will arise, whether the place has not been so appropriated on any particular occasion: profit is a very important element: the question of numbers also is very important: these are matters to be taken into consideration."

And further on:—

"There is a broad distinction between the present case and a performance to which the public at large or any portion of the public are invited; but the question must be to a certain extent a question of fact."

These authorities were ample foundation to support what Mr. Justice Eve had decided—namely, that what was a performance "in public" was largely a question of fact.

Starting with the question what was the measure of protection afforded to the author, one must next consider whether the true view was that there had been a "performance in public" at the club. In that connexion one must consider whether there was such a representation as would injure the author's right to money. As the Master of the Rolls said in Duck v. Bates (supra, at p. 847), there must be present a sufficient part of the public who would also go to a performance licensed by the author as a commercial transaction, otherwise the place where the drama was represented would not be a place of dramatic entertainment.

One must consider also whether the performance could be described as "domestic or private," and also the place where the performance was given. These were sufficient tests to be applied. Here the club was evidently a high-class club open to any persons who were able to pay a substantial entrance fee and the annual subscription, and care was taken by means of the rule for annual re-election of members to exclude any persons who might be undesirable.

To revert to what took place at the club on March 4, could it be denied that the 50 guests present were members of the public of a class able and willing to pay for the entertainment provided? On the facts one could not answer in the negative the question : Was the owner of the musical copyright in the piece performed injured ? He thought that Mr. Justice Eve had come to a right conclusion on the facts, and on these facts he himself would have come to the same conclusion.

If it were possible to evade the provisions of the Copyright Act, 1911, by such performances as the present a very serious inroad would be made upon an author's property. Though it might be difficult to say whether in the present case an actual loss had been suffered by the author, on the facts there was clearly an infringement of his copyright. The appeal failed and would be dismissed.

Lord Justice Sargant, who said that the case for the plaintiffs was very much stronger than it was in Duck v. Bates (13 Q.B.D., 843), which was a borderline case where the plaintiff only just failed to succeed, and where a dissenting judgment was given, delivered judgment to the same effect, and Lord Justice Lawrence concurred.

K.B. Div. (Rowlatt, J.) 1926. Nov. 4.

MARIE CELESTE SAMARITAN SOCIETY OF THE LONDON HOSPITAL v. COMMISSIONERS OF INLAND REVENUE.*

Revenue — Income-tax — Charity—Bequest of residue—Payment of income by executors before ascertainment of residue—Claim of repayment of income-tax—Income Tax Act, 1918 (8 and 9 Geo. V., c. 40), s. 37 (1) (b).

A testator devised his residuary estate on trust for the appellants, who were a society established for charitable purposes only and were entitled to exemption from income-tax on their income from investments. Pending the completion of the administration the executors paid to the trustees for the appellant society certain sums on account of income. The appellants claimed repayment of income-tax, but the Inland Revenue Commissioners refused repayment so far as related to income received by the executors before the date when the residue was ascertained.

Held, that as the income when it was received was the income only of the executors and the money paid to the charity was only a sum equal to the income payable to the charity as a matter of equitable book-keeping in due course of administration, the appellants were not entitled to the repayment claimed.

The Marie Céleste Samaritan Society of the London Hospital, by way of case stated, appealed against the refusal of the Special Commissioners of Income Tax to exempt from income-tax sums paid to them under the will of the late Mr. James Hora during the administration of the estate of which the Society was the residuary legatee.

The Special Commissioners on March 15, 1926, heard the claim of the Marie Céleste Samaritan Society of the London Hospital (the appellants) for exemption from income-tax under section 37 (1) (b) of the Income Tax Act, 1918 (which provided for the exemption from income-tax of certain income of charities) in respect of certain sums received by them from the residuary estate of the late James Hora.

The late James Hora, the testator, died on August 31, 1917. By his will he (inter alia) gave his wife an annuity for her life of £1,000 and directed his trustees to set apart and invest such a sum of money as would when invested produce that annuity. After making certain other bequests he devised and bequeathed the residue of his estate to his trustees upon trust to sell and convert the same into money and out of the proceeds to pay (inter alia) his funeral and testamentary expenses and the legacies bequeathed by the said will, to set apart the sum directed to be set apart to answer the annuity to his wife, and to stand possessed of the said moneys "upon trust for the Governors of the London Hospital, Whitechapel-road . . . to be held by the said Governors upon trust to invest the same from time to time, to vary the investments thereof, and to stand possessed of the same moneys and the investments thereof, with power upon trust that the income thereof shall be applied towards and for the objects and purposes of the Samaritan Society of the said hospital, now and since the year 1899 called the Marie Céleste Samaritan Society, London Hospital, having been so named in perpetuity by reason of my endowment of the Society in the said year with the interest and dividends amounting to £250 by the year of various securities of the face value of £5,000 but of the marketable value of £6,000 or thereabouts."

The trustees were given full powers to settle all questions which might arise in the management and administration of the estate or any trust property held under the will, and all questions as to the construction of the will, or of any of the clauses thereof, and all other questions whatsoever which might arise in relation to the estate or any trust property, in such manner as they should in their discretion think fit. The testator expressed his desire that so far as possible the residue of his estate should be transferred in the state of investment in which it should be after making the payments and purchases directed by his will, and declared that such transfer should be made by his trustees as soon as reasonably might be, having regard to the due administration of his estate.

The appellants were a society for assisting needy patients of the London Hospital to obtain convalescent home or other treatment after leaving the hospital. The society was independent of the London Hospital, but its work was auxiliary to that of the hospital. It was admitted by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue that the society was established for charitable purposes only, and was entitled to exemption from income-tax in respect of its income from investments.

On the death of the testator, the executors and trustees appointed by the said will took over and administered his estate, and by August 31, 1919 (the date to which the residuary account hereinafter mentioned was made up), had paid or satisfied the legacies bequeathed by the said will and had paid all the debts due at the death of the testator. The executors also out of the general surplus income of the testator's estate paid (inter alia) the annuity to the testator's widow until the investments were made to provide the annuity. Long before August 31, 1919, and indeed at the date of the death it had been certain that the estate was much larger than the amount necessary to pay expenses, debts, and legacies.

During the period of administration of the estate large amounts of income were received by the executors, and after paying all income charges thereout there was a substantial surplus on the executors' income account. Pending the completion of the administration the following sums were, at the request of the Samaritan Society, paid on account out of the surplus income to the Governors of London Hospital as trustees for the society :—£5,000 in December, 1918 ; £1,500 in November, 1919 ; and £3,000 in January, 1920. These payments were shown in the executors' accounts as made on account of income.

In May, 1920, the executors lodged with the estate duty office a corrective affidavit for estate duty on additional assets found to belong to the testator of which the executors had not been previously aware. On this corrective affidavit additional excise duty amounting to £12 16s. 1d. was paid. At the same time the executors also lodged with the estate duty office a residuary account for legacy duty on the residue of the estate, made up as at August 31, 1919—two years after the testator's death.

In the said residuary account debts due from the estate amounting to £1,600 were shown to be outstanding. This sum was made up chiefly of solicitors' and accountants' charges incurred in the course of administration. As no sum of the investments had been specifically set aside by the executors before the date to which the residuary account was made up, in this account a deduction was made of the sum necessary to produce the annuity to the widow.

Between July and October, 1920, certain investments forming part of the testator's estate were sold to meet the legacy duty on the residue, and also to purchase £20,360 National War Bonds to be held by the trustees to produce the annuity to the widow.

The investments forming the residue of the testator's estate were transferred to the Governors between July, 1920, and May, 1921.

The appellants claimed repayment of income-tax in respect of these three payments of £5,000, £1,500, and £3,000, but this claim had been refused by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue so far as it related to income from the trust estate received by the executors up to August 31, 1919, the date of delivery of the residuary account, and the date before which the Commissioners of Inland Revenue contended that the residue had not been ascertained. The appellants being aggrieved by this partial refusal of their claim, applied to have their claim for the period to August 31, 1919, heard and determined.

It was contended on behalf of the appellants :—

(1) That they were entitled to receive only the income of the residue and not the capital, and that any payments made to the society were payments of income.

(2) That this case was distinguishable from that which formed the subject of the decision of the Courts in Dr. Barnardo's Homes v. Special Commissioners of Income Tax (37 The Times L.R., 540 ; [1921] 2 A.C., 1), inasmuch as in that case the charity was entitled to the residue of the estate absolutely.

(3) That the claim of the appellants should be allowed for the whole period from the date of the testator's death.

It was contended on behalf of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue :—

(1) That the residue of the estate was not ascertained earlier than August 31, 1919.

(2) That until the residue of the estate had been ascertained the income was the income of the executors and not that of the appellants or the Governors. The case of Dr. Barnardo's Homes v. Special Commissioners of Income Tax (supra) was quoted in support.

(3) That the claim for repayment of income-tax in respect of the income received up to August 31, 1919, had been properly refused.

The Special Commissioners were of opinion that the income received up to August 31, 1919, was not the income of the appellants or of the Governors, but of the executors, and that no claim for repayment of income-tax was admissible in respect of this income under section 37 (1) (b) of the Income Tax Act, 1918. They accordingly refused the claim.

The question for the decision of the Court was whether the appellants were entitled to claim repayment of income-tax under section 37 (1) (b) of the Income Tax Act, 1918, in respect of the income of the estate which was received up to August 31, 1919.

Mr. F. H. Maugham, K.C., and Mr. Roland Burrows appeared for the appellants ; the Attorney-General (Sir Douglas Hogg, K.C.), and Mr. R. P. Hills appeared for the respondents.

Mr. Justice Rowlatt, in dismissing the appeal, with costs, said that the appeal failed upon a point which might be narrow, but was sufficient—namely, that the income of the assets of this estate, being, he would assume, assets producing income within the category subject to section 37 (1) (b), that income at the time when it was received, and at the time when the tax was deducted and fell into the said category, was the income only of the executors, and that the money paid to the charity was, in the words of Lord Cave, in the Barnardo case (37 The Times L.R., 540 ; [1921] 2 A.C., 1), only "a sum equal to the income" which was payable to the charity as a matter of equitable book-keeping in the due course of administration. That was enough to dispose of the appeal, because it meant that this sum could not be described in the terms of the section.

The Attorney-General had also taken a broader and larger point, by contending that there being an undefined gift of income the effect was a gift of the residue simpliciter, and on that ground that the case was governed by the decision in the Barnardo case (supra). Upon that point his Lordship offered no opinion, and decided the case upon the first-mentioned point.

LOWTHER v. HARRIS.*

Conversion — Mercantile agent—Possession as such—Consent of owner—Wrongful sale by agent—Title of purchaser—Estoppel—Factors Act, 1889 (52 and 53 Vict., c. 45), ss. 1, 2.

The plaintiff was the owner of certain tapestries, known as the Aubusson tapestry and the Leopard tapestry, and he gave to one P., a dealer in antiques, a limited authority to obtain and submit offers from possible purchasers. P. falsely represented to the plaintiff that he could obtain £525 for the Aubusson tapestry, and the plaintiff allowed him to take it away for delivery to a purchaser, who in fact did not exist. P. then sold the Aubusson tapestry to the defendant for £250. Subsequently P., who never had authority to sell the Leopard tapestry, stole it from the plaintiff and sold it to the defendant.

In an action for conversion the defendant contended that P. had been in possession of the tapestries as a mercantile agent within the meaning of the Factors Act, 1889, and that as he had bought them from P. in good faith he had acquired the property in them. He also contended that the plaintiff had held out P. as a person with authority to sell and was therefore estopped from saying that P. had no such authority in fact.

Held, that although P.'s authority was limited, and although he was not acting for any principal other than the plaintiff, yet these facts did not prevent him from being a mercantile agent, and, in the circumstances he was a mercantile agent in possession of the Aubusson tapestry with the consent of the plaintiff, and therefore as to that tapestry the defence under the Factors Act, 1889, was established, but, as to the Leopard tapestry, that as P. was never in possession of it with the plaintiff's consent, the defence under the Act failed, and, as the plaintiff had never represented to the defendant that P. had authority to sell it, there was no estoppel, and therefore the plaintiff was entitled to recover the value of the Leopard tapestry alone.

The plaintiff in this case, Colonel Claude Lowther, the owner of Hurstmonceaux Castle, Sussex, claimed damages from the defendant, Mr. Lionel Harris, for the alleged conversion of certain tapestries or, alternatively, claimed the return of the articles in question and damages for their detention.

Mr. Stuart Bevan, K.C., and Mr. F. van den Berg appeared for the plaintiff; Mr. Greaves-Lord, K.C., and Mr. L. W. J. Costello appeared for the defendant.

The plaintiff, by his statement of claim, alleged that he was the owner of certain tapestries, known as the Leopard tapestry and the Aubusson tapestry, and that the defendant had wrongfully obtained and converted them.

By his defence the defendant put in a general denial, and said that before the alleged detention and conversion of the tapestries one Barton Prior, an antique dealer, was in possession of them as a mercantile agent under the Factors Acts, and that Barton Prior, acting on behalf, and with the consent, of the plaintiff, in August, 1923, sold to him the Aubusson tapestry for £250; and that in January, 1924, he sold to him the Leopard tapestry for £200. He said that both sales took place in the ordinary course of business and that he purchased the tapestries in good faith and without notice of any defect in the title of Barton Prior. He therefore contended that the sales were valid, and that the property in the goods had passed to him.

He further pleaded that by putting Barton Prior in possession of the tapestries and authorizing him to sell them, the plaintiff had held out Barton Prior as his agent for sale and was now estopped from denying that the sales were valid.

Mr. Bevan, in opening the case, said that the defendant was a fine art dealer carrying on business as the Spanish Art Gallery. There were four pieces of tapestry, the subject of this action, three known as the Aubusson, which the plaintiff had bought in 1919 from Mr. Leonard Partridge for £900, and one known as the Leopard, which the plaintiff had bought in 1919 at Christie's for a price which, with commission, amounted to £771. After these tapestries were sold to the defendant he almost at once resold them at a large profit.

The circumstances out of which the matter arose were the following:—In 1922 the plaintiff had a house in Westminster. He had a large quantity of china and furniture. His mother died, and owing to her death he became possessed of a further large quantity. Not needing so much, the plaintiff arranged with an art dealer named Barton Prior, with whom the plaintiff had had other dealings, that he should sell the articles out of the house of the plaintiff's mother on a commission of 10 per cent.

The plaintiff and Prior then discussed further business. The plaintiff had been a member of a company trading in old furniture, and as that company had been wound up the plaintiff had come into possession of a further quantity of furniture. In order to store it he took another house at Palace-street, Westminster, and into that house he put all the furniture which he wished to get rid of. He arranged with Barton Prior that Prior should bring any likely customers to see the furniture. Prior had only authority to obtain and submit offers; he had no authority to sell, and he was forbidden to remove any article from the premises. Afterwards, as the plaintiff was often away, it was arranged that in small transactions offers of less than £100 could be approved by the plaintiff's secretary in the plaintiff's absence. For some time things went well. In the autumn of 1923 Prior told the plaintiff that an offer of £525 had been made by one Woodall for the Aubusson tapestry. The plaintiff thought the offer was too small, but as Prior represented that if it was accepted it would probably lead to other transactions, the plaintiff finally agreed to the sale. In August, 1924, the plaintiff's secretary became uneasy about Barton Prior. A cheque had been dishonoured, and the plaintiff called for an explanation. It was then discovered that Prior had removed the Leopard tapestry without permission, and the supposed purchaser of the Aubusson tapestry was fictitious.

With regard to the law, Mr. Bevan referred to the Factors Act, 1889, and submitted that Barton Prior was not a mercantile agent within the meaning of section 1 of the Act because he had no authority to sell. His only authority was to obtain and submit offers. The Leopard tapestry was never in possession of Barton Prior; it was always in the possession of the plaintiff. Prior had only possession of the Aubusson tapestry for a particular purpose—namely, for delivery to Woodall, a supposed purchaser, who, in fact, did not exist. Barton Prior had been prosecuted at the Old Bailey and had been convicted of fraud, being sentenced to 18 months' imprisonment.

Colonel Lowther, called by Mr. Bevan, gave evidence in support of the opening statement. When he took the house in Palace-street he filled it with articles which he wished to sell. The value of the articles would be about £18,000 to £20,000. The price to be asked for each article was put down in a book. Prior was to get offers, but was not to let anything go out of the house without witness's written permission. He allowed Prior to live on the top floor of the house.

Cross-examined by Mr. GREAVES-LORD, he said that he had had dealings with the Spanish Art Gallery for about 30 years and had never heard anything against them. Personally, he had always found them behave very well. The house in Palace-street was taken in the name of his secretary. Cheques for goods sold by Prior were not paid direct to the witness, but it was not true that the whole business was run by Prior.

Mr. Urwin, secretary to Colonel Lowther, gave evidence as to the manner in which sales of Colonel Lowther's articles were effected.

Cross-examined, he said that when Prior sold anything the cheques were almost always made payable to Prior. Sales were sometimes made by Colonel Lowther under the style of the Buckingham Art Gallery, but he was not registered by that title under the Registration of Business Names Act, 1916. So far as the outside public was concerned it might appear that the business was that of Prior alone, but that was not their intention. If a customer offered the price which Colonel Lowther had fixed for any particular article, Prior could make a sale which would bind Colonel Lowther, but the customer could not have delivery without paying cash unless Colonel Lowther agreed to give credit. Prior had a telephone put into the house at Palace-street on his own account and in his own name. He (the witness) knew about it, but did not interfere.

Police evidence was then given relating to Prior's dealings with the tapestries, and expert evidence was given as to their value.

Mr. GREAVES-LORD called Morris Harris, son of the defendant, who said that he had been associated with his father in the business for about seven years. In 1923 a man named William Prior called on them with a van containing articles which he wished to sell. Before buying he (the witness) made inquiries about Prior, and on getting a satisfactory reference he bought some small things. About July, 1923, Prior saw him again and offered the Aubusson tapestry for sale. He recognized the tapestry and remarked that he thought it belonged to Colonel Lowther. The answer was given that it did and that Colonel Lowther was anxious to sell it. Prior said that the offer of £250 which was made could not be accepted, and he then took the tapestry away.

In August he brought it back and said that the offer could now be accepted. He (the witness) telegraphed to his father, who was in Switzerland at the time, and on receiving his reply paid £250 and got a receipt. That receipt was signed "Barton Prior." Later on he sold the tapestry, with other articles, to a New York dealer, a Mr. Simons, who was then in London. The price for which he sold it was £350.

In January, 1924, the same man brought the Leopard tapestry and offered it for sale. His (the witness's) father was then present and offered £200 for it. Prior accepted the price and Mr. Harris, senior, paid with a cheque for £200. Subsequently, in March, 1924, they sold the Leopard tapestry with other tapestries to Cardinal and Harford. In October, 1924, a detective called on him (the witness) and made inquiries.

In January, 1925, the detective called on him again with Mr. Urwin, and in the result he gave evidence on the prosecution of Barton Prior at the Old Bailey. From first to last he had no idea that there was anything wrong with that transaction.

Lionel Harris, the defendant in the action, called by Mr. GREAVES-LORD, said that he had carried on business for nearly 40 years—in Conduit-street for 30 years. There was nothing unusual in a man's calling with a van and trying to sell him things. Small dealers selling on commission constantly did so.

Cross-examined by Mr. BEVAN.—He recognized the Aubusson tapestry as a thing which had belonged to Colonel Lowther. If that had been the first time that Prior had offered things to him he might have inquired of Colonel Lowther what Prior's authority was. In fact, he remembered very little of what he said to Prior, who stated that he was trying to sell the tapestry for Colonel Lowther. That gave him confidence, and he thought that Prior was doing a job on commission.

Mr. GREAVES-LORD then addressed the Court on the law. Dealing with the estoppel point first, he said that if one put goods in the hands of a commission agent for sale and the agent sold them, one could not subsequently repudiate his authority.

He referred to Cole v. North Western Bank (L.R. 10 C.P., 354); Turner v. Sampson (27 The Times L.R., 200); Weiner v. Harris (26 The Times L.R., 96; [1910] 1 K.B., 285); Oppenheimer v. Attenborough (24 The Times L.R., 115; [1908] 1 K.B., 221); Hastings, Limited v. Pearson (9 The Times L.R., 18; [1893] 1 Q.B., 62); Heyman v. Flewker (13 C.B., N.S., 519). Barton Prior was clearly a mercantile agent within the meaning of the Act; he was employed to sell on commission; the goods were kept in a house in which he was allowed to exercise dominion; and he had power to do everything to make effective contracts of sale. Possession of goods under the Act did not mean exclusive possession. As to the presumption of consent, he referred to Moody v. Pall Mall Deposit and Forwarding Company (33 The Times L.R., 306); Folkes v. King (39 The Times L.R., 77; [1923] 1 K.B., 282); and Lake v. Simmons (42 The Times L.R., 425; [1926] 2 K.B., 51).

Further, with reference to the estoppel point, there was nothing to indicate to the public that Colonel Lowther was carrying on business at all. He was not registered under the Registration of Business Names Act, 1916; he did not deal directly with the customers; and his name did not appear on the receipts or other documents. Cheques were paid to Barton Prior, and receipts were given in his own name. To allow receipts to be given by an agent was clearly a holding out of the agent as a person authorized to sell.

Mr. BEVAN contended that the point under the Factors Act, 1889, was the more difficult point. With regard to both the sales he submitted that the case was not within the Act at all. Barton Prior was not a mercantile agent, and was not in possession with the consent of the true owner. A mercantile agent was a person who carried on business away from his principal; but here Prior's duties were purely domestic and, like those of a shopman, could only be carried on on the premises of his principal. A mercantile agent was not a servant (Lamb v. Attenborough, 31 L.J. Q.B., 41).

On the question of possession, the Leopard tapestry was never in Prior's possession. The possession of the other tapestry was obtained by fraud; it was a case of larceny by a trick, and there was no real possession by Prior.

As to estoppel, the defendant never knew that the Leopard tapestry belonged to the plaintiff, and Prior was dealt with as a principal.

The plaintiff put forward no suggestion of bad faith by the defendant.

Mr. Justice Wright delivered the following considered judgment.—This is an action brought by the plaintiff, Colonel Claude Lowther, to recover damages from the defendant, Lionel Harris, carrying on business as an art dealer under the name of the Spanish Art Gallery. The claim is pleaded in the alternative as for detinue or conversion, but the plaintiff's counsel elected to proceed as for conversion. The subject-matter consisted of two pieces of tapestry, one consisting of three panels, described as the Aubusson tapestry, and the other a single piece, described as the Leopard tapestry (also as a hunting scene). The defendant relied on the Factors Act, 1889, or, in the alternative, on estoppel at common law. The circumstances in regard to the two pieces were in some respects different.

Colonel Lowther early in 1923 had a large quantity of valuable furniture and antiques for disposal. He had as secretary a Mr. Urwin. In March, 1923, he went into an antique shop in Ebury-street where one Barton Prior dealt in antiques in a small way, principally glass and china. The plaintiff made some purchases, and after some conversations came to an arrangement with Barton Prior that Prior should act as his agent for the disposal of the furniture and antiques. Among the articles so to be dealt with were the Aubusson tapestry, which had been bought in 1919 for £900, and the Leopard tapestry, which about the same time had cost £771. The plaintiff took a house, 10, Palace-street, a few minutes' distant from Prior's shops in Ebury-street, and there the plaintiff's furniture and antiques were stored. Mr. Urwin was the lessee, but this was in his capacity as agent for the plaintiff, and he had an office on the first floor. Prior was allowed to live in a flat on the top floor and to use as a sitting room a room on the floor below. He retained his business in Ebury-street, where he had two shops at Nos. 5 and 9, and his business was registered under the Registration of Business Names Act, 1916, as "Period." Towards the end of 1923 he also had a telephone address at 10, Palace-street, under the name "Period," with an extension to Ebury-street, but that was a private telephone of his own. Customers used to come to his shops in Ebury-street and he used to bring them round to see the furniture on view as for sale at 10, Palace-street, and in most, if not all, cases customers were not told that the furniture was the property of the plaintiff, or that Prior was merely selling on the plaintiff's behalf. He was left to make out invoices for goods sold as for "Period," 5 and 9, Ebury-street, and he collected the price by cheques made out to himself; he accounted to the plaintiff by paying cash, at least during the time material to this case. As between the plaintiff and Prior, the plaintiff's authority was strictly limited. The books were kept by Mr. Urwin, who was in the office at 10, Palace-street, during business hours. Prior had no authority to complete a sale or make a delivery without first getting the sanction of the plaintiff, whom he used to see about four times a week, or, if the articles were of less value than £100, the sanction of Mr. Urwin. Prior had no authority to remove any goods from 10, Palace-street, without such sanction. Trouble began about the middle of 1924, or a little earlier in that year, between Prior and the plaintiff, who complained that money for goods sold was not coming in properly. Alterations in procedure were discussed, and in August, 1924, heads of agreement for the protection of the plaintiff as against Prior were signed. A little later, in October, 1924, it was discovered that various articles of value had been disposed of by Prior. He was arrested and was tried and convicted of larceny at the Old Bailey. As a result of what was discovered by the plaintiff, this action was brought in respect of two of the articles which Prior had dishonestly made away with.

I find the following facts with reference to the Aubusson tapestry. Prior falsely pretended to the plaintiff about August, 1923, that he was able to sell this tapestry to one Corbel Woodall for £525; the plaintiff, after protesting that the price was too small, agreed to the sale on the representation that Woodall was a valuable customer. After this consent, given in the presence of Mr. Urwin, the latter permitted Prior to remove the tapestry in order to make delivery and complete the sale as authorized by the plaintiff. This happened in August, 1923. I think the entry in the plaintiff's book as of December, 1923, was direct bad bookkeeping. In fact, Prior had not sold the tapestry to Woodall at all, and his story was a mere fiction in order to enable him to get possession of the tapestry, as he did, with the intention of disposing of it in fraud of the plaintiff. Having thus got the tapestry, he sent it in a van or cart by means of his brother, William Prior, who was merely acting on his instructions, to the defendant's place of business and offered it for sale. The tapestry had actually been offered to the defendant about a month before in the same way for £300. The defendant had had some small dealings with Prior a little previously, and offered £250 for the tapestry. The defendant and his son recognized the tapestry as having been offered by the plaintiff at Christie's in the preceding March, and on inquiry were told by William Prior that it was being sold on behalf of the plaintiff. They knew nothing of Barton Prior's general connexion with the plaintiff or of the premises at 10, Palace-street. They dealt with Prior as a commission agent carrying on business under the name of "Period," at 5 and 9, Ebury-street, and when the price was agreed at £250 they gave their cheque for that sum to Barton Prior, obtaining a receipt signed B. Prior on paper headed "Period, 5 and 9, Ebury-street," and took the tapestry. A few days later they sold it to Simons, of New York, for £350, which I find to be its true value at that time. In January, 1924, the same man, W. Prior, came again with the other piece of tapestry, the Leopard tapestry, on a van and offered it for sale. The defendant bought it for £200, paid a cheque in favour of B. Prior, and took a receipt headed "Period, 5 and 9, Ebury-street," and signed by William Prior for Barton Prior. The defendant did not know or question whether Prior was selling for himself or for a principal, nor had he any knowledge that the tapestry was the property of the plaintiff. In fact, Prior had simply stolen the tapestry from 10, Palace-street, without the knowledge or consent of the plaintiff or Mr. Urwin, who thought that it was still lying folded upon a shelf. It was not till October, 1924, that the theft was discovered along with the other frauds. The defendant sold the tapestry to Cardinal and Harford almost at once for £300, less commission. I place its value at that date at £270. No suggestion is made that the defendant acted otherwise than in good faith. I find that it was in the usual course of business in fine art dealings for a dealer, whether acting for himself or as agent for a principal, to bring for sale to other dealers articles which, if sufficiently bulky, would be carried in a van or motor-car.

Unless the defendant has a defence under the Factors Act, 1889, or on the ground of common law estoppel, it is clear that he is liable in damages for conversion, which damages, if recoverable by the plaintiff, I fix at £350 in the case of the Aubusson tapestry, and at £270 in the case of the Leopard tapestry. The circumstances relating to the two pieces of tapestry are different and require separate consideration. I shall first deal with the Aubusson tapestry, and shall first consider the defence based on the Factors Act, 1889, in order to ascertain if the conditions of the Act are fulfilled. The first question is whether Prior was a mercantile agent—that is, an agent doing a business in buying or selling, or both, having in the customary course of his business as such authority to sell goods. Various objections have been raised. It was contended that Prior was a mere servant or shopman, and had no independent status such as is essential to constitute a mercantile agent. It was held under the earlier Acts that the agent must not be a mere servant or shopman (Cole v. North Western Bank, L.R. 10 C.P., 354, at p. 372 ; Lamb v. Attenborough, 1 B. and S., 831 ; Heyman v. Flewker, 13 C.B. N.S., 519). I think this is still law under the present Act. In my opinion B. Prior, who had his own shops, and who gave receipts and took cheques in his own registered business name and earned commissions, was not a mere servant but an agent, even though his discretionary authority was limited. It is also contended that even if he were an agent he was acting as such for one principal only, the plaintiff, and that the Factors Act, 1889, requires a general occupation as agent. This, I think, is erroneous. The contrary was decided under the old Acts in Heyman v. Flewker (supra), and I think the same is the law under the present Act. In Weiner v. Harris (26 The Times L.R., 96 ; [1910] 1 K.B., 285) it appears that the agent was not acting for any other principal than the plaintiff, and this was so also in Hastings, Limited v. Pearson (9 The Times L.R., 18 ; [1893] 1 Q.B., 62), in respect of which case the Court of Appeal, in Weiner v. Harris (supra), held that the agent was a mercantile agent. It is also clear that pictures, as objects of purchase and sale, constitute those who deal in them on commission mercantile agents within the Factors Acts (see under the old Act Heyman v. Flewker (supra) and under the present Act Turner v. Sampson, 27 The Times L.R., 200).

The next question is whether Prior was in possession of the Aubusson tapestry, and, if so, with the consent of the plaintiff, and, if he had such possession, whether it was in his capacity as mercantile agent. I add the last consideration because I think that, just as such a condition was imported in the old Factors Acts (see Cole v. North Western Bank (supra) and cases there cited), the same condition must be satisfied under the Factors Act of 1889. Mr. Greaves-Lord contended that the tapestry, while lying at 10, Palace-street, was in the possession of Prior, relying on the facts that Prior had the use for residence of the top floor and the sitting room below, and further that he had disposing control over the goods in the house. As to Prior's residence in the house, I hold that the furniture in it, including the tapestry, was in the possession of the plaintiff, because Mr. Urwin, who was the lessee and occupier of the house, and who was in attendance during business hours, was merely a servant of the plaintiff, so that his possession was the plaintiff's possession. I adopt the language of Pollock and Wright on Possession, page 38 : "It will hardly be denied that a man is in possession in fact, as well as possession in law, of his own goods in the house which he occupies whether he be in the room at a given moment, or even in the house or not." The plaintiff did all in his power to exclude any unauthorized dealing with the goods by Prior while they were in the house. As to Prior's use of the top floor and sitting room, I think Prior was merely in the position of a licensee, and perhaps caretaker, but never in possession of the plaintiff's goods in 10, Palace-street. Mr. Greaves-Lord also contended that Prior had possession of the goods because he was in a position to dispose of them by a sale enforceable by specific performance. Assuming that he was able to do so, though I find that he was forbidden to sell without specific authority, possession would not thereby be established, any more than if the goods had been in an independent warehouse. But I do hold that Prior became in possession of the Aubusson tapestry when he was allowed to take it away in the van after the plaintiff had sanctioned a sale to Woodall. It is true that no such sale had in fact been made or was intended to be made, and that the possession was obtained by the fraud of Prior. Possession, however, was in fact obtained by Prior, and obtained by him in his capacity as mercantile agent. Mr. Bevan contended that Prior obtained the tapestry under colour of an actually completed sale, and merely for purpose of delivery and as a sort of carrier between vendor and vendee. I think that is erroneous. Prior's functions as a mercantile agent were not completed even if a bargain had been concluded, but extended to the delivery of the goods, the collecting of the price, and the giving of a receipt and a subsequent accounting to the plaintiff. Delivery of possession to Prior was a necessary step to enable him to complete his office. The same point was raised under the old Acts in Baines v. Swainson (4 B. and S., 270) and in Vickers v. Hertz (L.R. 2 H.L. Sc., 113), referred to in Cole v. North Western Bank (supra, at page 374), in which case it was held that possession given to the agent in similar circumstances was possession given to him in his capacity as a mercantile agent. I think that is still the law. But it must further be determined if the possession was obtained with the consent of the plaintiff. It is not necessary here to rely on the presumption expressed in section 2 (4) of the Factors Act, 1889, because I hold that the plaintiff did consent to the possession. It is true that the consent was obtained by fraud, and that in any event the plaintiff's sanction to Prior's selling was limited to a selling at a definite price and to a definite purchaser, and, accordingly, Mr. Bevan relied on certain observations of Mr. Justice Wills in Biggs v. Evans (10 The Times L.R., 59 ; [1894] 1 Q.B., 88), stated to be to the effect that there was no intrusting for sale within the old Factors Acts because the principal gave only a partial or limited authority to sell. If that were the effect of that judgment, it would seem inconsistent with the principles laid down in the cases relating to the old Factors Acts and would clearly be contrary to the language and purpose of the Factors Act, 1889, and to the cases decided under it. But it is said that there was no consent in law because Prior obtained the tapestry in circumstances which rendered him guilty of larceny by a trick. I do not think he was guilty of that offence. When Prior obtained possession of the tapestry, the plaintiff intended not merely to part with possession but also to confer a power to pass the property ; it is clear that in such a case the misappropriation is either larceny by a bailee or obtaining goods by false pretences on the principles explained in Whitehorn Bros. v. Davison ([1911] 1 K.B., 463) and Folkes v. King (39 The Times L.R., 77 ; [1923] 1 K.B., 282). But a fraud of that character, such as not to amount to larceny by a trick, does not vitiate the consent of the owner to the agent's possession. Whether even larceny by a trick can, consistently with the policy and purpose of the Factors Act, 1889, which was passed to protect innocent purchasers for value, be held to vitiate consent in fact given and intended by the principal, remains the subject of two conflicting decisions of the Court of Appeal—namely, Oppenheimer v. Frazer (23 The Times L.R., 410; [1907] 2 K.B., 50) and Folkes v. King (supra). I do not, on my view of the facts, consider that the particular question arises in this case.

I accordingly hold that Prior obtained possession of the Aubusson tapestry in his capacity as a mercantile agent and with the consent of the plaintiff; having such possession, he made (as I have found above), in the ordinary course of business of a mercantile agent, a sale to the defendant, who, it is not contested, acted in good faith and with no notice of Prior's want of authority. I hold that the defendant establishes his defence as regards the Aubusson tapestry under the Factors Act, 1889. This conclusion renders it unnecessary to discuss the plea based on estoppel at common law. I merely observe that on the facts established the defendant had no notice of the actual relations between the plaintiff and Prior, or how as between them business was conducted, and knew nothing except that the tapestry belonged to the plaintiff, and that Prior, whom the defendant regarded as a commission dealer, stated that he was selling it on behalf of the plaintiff.

I now deal with the Leopard tapestry, which raises different considerations. In my judgment, the defendant here fails in his defence under the Factors Act, 1889, because Prior never had possession of the tapestry with the consent of the plaintiff, and hence the conditions of the Factors Act, 1889, were never fulfilled. I have held that, while the tapestry was at 10, Palace-street, it was not in the possession of Prior but of the plaintiff. The plaintiff never in fact parted with that possession. Prior simply stole the tapestry in January, 1924. It was not till October, 1924, that the plaintiff, or Mr. Urwin, discovered that it had been taken, and it was that discovery which led to Prior's arrest the same night. Similar reasons show, in my opinion, that no estoppel at common law can be established. The defendant, in purchasing the Leopard tapestry, did not know or consider whether he was buying from Prior as an agent or as a principal, or whether the tapestry belonged to Prior or not, and, if not, to whom it did belong. Such considerations, which would be immaterial under the Factors Act, 1889, are vital in regard to a plea of estoppel. Such a plea involves a representation, express or implied, by words or conduct, by the principal, becoming in ordinary course known to and being relied on by the purchaser, that whereas the goods belong to the principal they are being sold on his behalf and by his authority. But the defendant, far from knowing of or acting on any such representation on the part of the plaintiff, did not even know or consider that the tapestry belonged to the plaintiff. Nor did the plaintiff by his conduct do anything to represent, expressly or impliedly, to the defendant that Prior was authorized to sell on his behalf; such a contention might in some cases be put forward where a principal has entrusted for sale, even though under limitations, an article to a person who carries on a general business as a commission agent. But the plaintiff never so entrusted, or entrusted at all, the Leopard tapestry to Prior, who in fact simply took it dishonestly by stealth. It may be that the theft was facilitated because Prior had free access to 10, Palace-street, but that fact is, in my opinion, immaterial.

The plaintiff is therefore entitled to recover in respect of the Leopard tapestry, the damages being £270.

K.B. Div. (Wright, J.) 1926. Nov. 5.

BANK OF LIVERPOOL AND MARTINS, LIMITED v. HOLLAND.*

Assignment—Chose in action—Debt—Amount recoverable expressed to be less than debt—Whether absolute assignment of the whole—Law of Property Act, 1925 (15 Geo. V., c. 20), s. 136.

The defendant owed £285 to one W., who owed money to the plaintiff bank, and W. assigned to the bank the debt owed to him by the defendant. The assignment, which was in writing, provided that "the amount recoverable under these presents shall not at any time exceed the sum of £150." Due notice of the assignment was given to the defendant. In an action upon the assignment,

Held, that the assignment was not an assignment of part only of the debt, but an absolute assignment of the whole debt with a proviso that if the bank recovered more than £150 they must hold the balance as trustees for the assignor, and it was therefore a good legal assignment, and that even if it was an assignment of part only of the debt it would still be a good equitable assignment, and the plaintiffs were entitled to recover.

The plaintiffs in this case claimed as assignees a sum of money due under an agreement made between the defendant and one Wilkinson.

Mr. van den Berg appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. C. P. Harvey (Mr. W. T. Monckton with him) for the defendant.

By an agreement in writing made on November 5, 1925, Wilkinson sold his business to the defendant Holland. It was agreed that £65 should be paid at once, and that completion should take place on or before November 23, 1925. Completion did not take place by that date, but Holland paid sums on account from time to time, and at the date material to this case he had paid in all £365, leaving £285 still owing. Wilkinson had an overdraft with the plaintiff bank, and by way of security and to avoid legal proceedings by the bank to enforce payment of the overdraft he gave the bank an assignment of the £285 then due to him from Holland. The bank now sued upon the assignment.

The material parts of the document were as follow:—

"This assignment is made the twenty fourth day of June one thousand nine hundred and twenty six between William Robert Wilkinson of . . . (hereinafter called the mortgagor) of the one part and the Bank of Liverpool and Martins, Limited . . . (hereinafter called the bank) of the other part. Whereas the mortgagor recently sold his business . . . to Henry

* Reported by W. B. Thompson, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Holland of . . . and there is now owing to the mortgagor by the said Henry Holland the sum of two hundred and eighty five pounds in respect of such sale and Whereas the mortgagor is indebted to the bank in a sum of £100 or thereabouts and the bank have requested payment thereof and the mortgagor has agreed to give such security therefor as hereinafter appearing Now This Deed Witnesseth that in consideration of . . . the forbearance of the bank to take immediately proceedings for the recovery of the said amount due by the mortgagor to the bank the mortgagor as beneficial owner doth hereby assign unto the bank All That the debt or sum of £285 due as aforesaid by the said Henry Holland to the mortgagor . . . to hold the same unto the bank absolutely . . . And it is hereby agreed and declared that the amount recoverable under these presents shall not at any time exceed the sum of one hundred and fifty pounds. . . ."

The proceedings began by a claim under Order XIV., and the defendant obtained leave to defend on the grounds (i.) that there was a pre-existing oral agreement between Wilkinson and the defendant, and that the written agreement of November 5, 1925, did not express the real intention of the parties ; and (ii.) that the assignment in any case was not an absolute assignment within section 136 of the Law of Property Act, 1925 (which has taken the place of section 25 (6) of the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1873).

Due notice of the assignment had been given to the defendant.

Mr. VAN DEN BERG submitted that the assignment was good as a legal assignment, but, if it was not, then at least it was a good equitable assignment. He referred to Brandt's Sons and Co. v. Dunlop Rubber Company (21 The Times L.R., 710 ; [1905] A.C., 454) ; Hughes v. Pump House Hotel Company (18 The Times L.R., 654 ; [1902] 2 K.B., 190) ; In re Steel Wing Company ([1921] 1 Ch., 349).

If the assignment was only good as an equitable and not as a legal assignment, it might be necessary to join Wilkinson as a co-plaintiff, and he had the consent of Wilkinson if that was required.

Mr. HARVEY said that the real agreement between Wilkinson and the defendant was that the balance of the purchase money for the business was only to become payable as and when the defendant should receive money that was coming to him under the will of a relative who had died in Canada. He tendered evidence to that effect, but his LORDSHIP ruled that, as it purported to vary the written document, it was inadmissible unless the defendant applied for leave to rectify the document. Mr. Harvey did not apply for rectification. He referred to Durham Brothers v. Robertson ([1898] 1 Q.B., 765).

MR. JUSTICE WRIGHT stated the facts and said that he had to determine whether the assignment was a good legal assignment. Without the last paragraph (set out above) of the assignment the case would have been covered by Hughes v. Pump House Hotel Company (18 The Times L.R., 654 ; [1902] 2 K.B., 190). It was essential that an assignment must transfer the whole debt so that the debtor could know once for all whom he had to pay, and should not be liable to different actions and different executions by assignees of different parts of his debt. The question here was really what was the effect of the word "recoverable" in the proviso that the amount recoverable should not exceed £150. Mr. Harvey contended that its effect was to reduce the assignment to one of part only of the debt, and that therefore the assignment was bad. As to that, he would hold, following In re Steel Wing Company ([1921] 1 Ch., 349), that even if it was an assignment of only part of the debt it would still be a good equitable assignment. But was it an assignment of only part of the debt ? In his view it was not an assignment of part of the debt, but was an absolute assignment to the bank of the whole debt, with a proviso that if the bank should recover more than £150 from the debtor they must hold the balance in excess of £150 as trustees for Wilkinson. The fact that a creditor remained trustee of part of the debt did not make the assignment any the less absolute. Comfort v. Betts (7 The Times L.R., 475 ; [1891] 1 Q.B., 737). The assignment, therefore, was a good legal assignment, and there must be judgment for the plaintiffs.

LAUBACH v. COOPTIMISTS' ENTERTAINMENT SYNDICATE, LIMITED, AND ANOTHER.*

Master and Servant—Negligence—Doctrine of common employment—Accident to servant—No finding of negligence by employers—Finding of negligence by another servant of employers—Supply of appliances.

The plaintiff, a member of the orchestra at a theatre, sued his employers for damages for injuries suffered by him by reason of a club supplied by the employers to a performer slipping from the performer's hand during a performance and striking the plaintiff. The jury (inter alia) found (1) that the employers were not guilty of negligence in supplying the club, (2) that the employers' stage-manager was guilty of negligence, and (3) that the employers were not negligent in employing the stage-manager.

Held, on these findings, that the fact of the stage-manager's negligence being in respect of the supply of appliances did not in the circumstances exclude the application of the doctrine of common employment, and the defendant employers were not liable to the plaintiff.

This was a further argument on the findings of the jury after a trial before Mr. Justice Finlay and a common jury.

The action was brought by the plaintiff, Mr. Sydney Laubach, who was a professional 'cellist and a member of the orchestra at His Majesty's Theatre, against the Cooptimists' Entertainment Syndicate, Limited, and Miss Betty Chester, to recover damages for an injury which he said he had suffered on October 21, 1925, owing to a club, used by Miss Chester during a performance at His Majesty's Theatre, slipping from her hand and striking him.

It appeared that the second defendant, Miss Betty Chester, had previously complained to the stage-manager, Mr. Brightman, about the weight of the club.

After the hearing, the jury answered the questions which had been left to them as follows :—

(1) Was the defendant syndicate negligent in supplying the club ?—No.

(2) Was Mr. Brightman guilty of negligence ?—Yes.

(3) Was the defendant syndicate guilty of negligence in appointing Mr. Brightman to do the work that he was employed to do ?—No.

(4) Was Miss Betty Chester guilty of negligence ?—Yes.

(5) What damages, if any ?—£30.

Mr. J. B. Melville appeared for the plaintiff ; Mr. Doughty, K.C., and Mr. Ronald Ross for the first defendants, the Cooptimists' Entertainment Syndicate, Limited ; and Mr. H. M. Giveen for the second defendant, Miss Betty Chester.

Mr. Doughty, for the defendant syndicate, submitted that on the answers of the jury the defendant syndicate was entitled to judgment.

Mr. Melville, for the plaintiff, contended that if Mr. Brightman was guilty of negligence, it was negligence in respect of the supply of appliances, and that such negligence was the negligence of his employers, the defendant syndicate. He referred to Toronto Power Company v. Paskwan ([1915] A.C., 734), and contended that that decision was not put on the ground of a breach of statutory duty.

Mr. Justice Finlay.—The jury have found that there was no negligence on the part of the defendant syndicate either in appointing Mr. Brightman or in supplying the apparatus. The only negligence was the negligence of Mr. Brightman. You say that, if any employee is negligent in respect of the supply of plant or anything of that sort, his employers become ipso facto responsible.

Mr. Melville.—Yes ; the employers cannot escape liability by saying that they have appointed some one else to supply the plant. In the event of the employers' not personally superintending and directing the work, it is their duty to select a proper and competent person to do so, and to furnish him with adequate materials and resources for the work. The Cooptimists' Entertainment Syndicate is liable for the negligence of Mr. Brightman in this case. Counsel referred to Wilson v. Merry (L.R., 1 H.L. Sc., 326) ; Williams v. Birmingham Battery and Metal Company (15 The Times L.R., 468 ; [1899] 2 Q.B., 338).

Mr. Giveen, for the second defendant, Miss Chester, supported Mr. Melville's argument, and said that, though there was a class of cases where a breach of a statutory duty had been held not to be excused by the doctrine of common employment, the Toronto Power Company case (supra) did not turn on the question of the statute, and if the law was as stated in that case there was a primary duty on the master to provide proper appliances and plant, and he could not get rid of that primary duty by delegating it to some one else. The employer was under a duty to provide proper material, and the finding of the jury in this case must mean that the person to whom that duty was delegated failed to fulfil that duty, and that the plant provided was not fit.

Mr. Justice Finlay.—What do you say, Mr. Doughty, about Toronto Power Company v. Paskwan (supra), with regard to laying down the principle that the master has to provide proper plant and can delegate that duty if he likes, but that he delegates it at the risk of the failure of his delegate to fulfil the duty, with the result that the master is responsible ?

Mr. Doughty said that the questions as framed and left to the jury raised the same point as that raised in the Toronto Power Company case (supra), which dealt with Wilson v. Merry (supra), and he then referred to Cribb v. Kynoch, Limited (23 The Times L.R., 550 ; [1907] 2 K.B., 548), Young v. Hofmann Manufacturing Company, Limited (23 The Times L.R., 671 ; [1907] 2 K.B., 646), and Henson v. Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company (20 W.R., 297). According to the judgment in the Toronto Power Company case (supra) there were cases where an employer who had knowledge of a want of machinery could not delegate the duty of supplying machinery to some one else, but it was always a question of fact for the jury whether he could or could not delegate. Counsel contended that it was a question of fact for the jury in this case to say whether it was a reasonable thing to have left this matter to the employee.

Mr. Justice Finlay.—I have come to the conclusion that on these findings in this particular case it is my duty to enter judgment in favour of the defendants, the Cooptimists' Entertainment Syndicate, Limited. Although the amount involved is very small, no doubt the question raised is one of some importance, and I desire to say, without attempting any review of the authorities, why I am entering judgment in the way that I do. The jury have found that the defendant syndicate was not guilty of any negligence in supplying these clubs, and they have also found that Mr. Brightman, the defendant syndicate's stage-manager, was guilty of negligence, and that the defendant syndicate was not guilty of negligence in employing Mr. Brightman to do the work that he was doing. Upon that it is said by Mr. Doughty that in view of the decision in Wilson v. Merry (L.R., 1 H.L. Sc., 326) he is entitled to judgment. It is said by Mr. Melville that that is not so, and that the later authorities, particularly the Toronto Power Company case ([1915] A.C., 734), go to show that where the matter is a matter of supplying plant, then the master cannot relieve himself of responsibility merely by delegating it to a person who is incompetent for the task. My impression is that it is to some extent a question of degree. I think there may be cases, as, for instance, in the fitting up of a mine or a great factory, where it would be correct to arrive at the same conclusion as in the Toronto Power case (supra). But it is necessary to consider what this case is. This is a case of the ordinary running of a theatre. It is merely the case of the supplying of the articles which have led to an unfortunate accident, and it seems to me that it would be doing violence to common sense to say that there is a rule of law which requires that one should say that an employer not guilty of any negligence himself is nevertheless to be held liable because he was bound to supply plant. I do not think that there is a rule established to the extent which Mr. Melville suggests. In my opinion the substance of the view of the jury was that Mr. Brightman was negligent and that no one else was negligent, even in his appointment. I am of opinion that the truth of the matter is that there was negligence by Mr. Brightman, who was an employee of the syndicate. I think, therefore, that the syndicate is entitled to judgment. There will be judgment for the plaintiff against Miss Betty Chester with costs, and there will be judgment for the syndicate with costs against the plaintiff.

Mr. Melville asked that the costs payable by the plaintiff to the defendant syndicate should be added to the costs payable by Miss Betty Chester to the plaintiff.

After some discussion, Mr. Justice Finlay refused to make any special order with regard to the costs.

In the result judgment was entered for the plaintiff against Miss Betty Chester for £30, with such costs as that amount carried (namely, costs on the County Court scale), and judgment was entered for the defendant syndicate against the plaintiff, with costs.

RICHARDSON v. MONCRIEFFE.*

Gaming—Chemin-de-fer—Losses—Payment by cheque to croupier or banker—Action on cheque.

The plaintiff and other players of chemin-de-fer took it in turn to be croupier or banker. The defendant, who was one of the players, bought counters to stake, and at the end of the game, having lost £500, he gave a cheque for that amount to the plaintiff in payment of what he had lost to the plaintiff and/or other persons. In an action on the cheque,

Held, that a payment to a winner at gaming, or to a person who accepted payment for winners, in the form of a cheque, was void and unenforceable, and the action failed.

This was an action in which Mr. Henry Thomas Richardson, a commission agent, of 90, Charing Cross-road, W.C., claimed £500 from Mr. J. A. Moncrieffe, who was stated to have been an officer in the Guards, and whose address appeared on the writ as "care of" a firm of wine-merchants in St. Martin's-place, W.C.2, as drawer of a cheque for that sum payable to the plaintiff, the cheque having been dishonoured on presentation. Alternatively, the plaintiff claimed damages for alleged breach of a contract by the defendant to pay into his bank sufficient money to meet the cheque in consideration of the plaintiff's postponing presentation of it.

The defendant pleaded that there was no consideration for the cheque, and that it was drawn for a void or illegal consideration. He said that the plaintiff carried on the business of a betting house, and that the cheque was given to the plaintiff on December 23, 1925, for losses at chemin-de-fer, which the plaintiff conducted or at which he acted as croupier.

It was stated that the plaintiff had cashed the cheque for the defendant at the conclusion of the game.

Mr. Cope Morgan and Mr. G. O. Slade appeared for the plaintiff ; Mr. Hawke, K.C., and Mr. Harold Simmons for the defendant.

In the absence of the plaintiff, who was stated to be abroad, the case for the plaintiff consisted of the cheque and the affidavit sworn by the defendant under Order XIV.

After hearing argument, Mr. Justice Roche held that there was no case to go to the jury. The plaintiff had contended that the parties had entered into a new agreement with fresh consideration, and had relied on Hyams v. Stuart King (24 The Times L.R., 675 ; [1908] 2 K.B., 696). The only evidence on that point was that when the defendant handed the plaintiff the cheque he asked him to hold it over, and the plaintiff agreed to do so, and that a few days later it was agreed that the cheque should not be presented until January 10, 1926. The plaintiff had not adduced any evidence of a new bargain fit to go to the jury.

The next point taken by the defendant was that the case fell within the Betting Act, 1853, and the Gaming Houses Act, 1854. Jenks v. Turpin (13 Q.B.D., 505) and Fairtlough v. Whitmore (11 The Times L.R., 288) showed the nature of the game of chemin-de-fer, and appeared to establish that where that game was played in a club the club came within the Acts. The materials before him, however, were not adequate to show that no other conclusion would be open to a jury than to find that the place where the game had been played in the present case was a gaming house and that the transactions which had terminated in the transference of the cheque were bad on that account. He would not stop the case on that point alone.

It had also been said that the transactions were void under the Gaming Acts of 1835 and 1845. The plaintiff and other players took it in turn to be croupier or banker at the game during which the defendant bought counters to stake. At the end of the game the defendant's losses amounted to £500 ; he owed that sum for counters to somebody. As payment of those losses to the plaintiff and other persons—or only to other persons—and not as repayment of any loan, the plaintiff accepted the cheque. A payment made to a winner, or person who accepted payment for a winner or winners, in the form of a cheque was void and unenforceable in these Courts.

There was, therefore, no case to go to the jury, and judgment must be entered for the defendant.

SCOTT v. LONDON AND NORTH-EASTERN RAILWAY COMPANY.*

Master and Servant—Compensation for injury by accident—Dependants—Illegitimate children of wife of workman—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1923 (13 and 14 Geo. V., c. 42), s. 2.

The House held that where a workman had been killed by accident, leaving a widow who was entitled to compensation, her two illegitimate children by another man, born some time before her marriage and partly maintained under an order upon the father, were not dependants of the deceased workman within the meaning of s. 2 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1923, so as also to be entitled to compensation.

* Reported by H. B. Hemming, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (42 The Times L.R., 292 ; [1926] 2 K.B., 204) affirmed.

The HOUSE without calling on counsel for the respondents, dismissed this appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal (42 The Times L.R., 292 ; [1926] 2 K.B., 204) affirming an award of the County Court Judge of Lincolnshire made under the Workmen's Compensation Acts, 1906 to 1923.

The appellant, Alice Scott, claimed compensation for herself and her two children, by reason of the death of her husband, who was killed on June 5, 1925, by an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment with the respondents.

The appellant was married to her husband in July, 1923. There was no issue of the marriage, but, at the date of her marriage, the appellant was the mother of twin illegitimate children by another man, who was alive, and against whom she had obtained a maintenance order of 4s. per week in respect of each child. The deceased workman used to pay the appellant out of his earnings 23s. per week, and out of that sum she paid the household expenses and also bought clothes and boots for the twin children. Those children lived with her sister, to whom she sent the 8s. per week regularly. When the 8s. due from the putative father was in arrear the appellant provided that amount out of the moneys given her by her husband.

The respondents admitted the widow's claim and paid £300 into Court. On behalf of the children she claimed an extra sum under section 2 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1923.

The County Court Judge held that the children were not in law entitled, as dependants, to compensation under the Acts, but found that they were, in fact, partially dependent upon the deceased workman's earnings. The Court of Appeal (the Master of the Rolls, Lord Justice Scrutton, and Lord Justice Sargant) affirmed his award.

Mr. Montgomery, K.C., Mr. William Shakespeare, and Mr. Cluer appeared for the appellant ; Mr. Greaves-Lord, K.C., and Mr. Cope Morgan for the respondents.

VISCOUNT DUNEDIN, in the course of his judgment, said that the case raised what he could not help calling a perfectly preposterous claim. A woman had two illegitimate children. The father was known, and he had been ordered to make a weekly payment for their sustenance. The woman married another man and, after her marriage, the children no longer resided with her. As she was their mother, and had ties of natural affection towards them, she used to give them presents of boots and clothing from time to time ; and, if their real father was a little unpunctual in his payments, she used to see that the money was forthcoming.

The husband died as the result of an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment, and she, as his widow, became entitled to compensation, which the employers paid. But the present claim was made on behalf of her two illegitimate children, who did not come under either the category of being dependants or that of being members of the family. In these circumstances he thought that the judgment of the Court of Appeal was right, and that the appeal should be dismissed, with costs.

LORD ATKINSON, in concurring, said that it was a hopeless appeal.

The other noble and learned Lords concurred.

OUTERBRIDGE v. OUTERBRIDGE.*

Husband and Wife—Maintenance order—Discharge on ground of adultery—Arrears accrued before discharge—Recovery—Order "under this Act"—Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895 (58 and 59 Vict., c. 39), s. 6—Affiliation Orders Act, 1914 (4 and 5 Geo. V., c. 6), s. 2.

Where a maintenance order under the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, has been discharged on the ground of the wife's adultery, she may nevertheless enforce payment of arrears accrued due down to the date of discharge and obtain an order for the attachment of her husband's income. Such an order is not an order "under this Act" within s. 6 of the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895.

This was a case stated by justices for the county of Surrey.

An application was made by the respondent against Richard H. Outerbridge, the appellant, for his committal for non-compliance with an order for maintenance made under section 5 of the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, on April 15, 1915, by which the appellant was ordered to pay the respondent £2 a week until the order should be varied or discharged. A summons for the arrears up to February 14, 1924, which had been adjourned from that date, was heard on January 21, 1926, when the following facts were found :—

(a) That the order of April 15, 1915, was, in accordance with section 7 of the above statute, discharged by the justices on February 14, 1924, as from that date, on the grounds of the respondent's adultery with one Frost.

(b) That there was on February 14, 1924, the sum of £390 unpaid under the order, and that the same sum was still unpaid on January 21, 1926.

The justices ordered the appellant to pay the arrears to the respondent by instalments of £2 a week, and under section 2 of the Affiliation Orders Act, 1914, and section 9 of the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, ordered the attachment of the appellant's income from the Public Trustee for the payment of the said instalments. The grounds for making this order were as follows :—That the order of April 15, 1915, was only discharged as from February 14, 1924 ; and that there was £390 still due to the respondent as arrears up to February 14, 1924, under that order.

It was contended for the appellant that this order was erroneous in law and in excess of jurisdiction by reason of the facts, that the order of April 15, 1915, having been discharged by the justices as from February 14, 1924, was no longer in force and that no further order for payment of money thereunder could be made ; that no further order for payment could be made because by section 6 of the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, no order could be made thereunder on the application of a married woman after proof of her adultery ; that the justices were functi officio, and had no power to make another order for payment of arrears against the appellant; that this order of January 21, 1926, was erroneous in law and in excess of jurisdiction as divorce proceedings between the parties were pending at the date of the application for and the making of the order; that the order was erroneous in law and in excess of jurisdiction because it was made in respect of arrears alleged to be due subsequently to the commencement of the adulterous cohabitation with Frost; and that the order was erroneous in law and in excess of jurisdiction inasmuch as no documentary or other evidence was adduced of any settlements or investments made in favour of the appellant.

It was contended for the respondent that the order was rightly made; that section 6 of the Act of 1895 did not apply to an order for payment of arrears due under an order before discharge; and that divorce proceedings between the parties were no bar to the making of the order.

The appellant applied to the justices to state this case.

The question upon which the opinion of the Court was desired was whether the justices upon the above statement of facts came to a correct decision in point of law or were acting within their jurisdiction in making the order, and if not, what should be done in the premises.

By the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, section 6: "No orders shall be made under this Act on the application of a married woman if it shall be proved that such married woman has committed an act of adultery. . . ."

By section 9: "The payment of any sum of money directed to be paid by any order under this Act may be enforced in the same manner as the payment of money is enforced, under an order of affiliation.

Mr. Wellesley Orr appeared for the appellant; Mr. J. Douglas Young appeared for the respondent.

The Lord Chief Justice.—This is a case stated by justices, and the question arises on an application by the respondent, Mrs. Outerbridge, against the present appellant for his committal for non-compliance with an order for maintenance under the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895. The history of the case is, for the sake of clearness, a little important.

The order for maintenance was made in April, 1915, and the appellant was ordered to pay the respondent £2 a week till the order was discharged. The payments fell into arrear, and the respondent took out a summons for those arrears returnable on February 14, 1924. But that summons was not dealt with on February 14, 1924. In the meantime a summons had been taken out by the appellant for the discharge of the order on the ground of the respondent's adultery, and on February 14, 1924, the order was discharged on the ground of adultery, and the wife's summons for arrears was adjourned. Nothing further was done on it till in 1926 it was reinstated, and the justices made an order for the payment of the arrears to the date of the discharge of the order, and for the attachment of the appellant's income. They state as the ground for making the order that the maintenance order was only discharged on February 14, 1924, and at that time there was £390 due to the respondent under that order.

The chief ground of appeal as appears from the case and from the arguments before us on behalf of the appellant was that the justices were functi officio, and had no power to make an order against the appellant, scilicet because the maintenance order had been discharged. The effect of the argument is that, if a woman who has obtained an order for maintenance is going to commit adultery, she must be diligent to collect her arrears first. The basis of the contention is to be found in the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895. Sections 4 and 5 having dealt with the granting of orders, section 6 provides as follows: "No orders shall be made under this Act on the application of a married woman if it shall be proved that such married woman has committed an act of adultery. . . ."

The argument made was this: This order which the justices made in the present case was an order "under this Act" and there was no power to make it. The answer was that the original order was undoubtedly made "under this Act," but that a distinction must be drawn between that order and the order for enforcement of arrears, which was made under the powers conferred by the Affiliation Orders Act, 1914. In other words, for the enforcement of the payment of such sums nowadays it is not necessary to obtain an order under the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895; what is needed is an order similar to that sought by persons seeking to enforce affiliation orders. The question has been dealt with in Ruther v. Ruther ([1903] 2 K.B., 270), where Lord Alverstone said, at page 274: "The Act of 1895 provided a new and amended procedure for making orders for the maintenance of wives, and by section 9 it is enacted that the payment of any sum of money directed to be paid by an order under the Act may be enforced in the same manner as the payment of money is enforced under an order of affiliation. The procedure for enforcing payment is therefore regulated by section 4 of the Bastardy Laws Amendment Act, 1872, which empowers magistrates where an order for payment has not been obeyed and no sufficient distress can be had to commit the defendant to prison for any term not exceeding three months." And Mr. Justice Wills said, at page 275: "Orders for payment made under the Act of 1895 are by section 9 to be enforced in the same way as affiliation orders; and on looking at section 4 of the Bastardy Laws Amendment Act, 1872, one sees what the procedure is. Therefore an order of committal for non-payment is not an order made under the Act of 1895." That decision seems to depend precisely on the contrast sought to be made in this case, and the learned Judge went on: "As to the main question, it is clear that there is no power to order committal for non-payment of the weekly sum after adultery on the part of the wife has been proved. I do not mean to say that the respondent was not entitled to recover arrears in respect of the period between the date when the adultery was committed and the date when the order ought to have been discharged." Mr. Justice Channell agreed. In those circumstances, the decisions being what they are, it seems clear that it was open to the justices to make the order which they made in this case about the arrears which had accrued before the discharge of the order.

I have come to the conclusion, not without hesitation, that the justices were right.

Mr. Justice Avory.—In this case I have entertained, and still entertain, considerable doubt whether an order made under the Act of 1895 which has been discharged can afterwards be enforced, and also I entertain some doubt whether this order is not an order under the Act of 1895. If it were, then section 6 would prohibit the justices from making the order on proof that the wife had committed adultery. But it has apparently been decided that an order for payment of arrears is not to be treated as an order under the Act of 1895. It is a very fine distinction, but just intelligible. It has been held in Ruther v. Ruther ([1903] 2 K.B., 270), certainly by implication, if not in express terms, that on an application for arrears the wife is entitled to receive them up to the date of proof of adultery and not merely to the date at which adultery was committed. I have already in another case expressed a view which did not find favour with the majority of the Court and need not repeat it.

In these circumstances I do not dissent from the judgment of my Lord, with which I understand my brother Salter agrees.

Mr. Justice Salter.—I agree that the justices had jurisdiction to make an order for payment of arrears due under this order, which had been discharged, but not annulled ab initio. The jurisdiction to make this order was derived partly from section 9 of the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, and partly from the Bastardy Acts. In a sense, no doubt it was made "under this Act," but I think not in the sense required. I think we could not hold otherwise without differing from Ruther v. Ruther ([1903] 2 K.B., 270). I agree that the justices could order payment of arrears down to the date of proof of the adultery.

LEYTON U.D.C. v. WILKINSON.*

Justices — Appeal — Recognizance—Appeal by corporation — Recognizance of clerk — Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1857 (20 and 21 Vict., c. 43), s. 3.

Where, on a case stated by justices, the appellants are a corporation, a recognizance entered into by their clerk, which does not show that it was entered into on their behalf and that it is their property which is made liable, does not satisfy the requirements of s. 3 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1857.

When this case, stated by justices for the Becontree Petty Sessional Division of Essex on a question arising under the Public Health Acts, came on for hearing a preliminary objection was taken on behalf of the respondent. The questions raised were whether a corporation was bound to enter into a recognizance to prosecute an appeal, and, if so, whether the recognizance in this case was sufficient.

The Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1857, after providing in section 2 for the making of an application for a case to be stated, enacts in section 3 :—

"The appellant, at the time of making such application and before a case shall be stated and delivered to him by the justice or justices, shall in every instance enter into a recognizance before such justice or justices or any one or more of them, or any other justice exercising the same jurisdiction . . . conditioned to prosecute without delay such appeal, and to submit to the judgment of the superior Court, and pay such costs as may be awarded by the same. . . ."

Sir James O'Connor, K.C., and Mr. G. W. H. Jones appeared for the respondent; Mr. Montgomery, K.C., and Mr. William Allen for the Leyton U.D.C. (now the Leyton Corporation).

Sir James O'Connor said that there was a certain amount of authority that a corporation, which could not appear in person, was not required to enter into a recognizance, but he submitted that they should do so by attorney.

Mr. Montgomery.—I have not come prepared to argue that point, because a recognizance was entered into by the Town Clerk, or rather the Clerk to the Urban District Council.

Sir James O'Connor said that that recognizance was a personal recognizance entered into by the clerk in his own name; it did not purport to bind the council, nor did it appear that the clerk was authorized to enter into it on their behalf. It was in this form :—

"Be it remembered that on the 26th day of May, 1926, John Atkinson, of Town Hall, Leyton, Clerk to the Leyton Urban District Council, personally came before me, one of his Majesty's Justices of the Peace for the said County, and acknowledged himself to owe our Sovereign Lord the King the sum following —namely, the sum of £100 to be levied on his several goods and chattels, lands, and tenements if he the said principal fail in the condition hereon indorsed."

The conditions indorsed were those required, but the person bound was not right. He referred to Rex v. Inhabitants of Abergele (5 Ad. and E., 795), where Lord Denman ordered some one to be bound on behalf of the inhabitants; Southern Counties Deposit Bank v. Boaler (11 The Times L.R., 568).

Mr. Montgomery, for the council, said that the authority to the clerk to apply for a case stated duly appeared on the council's minutes. It was not necessary that it should also be on the face of the recognizance in which Mr. Atkinson was described as clerk to the council. He referred to Cortis v. Kent Waterworks Company (7 B. and C., 314), and Reg. v. Manchester Corporation (7 E. and B., 453).

The Lord Chief Justice, in giving judgment, said that he thought that the preliminary objection succeeded. The procedure described in section 3 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1857, was made by the statute a condition precedent, and it was to be remembered that the words were "shall in every instance enter into a recognizance." In the present case the objection was taken that the Leyton U.D.C. had not in fact entered into any recognizance at all. The question whether a corporation was bound to enter into a recognizance had not been fully argued, but he thought that the burden was on those who contended that a corporation was excused to establish that proposition, in support of which no authority had been cited.

In the case of Cortis v. Kent Waterworks Company (7 B. and C., 314), which had been cited, Mr. Justice Bayley said, at page 330 :—

"It is said, however, in this case, that it must be collected from the appeal clause of this Act that corporations were not intended to be included, inasmuch as the person or persons appealing against a rate are required to enter into a recognizance, and that a corporation cannot do so. If it were necessary to decide that point, I should pause before I said that a corporation is not competent to enter into a recognizance. I am aware that there is a dictum to show that they cannot do so; but as they may appoint an attorney for a variety of purposes, I am not satisfied that they may not do so for the purpose of entering into a recognizance."

* Reported by J. W. Hall, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

That observation was made as long ago as 1827, and notwithstanding the lapse of time no authority had been produced in support of the proposition that a corporation was excused ; on the other hand, there had been cases in which corporations had entered into recognizances.

The second point was that the recognizance did not satisfy the requirements of the section. It was entered into not by or on behalf of the Leyton U.D.C., but by a man named John Atkinson, who was indeed described as the clerk to the council but nowhere spoke on behalf of the council. On the contrary, he used language referring to himself and "his" appeal.

The Court had been told that that was a stock form. There was a form, and a good deal of it was in print, but words had been written in, and it was open to those concerned to choose words more suited to their purpose. The words were, "to be levied on his goods and chattels." Suppose that the sheriff levied execution on the goods and chattels of Mr. Atkinson, it could hardly be urged in face of this recognizance that he had a right of action against the sheriff. Nor, in face of this recognizance, could the sheriff have levied against the U.D.C.

It was not such a recognizance as was required by the statute. It would have been easy by the use of suitable words to make it clear that it was entered into on behalf of the U.D.C., that it was their goods and chattels which were made liable, and that it was their appeal which was to be prosecuted.

The preliminary objection must therefore be upheld.

Mr. Justice Avory and Mr. Justice Salter delivered judgment to the same effect.

WEBSTER AND OTHERS v. MINISTER OF HEALTH.*

Pensions — Qualification—"Resident"—Meaning of expression—Widows' Orphans' and Old Age Contributory Pensions Act, 1925 (15 and 16 Geo. V., c. 70), s. 23 (1).

Consideration of the meaning of "resident" in s. 23 (1) of the Widows' Orphans' and Old Age Contributory Pensions Act, 1925.

This was the first case stated by special referees under the Widows' Orphans' and Old Age Contributory Pensions Act, 1925, and raised the question whether any, and, if so, which, of six applicants for widows' pensions had been resident (or, in the last case, whether the husband had been resident) in Great Britain within the meaning of section 23 (1) of the Act, which provides :—

"Subject as may be otherwise prescribed, a right to a pension shall not arise in respect of the insurance of any person, unless that person had—(a) so far as relates to widows' pensions and orphans' pensions at the date of his death . . . been resident in Great Britain for a period of two years immediately prior to that date . . . Provided that (i.) in the case of a widow's or orphan's pension arising at the commencement of this Act the foregoing provisions of this section shall not apply, but a right to such a pension shall not arise unless the widow or child to or in respect of whom the pension would, apart from this section, have been payable has been resident in Great Britain for a period of two years immediately prior to the commencement of this Act. . . ."

The cases were :—

(1) Mrs. Webster, whose husband died in 1924, and who lived with her father in Ardwick till May 12, 1925, renting two rooms from him, the furniture in which was her own. On that date she went to look for employment in Australia, arranging that the furniture should be left for 12 months, and that if she had not then returned it should be sold on her behalf by her father. She found the prospects of work in Australia unsatisfactory and returned in October, 1925, and remained in Great Britain till after January 4, 1926, the date of the commencement of the Act.

(2) Mrs. Noteyoung, whose husband died in 1917. She was employed by the Navy, Army, and Air Force Institutes as a cook, and in May, 1923, was sent to Cologne, then occupied by the British Army. She remained there (except for short periods of absence owing to health) till November, 1925, when she finally returned to England. During her absence her child remained with her mother in England, where the applicant had two furnished rooms. The child was supported by the applicant, who asked for a transfer to England, but was asked to stay in Cologne.

(3) Mrs. Allport, whose husband died in 1923, and who left Great Britain on medical advice for Canada on June 24, 1924, and returned on June 14, 1925. She had previously lived with a sister in England, and went for a complete change, with her child, to visit another sister in Canada. She stated that she had no intention of remaining in Canada and refused offers of employment there.

(4) Mrs. Whittaker, whose husband died in 1922, and who went with her children to the United States, on the ground of health, from June to November, 1925.

(5) Mrs. Giacopazzi, whose husband died in 1925, and who went to the United States with her husband and child in August, 1924, to visit her sister and see if her husband could get employment. Some of the husband's furniture was sold to a stranger and some was sold to his father, who stored it against the possibility of a return if he could not find suitable work. The husband fell ill in America and died a few days after his return to Great Britain on January 30, 1925. The applicant then went to live where the furniture had been kept.

(6) Mrs. Thomas. In this case the husband did not die till a few days after the Act came into operation, and therefore his residence was the material question. He accepted employment in the Congo Free State in May, 1923, leaving his wife and child living in Great Britain, where he rented for them half the house of her parents. His health broke down and he returned home on December 21, 1924, and was ill till April, 1925. He got work till December, 1925, when he again fell ill and died on January 7, 1926.

Mr. F. B. Merriman, K.C., and the Hon. E. Duke appeared for the applicants, whose cases were brought under the Poor Persons Rules ; the Solicitor-General (Sir Thomas Inskip, K.C.), and Mr. Harold Murphy for the Minister of Health.

* Reported by J. W. Hall, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The Lord Chief Justice said that the Court did not think that this consultative case required them to hazard a definition of "resident," but they were impressed by the contrast between that term and "absent" in section 22. The contrast was not between "absence" and "presence," but between "absence" and "residence," which need not imply actual physical presence.

In each of these cases the condition of residence was satisfied. To adopt the words of Lord Campbell in Reg. v. Inhabitants of Stapleton (22 L. J. M. C., 102), "I should be very glad if we could lay down some general rule applicable to all cases, defining what is a residence under this statute, but . . . I have as yet heard none suggested."

The Court was grateful to Mr. Merriman and Mr. Duke, who had found the time, to the exclusion of other matters, to give their attention to the cases of these poor persons.

DIGGINS v. DIGGINS.*

Husband and wife — Maintenance — Deed of separation — Order for maintenance — Jurisdiction of justices—Wife not deprived of right to resort to justices for maintenance by deed — Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895 (58 and 59 Vict., c. 39), s. 4—Summary Jurisdiction (Separation and Maintenance) Act, 1925 (15 and 16 Geo. V., c. 51), s. 1 (1).

A wife's right to claim and obtain an order for maintenance from a bench of justices under the Summary Jurisdiction (Separation and Maintenance) Act, 1925, is not necessarily barred by a deed of separation which makes an allowance for her maintenance, but it must depend on the terms of the deed whether she is or is not deprived of that right.

This was an appeal from an order made by the justices for the borough of Sudbury, Suffolk. The parties were married on August 17, 1917. The wife alleged acts of cruelty against her husband, and left him on September 22, 1925. On December 1 of that year they executed a deed of separation, by which the husband covenanted to pay 30s. a week towards the maintenance of the wife and one of her five children, who were aged from eight years to ten months. The deed provided that if the wife at any time molested her husband directly or indirectly, or if the wife took proceedings for restitution of conjugal rights or for otherwise compelling him to live with her, he should be free to discontinue the weekly payments. The deed also provided for its own avoidance if the parties became reconciled and returned to cohabitation, or if the marriage were dissolved, or if the parties were judicially separated. The wife was to have the custody of the eldest child, a girl, and the husband that of the other four.

After two weeks the payments ceased, the husband alleging that his wife had molested him. On May 17, 1926, the wife took out a summons for maintenance under section 4 of the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, as amended by the Summary Jurisdiction (Separation and Maintenance) Act, 1925, section 1, subsection 1, on the ground that her husband had been guilty of persistent cruelty and had wilfully neglected to provide reasonable maintenance for herself and two of her infant children. When the summons was heard an objection was taken on behalf of the husband that the justices had no jurisdiction, inasmuch as the deed of separation regulated the rights of the parties. The justices overruled the objection, and made an order as follows:—(1) That the wife was no longer bound to cohabit with her husband; (2) that the wife should have the legal custody of the eldest child and the baby while under the age of sixteen; (3) that the husband was to pay 20s. a week maintenance for the wife and 5s. a week for each of these two children while under sixteen.

In their reasons for the decision the justices said that they had disregarded the evidence as to alleged cruelty, but the evidence amply showed that the husband had failed to provide reasonable maintenance. They considered themselves empowered to make the order because of the repeal in the later Act of the following words in the earlier Act:—"And shall by such neglect have caused her to leave and live separately and apart from him." They declined to adjudicate on the deed.

The Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, section 4, provided:—"Any married woman . . . whose husband shall have been guilty of persistent cruelty to her, or wilful neglect to provide reasonable maintenance for her or her infant children whom he is legally liable to maintain, and shall by such cruelty or neglect have caused her to leave and live separately and apart from him, may apply to any Court of summary jurisdiction acting within the city, borough, petty sessional or other division or district . . . in which the cause of complaint shall have wholly or partially arisen, for an order or orders under this Act. . . ."

By the Summary Jurisdiction (Separation and Maintenance) Act, 1925, section 1 (1), which came into operation on October 1, 1925, it was enacted that such an application by a wife against her husband "may be made notwithstanding that the cruelty or neglect complained of has not caused her to leave and live separately and apart from him, and accordingly the words 'and shall by such cruelty or neglect have caused her to leave and live separately and apart from him' in section 4 of that Act are hereby repealed."

The husband appealed mainly on the grounds that the justices were wrong—(1) in holding that the appellant had wilfully neglected to provide reasonable maintenance, and (2) in not holding that the respondent wife had committed breaches of the deed, and in consequence any non-compliance by the appellant was justified and the deed was an answer preventing any order from being made.

Mr. C. E. Jones, for the appellant, said that the justices had no jurisdiction to entertain the summons, the wife being limited as to her remedy to suing under the deed of the County Court, where the question of molestation could have been argued. He referred to Piper v. Piper ([1902] P., 198), Roe v. Roe (32 The Times L.R., 490; [1916] P., 163).

The President.—The summons was for desertion in those cases.

Mr. Jones said that Medway v. Medway ([1900] P., 141) showed that a summons for neglect to maintain would not lie where the parties were living apart under a deed of separation.

* Reported by William Latey, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Mr. Melford Stevenson, for the respondent:—The decision in Medway v. Medway (supra) has no application since the repeal of the words in section 4 of the 1895 Act by the 1925 Act. That case was decided on the ground that the neglect to maintain did not cause the wife to leave and live separate and apart from the husband. In the present case the wife's statutory rights co-exist side by side with her rights under the deed.

Mr. Justice Bateson.—The deed excludes proceedings for restitution of conjugal rights, but contemplates the possibility of proceedings for judicial separation or dissolution of marriage.

Mr. C. E. Jones, in reply, argued that in the circumstances there was no wilful neglect to provide reasonable maintenance.

Lord Merrivale.—The wife in this case proceeded under section 4 of the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act of 1895, as amended by the Act of 1925, by way of summons before the justices alleging that her husband had wilfully neglected to provide reasonable maintenance for her. The husband met the wife's allegation of wilful neglect to provide reasonable maintenance by producing a deed into which she had entered in which there were various mutual covenants. One was a covenant by the wife against molestation, and the husband said, "My wife has molested me contrary to the terms of this deed, and I claim to be exempt from any liability under the statute by reason that the deed itself provided maintenance subject to a proviso for discontinuance of it if there were molestation."

It is necessary first of all to see what the Act of Parliament says in its amended form. It is perfectly explicit. It says that, if a husband shall be guilty of wilful neglect to provide reasonable maintenance for his wife, a Court of summary jurisdiction may make an order for maintenance in her favour. As to maintenance, the wife gave evidence of the means of the husband which put out of question any contention that the amount of the order that the justices have made could be impeached. She was entitled also to say: "In the deed upon which my husband relies he has covenanted to pay me 30s. a week for myself and one of the children." So it cannot be said that the sum which is in question is unreasonable; a reasonable maintenance is not less than the sum which the justices have ordered.

The next question is whether the husband has wilfully neglected to provide his wife with reasonable maintenance. He has purposely neglected to do so. The evidence which the justices accepted was that from the second week after the deed was entered into the husband did not pay. The husband said that the wife molested him. Counsel for the appellant relies upon the fact that the justices have said, "We cannot go into that matter." The real question is whether the justices were entitled to go beyond the terms of the Act and to incorporate in the Act the qualification of the wife's right which they should derive by implication from a deed between the parties. The justices thought that they were not so empowered.

The case is clear, apart from the deed. The husband has wilfully neglected to provide reasonable maintenance for the wife. What remains is to ascertain whether the deed excludes the jurisdiction of the justices. It must not be supposed that there is an unlimited right in a wife under the amended statute wherever she has entered into a deed at her own volition to apply to the justices to get the terms of the deed reviewed. That would be contrary to good sense, and I do not doubt that, if any case arise where a wife who has entered into a deed proceeds in disregard of it to seek from the justices something different, she will meet with an answer which will prevent the possibility of further question. If she does not meet with it in the first instance, she may meet with it here.

But this is not a case of that kind. The case here is that the parties are in disagreement as to their rights under the deed. There are allegations of molestation. There is some evidence of conduct which might be held to amount to molestation. What we have to determine is whether in such a state of facts, with the statute subsisting, and the parties having entered into a deed about maintenance, the justices are prevented from dealing with the question under the amended Act of Parliament. In my judgment they are not. The deed here does not exclude the wife from going to the justices if reasonable maintenance is not provided. It does not purport to deal with her rights under the 1925 Act. As my brother pointed out, it does provide against resort to the Courts for restitution of conjugal rights, and it does include provisos by which the deed is to be avoided in certain circumstances. It does not deal with the present form of proceeding.

The true effect of the facts as they stand is this, that the Legislature has given the wife, by the amendment in the law embodied in the Act of 1925, a right to resort to a bench of justices for an order for maintenance in case her husband shall wilfully neglect to provide reasonable maintenance for her. This wife has that right, subject only to the proper interpretation of the deed of December, 1925. That deed does not either expressly or by implication deprive her of that right, or effectually limit it. The wife's right, therefore, was intact at the time when she applied to the justices. She established the necessary facts to bring it into operation, and in my judgment the appeal fails.

Mr. Justice Bateson.—I agree. Under the Acts of 1895 and 1925 the wife was entitled to assert her claim to maintenance. It is suggested that the deed is a bar. The deed in terms in the last clause contemplates other proceedings. In an earlier clause it excludes one form of proceeding. It does not exclude these proceedings. I think this appeal should be dismissed.

The appeal was dismissed, with costs.

REX v. GRAIN—EX PARTE WANDSWORTH GUARDIANS.*

Local Government — Gratuity to officer sanctioned by Ministry of Health—Superannuation allowance based on gratuity—Disallowance—Surcharge—Poor Law Amendment Act, 1844 (7 and 8 Vict., c. 101), s. 32—Local Authorities (Expenses) Act, 1887 (50 and 51 Vict., c. 72), s. 3—Poor Law Officers' Superannuation Act, 1896 (59 and 60 Vict., c. 50), ss. 2, 3, 12, 19.

* Reported by J. W. Hall, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Acting upon a recommendation of the Ministry of Health (made without statutory authority) a board of guardians paid a gratuity to a registrar of births and deaths. That payment, having been sanctioned by the Ministry, could not be disallowed by the district auditor. On the retirement of the registrar the guardians granted him a superannuation allowance based on the average of his remuneration by fees plus gratuity in the preceding five years. The district auditor disallowed so much of the allowance as was based on the gratuity, and surcharged it on certain guardians and ex-guardians.

Held, that he had no power to surcharge the amount. Section 32 of the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1844, does not authorize the surcharge of a payment which is illegal unless it was due to the negligence or misconduct of the accounting party.

Held, also by Lord Hewart, C.J., and Avory, J. (Salter, J., dissenting), that the district auditor was wrong in disallowing the payment, as the gratuity formed part of the registrar's "emoluments" within the meaning of s. 19 of the Poor Law Officers' Superannuation Act, 1896.

This was a rule nisi for a certiorari directed to Mr. H. W. W. Grain, the district auditor of the Wandsworth Union, to bring up and quash a certificate of disallowance and surcharge of a sum of £27 17s. 1d. in the accounts of the Wandsworth Guardians for the half-year ending September 30, 1925.

The question arose out of the payment of gratuities to registrars of births and deaths to meet the increased cost of living. Those gratuities, for which there was no statutory sanction, were authorized and recommended to boards of guardians by circulars of the Local Government Board (now the Ministry of Health), dated May 2, 1918, and May 14, 1920. The circulars pointed out that since registrars were paid by fees and not by salary there was no authority to pay a war bonus, but that great hardship was caused in some cases by the diminution of fees. Boards of guardians were therefore invited to recommend, on lines laid down in the circulars, the payment of gratuities to those officials which the Ministry would be prepared to sanction.

The Wandsworth Board of Guardians, in accordance with those circulars, granted a gratuity to Mr. W. V. Minter, the registrar of births and deaths, and that gratuity was paid for two years, subject to a deduction of 3 per cent. towards superannuation allowance when Mr. Minter should retire. Though there was no statutory sanction for the payments, the district auditor could not disallow them because of the provision of section 3 of the Local Authorities (Expenses) Act, 1887 (50 and 51 Vict., c. 72) :—

"Expenses paid by any local authority whose accounts are subject to audit by a district auditor shall not be disallowed by that auditor if they have been sanctioned by the Local Government Board."

On Mr. Minter's retirement a superannuation allowance was granted to him in February, 1922, based on fees plus gratuities. The payment of that allowance was not challenged until the half-year ending September 30, 1925, as it was assumed to have been paid on the correct basis. On that occasion, however, a more searching inquiry was made, and the fact that the gratuities were included in arriving at the amount of the basis was disclosed.

The district auditor thereupon disallowed (and surcharged on certain guardians and ex-guardians) the sum of £27 17s. 1d., part of a payment of £137 1s. 10d., in respect of the half-yearly instalment of Mr. Minter's allowance of £274 3s. 8d. That disallowance represented the difference between the amount due on the basis of fees alone and the amount calculated on the basis of fees plus gratuity.

The district auditor took the view that, though he was precluded from disallowing the gratuities, the authority of the Ministry did not legalize their payment ; and that they were not "emoluments" of the officer within the meaning of section 3 of the Poor Law Officers' Superannuation Act, 1896 (59 and 60 Vict., c. 50), which enacts that the scale for superannuation allowances to an officer or servant under the Act shall be based upon the average amount of salary or wages and emoluments during the five years ending on the quarter-day preceding the day on which he ceases to hold his office or employment. "Emoluments" are defined in section 19 of the Act as including "all fees, poundage, and other payments made to any officer or servant as such for his own use."

The effect of the disallowance and surcharge, if correct, was to reduce Mr. Minter's allowance from £274 3s. 8d. to £218 9s. 6d. per annum.

The present rule was obtained at the instance of the guardians upon the grounds that the district auditor had no jurisdiction to disallow and surcharge the payment ; that the gratuities were "emoluments" within the meaning of the Poor Law Officers' Superannuation Act, 1896 ; that the sanction of the Ministry of Health legalized the payments of the gratuities ; and that the payment was allowed by the district auditor at several previous audits.

Mr. Montgomery, K.C., and Mr. Croom-Johnson showed cause for the district auditor ; Mr. Wingate-Saul, K.C., and Mr. Crouch supported the rule.

Mr. Montgomery referred to the Births and Deaths Registration Acts of 1836 (6 and 7 Will. IV., c. 86) and 1874 (37 and 38 Vict., c. 88) to show the statutory authority for the remuneration of registrars, and to the Poor Law Amendment Acts of 1834 (4 and 5 Will. IV., c. 76) and 1844 (7 and 8 Vict., c. 101), section 32.

By section 32 of the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1844 : ". . . and every auditor appointed for such a district shall have full powers to examine, audit, allow, or disallow of accounts, and of items therein . . . and such auditor shall charge in every account audited by him the amount of any deficiency or loss incurred by the negligence or misconduct of any person accounting, or of any sum for which any such person is accountable but not brought by him into account against such person, and shall certify on the face of every account audited by him any money . . . found by him to be due from any person . . . and all moneys so certified to be due by such auditor shall be recoverable as so certified from all or any of the persons making or authorizing the illegal payment or otherwise answerable for such moneys. . . ."

The Lord Chief Justice.—Is there any power under that section to surcharge except for negligence or improper conduct ? The wording is different from section 247 of the Public Health Act, 1875, which was in question in the Poplar case, Roberts v. Hopwood and Others (41 The Times L.R., 436 ; [1925] A.C., 578).

Mr. MONTGOMERY submitted that the power to surcharge arose merely because the payment was illegal, and that in any case the making of the payment in the circumstances amounted to improper conduct. He would not dispute that if the gratuities were legally given they were emoluments. In using the words "improper conduct" he did not suggest any moral stigma.

Mr. WINGATE-SAUL said that, after allowing the payment of this superannuation allowance for three years, the district auditor had gone back and surcharged the guardians and ex-guardians who had voted for it three years previously. The gratuities themselves could not be disallowed, and they had been subject to the pension deduction authorized by the Poor Law Officers' Superannuation Act, 1896. The auditor had then passed the deductions as correct and for six half-yearly audits had passed the payment of the allowance.

The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE.—Has anyone suggested surcharging the district auditor as a person authorizing an illegal payment?—Not yet.

Mr. WINGATE-SAUL said that "misconduct" sufficient to justify surcharge must be something ejusdem generis with negligence. It was an abuse of language to use such a term for a mistake of law in construing a difficult section, as to the true interpretation of which their Lordships might have some difficulty after full argument.

He submitted that the word "emoluments" was wide enough to cover any payment in fact made to a registrar for his own use, and that there was no statute preventing boards of guardians from paying a reasonable remuneration to registrars of births and deaths over and above the statutory fees. The Ministry could not be supposed to have been inviting boards of guardians to do something illegal, but was drawing their attention to the propriety of exercising a discretion which they possessed.

Mr. CROOM-JOHNSON, at the invitation of the Court to deal with any specific point, though he had no general right of reply, pointed out that guardians were a purely statutory body, and said that the question was therefore not, "Was there anything to prevent them from making this payment?" but "Was there anything giving them power to make this payment?" They might pay their servants, but registrars were only to be deemed to be their servants for the purpose of the superannuation allowance. This payment was not an "emolument," but a voluntary payment.

The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE.—This is an order nisi for a writ of certiorari to remove into this Court the certificate of disallowance and surcharge made by a certain district auditor of a certain sum of £27 17s. 1d., that sum having been disallowed by him in the accounts of the Guardians of the Poor of Wandsworth Union for the half-year ending September 30, 1925, and surcharged by the district auditor upon certain guardians of the poor of the Wandsworth Union, and upon certain late members of the board. The grounds upon which the rule was asked and obtained were: First, that the district auditor had no jurisdiction to make the surcharge dated April 12, 1926; secondly, that the gratuities referred to in the district auditor's surcharge were emoluments within the meaning of the Poor Law Officers' Superannuation Act, 1896; thirdly, that the sanction of the Minister of Health legalized the payment of the gratuities; and fourthly, that the superannuation allowance was allowed by the district auditor at a series of half-yearly audits beginning in March, 1922, and ending in March, 1924.

The question arises out of certain gratuities granted by a board of guardians to a registrar of births and deaths for the purpose of meeting, on the one hand, the increased cost of living, and, on the other hand, the decline in the remuneration derived by registrars from the statutory fees. The attention of the Court has been directed to two circulars from the Local Government Board dated respectively May 2, 1918, and May 14, 1920, in which boards of guardians were not merely reminded that they might, but directed that they ought to, make such gratuities in order to meet the difficulties just mentioned. It is said, for example, in the circular dated May 14, 1920, in paragraph 3: "The Minister has stated on several occasions that the grant of a gratuity is within the discretion of the board of guardians, but he feels it his duty to remind the guardians that it is important that the case of registrars of births and deaths should be met, and he hopes that guardians will deal with these cases not less adequately than with officers eligible for war bonus." What happened in the particular case is set out in detail in the various affidavits. I do not take up time by reiterating the various paragraphs; the substance of the matter may be very shortly summarized. After and in consequence of the circulars sent by the Local Government Board, now the Ministry of Health, this particular board of guardians did grant to the registrar of births and deaths referred to in the present case a certain gratuity. Under the statutes relating to his office the registrar was entitled to a series of fees of the nature of capitation fees. The object and the effect of the gratuity paid by the guardians were to supplement the remuneration derived from those statutory sources. The payment of those gratuities was apparent on the face of the accounts of the board of guardians, and at no time, repeated as it was, was it questioned by the district auditor. There was an excellent reason why it should not be questioned. By section 3 of the Local Authorities (Expenses) Act, 1887, it is provided that "Expenses paid by any local authority whose accounts are subject to audit by a district auditor shall not be disallowed by that auditor if they have been sanctioned by the Local Government Board." In the present case, whatever else is in dispute, it is common ground that this gratuity was originally suggested, was in its amount approved, and was in this way from time to time sanctioned by the Local Government Board. There came, however, a time when a different question arose, namely: What was the appropriate amount of this poor law officer's superannuation allowance? It is provided by section 12 of the Poor Law Officers' Superannuation Act, 1896, that officers and servants are to contribute to the fund from which the pension is drawn. "Subject"—says section 12—"to the provisions of this Act, every officer and servant in the service or employment of the guardians of a union shall contribute annually for the purposes of this Act a percentage amount of his salary or wages and emoluments according to the scale laid down by this Act, such amount to be from time to time deducted from the salary or wages payable to him and to be carried to and form part of the common fund of the union." It is in the present case common ground that in pursuance of that section a certain percentage amount was during the relevant period deducted not only from the fees which this officer was entitled to receive, but also from the gratuity paid to him at the instigation of the Local Government Board. In other words, it is common ground that for the purpose of assessing the amount of his contribution this gratuity was treated as being an integral part of his emoluments. That, indeed, I think is not surprising, because when we turn to the definition section in the Act of 1896 it appears that the term "Officer" includes: "Every officer in the service of an authority to whom this Act applies," and, "For the purposes of this Act superintendent registrars and registrars of births and deaths and school attendance officers are deemed to be in the service of the guardians of the union in which their districts are situated"; and again by the definition section the term "emoluments" is said to include: "All fees, poundage, and other payments made to any officer or servant as such for his own use; also the money value of any apartments, rations, or other allowances in kind appertaining to his office or employment." In the present case the guardians, as in the matter of his contribution, so also in the matter of the computation of the amount of his superannuation allowance, treated the gratuity paid to him as being a part of his emoluments. It would have been strange indeed if they had taken any other course. It would have been a little remarkable if they had said: For the purpose of levying your contribution we say that your gratuity is a part of your emoluments, but for the purpose of assessing your allowance we say that it is not. They took no such course; they had one weight and one measure in both cases. I should have thought that this gratuity, being what it is and paid as it was, was a payment made to this officer or servant as such for his own use, and clearly came within the definition of emoluments in section 19 of the Poor Law Officers' Superannuation Act of 1896. It is not seriously denied that it came within that category at the time when it was being paid, and when it was being paid from time to time. What is denied is that it remained in that category when afterwards it was sought to treat it as a factor in the sum upon which the computation for superannuation allowance was to be based.

Now various questions have been stirred in this case which, in my opinion, do not strictly arise. But it is desirable that I should not even seem to pass them over. It is said that in this case there was a duty upon the auditor to surcharge, and that there was a duty upon the auditor to disallow this sum, the sum disallowed being that element in the superannuation allowance which is derived from taking into account as part of the emoluments the gratuity already referred to. Mr. Montgomery, for the purposes of his argument, dealt with, or assumed to deal with, the questions of disallowance and of surcharge as if they were one and the same, as if, to put it in another way, this certificate of disallowance and surcharge were a certificate so described by a combined substantive, there being a hyphen between "disallowance" and "and," and another hyphen between "and" and "surcharge." Mr. Wingate-Saul, on the other hand, dealt with, and no doubt most properly dealt with, each of these matters separately, and I will follow that course. Reference has been made to the various statutes. I need not enumerate them, nor the several orders under them. Sooner or later we come to the Poor Law Amendment Act of 1844, and especially to section 32 of that Act. Now there was a moment in the course of this argument when it appeared to be suggested—in fact, it was in terms stated—that the ground upon which this payment was impugned was two-fold, first, that it was a payment made without lawful authority; secondly, that it was a payment made in circumstances which amounted to improper conduct on the part of the persons making it or authorizing it to be made. In the course of the argument, however, those two clearly became one, and it ought clearly to be understood that at the conclusion of the matter it was most definitely stated and reiterated by Mr. Montgomery that the only sense in which he referred to improper conduct in this context was that he alleged that this was a payment made without lawful authority, and no more. Now when one looks at section 32 of the Poor Law Amendment Act of 1844 there is apparent the clearest possible contrast, as it seems to me, between that section and section 247 of the Public Health Act, 1875, under which some cases have recently arisen. Under section 247 (7) of the Public Health Act, 1875, it is in the clearest possible terms provided that: "Any auditor acting in pursuance of this section shall disallow every item of account contrary to law and surcharge the same on the person making or authorizing the making of the illegal payment." There is no opportunity for doubt or controversy as to the meaning of those words; if the payment is illegal it is to be surcharged upon the person making or authorizing it. Then the section goes on to deal with other and more particular matters; the auditor, it says, "shall charge against any person accounting the amount of any deficiency or loss incurred by the negligence or misconduct of that person or of any sum which ought to have been but is not brought into account by that person, and shall in every such case certify the amount due from such person. . . ." There is, as I say, a remarkable contrast between that section of the Act of 1875, relating to the matters with which it deals, and section 32 of the Act of 1844. Section 32 of the Act of 1844 begins with no such general words about payments made contrary to law; it begins by saying that the auditor is to have "full powers to examine, audit, allow or disallow of accounts and of items therein relating to moneys assessed," &c., and he "shall charge in every account audited by him the amount of any deficiency or loss incurred by the negligence or misconduct of any person accounting, or of any sum for which any such person is accountable, but not brought by him into account"; then he is to certify, and then he is to report. Side by side with that section it is natural to read, not as indeed concluding the matter, but as throwing light upon it, the General Order for Accounts of the Local Government Board, dated January 14, 1867. By Article 41 of that General Order it is provided that: "In auditing the accounts the auditor shall see that they have been kept and are presented in proper form; that the particular items of receipt and expenditure are stated in sufficient detail; and that the payments are supported by adequate vouchers and authority; and he shall ascertain whether all sums received, or which ought to have been received, are brought into account; and he shall examine whether the expenditure is in all cases such as might lawfully be made; and he shall reduce such payments and charges as are exorbitant, shall surcharge moneys not duly accounted for, or lost by negligence, upon the person who ought to account for the same, or whose negligence or improper conduct has caused the loss." There is a remarkable series of duties explained by the use of a series of different verbs; he is to ascertain, he is to examine, he is in the proper case to reduce, and in a certain very limited class of cases he is to surcharge: "Shall surcharge moneys not duly accounted for or lost by negligence, upon the person who ought to account for the same, or whose negligence or improper conduct has caused the loss."

Now it is a part of the argument against this rule, and in support of the certificate which it is sought to remove, that any payment made without due authority of law is sufficiently covered by the words "or of any sum for which any such person is accountable, but not brought by him into account." I cannot help thinking, with great respect, that that is a misreading of the statute. What is being dealt with there is accounting; it is being dealt with after what has already been said about deficiency or loss incurred by negligence or misconduct on the part of the person accounting, and, in my opinion, what is there being dealt with is the failure or omission on the part of the accounting person to bring into account some sums which ought to be brought into account. To say that those words are in themselves sufficient to cover any payment made without lawful authority seems to me to have, amongst other things, two effects: one is to render a large part of section 32 of the Poor Law Amendment Act of 1844 surplusage, and another effect is to make surplusage of the clear words with which the Legislature begins section 247 (7) of the Public Health Act of 1875. Where, in other words, was the necessity of providing that an auditor, acting in pursuance of the section, shall disallow every item of account contrary to law and surcharge the same on the person making or authorizing the making of the illegal payments, if the very same thing is covered in the words which shortly afterwards follow, as to any sum which ought to have been but is not brought into the account by the accounting person? I think that that argument fails, and there is in section 32 of the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1844, no power in the district auditor to surcharge a sum merely because it appears to him to have been made without lawful authority, where he is not prepared to say that it represents a deficiency or loss incurred by the negligence or misconduct of the person accounting. So far as surcharge is concerned, it appears to me upon the facts of this case, on the true construction of the words in this statute, that the auditor had not the power to surcharge. If, and so far as, the question of disallowance is a separate question, I think that there is great force in the argument made by Mr. Wingate-Saul that in the circumstances this gratuity became part of the emoluments of this officer. I do not think that when the Local Government Board issued the two circulars to which attention has been directed it was inviting or provoking boards of guardians to make illegal payments. It was, at any rate in terms, inviting boards of guardians to make payments which, it said, were in their discretion, and it purported, at any rate, to be reminding boards of guardians of what it represented to be a duty. The question whether there was indeed, apart from anything which arose in 1918 or 1920, power in the board of guardians to supplement in a proper case the statutory fees of a registrar of births and deaths has not been fully argued. But on the evidence, which is undisputed, I am not prepared to say that the payment of these gratuities was illegal. It is common ground that they could not be questioned by a district auditor at the time when they were made, because of the provisions of the Local Authorities (Expenses) Act, 1887. I am not in the least satisfied that they were illegal payments, and it seems to me to be clear that they became a part of the emoluments of the registrar, and as such entered into the figure upon which not only was his contribution to the superannuation fund to be calculated, but also the amount he was to receive from the superannuation fund was to be calculated. For those reasons, amongst others, in my opinion, this surcharge is wrong, and this disallowance is wrong, and I think that this rule ought to be made absolute.

Mr. Justice Avory.—I agree that the writ should go in this case for the purpose of quashing this disallowance and surcharge. I agree entirely in the judgment delivered by my Lord, and for the purpose of my own judgment I do not propose to make any distinction between the disallowance and the surcharge. The auditor has given us his reasons for the disallowance, and having given the reasons for his disallowance he then surcharges the persons who sanctioned the payment which he has disallowed. Now I think it must be borne in mind, in considering the effect of the Poor Law Officers' Superannuation Act of 1896, that under the original Act of William IV., under which registrars of birth are paid, by section 29 it is the guardians who are the paymasters, and in that sense, therefore, there is a relationship of employer and employed between the guardians and the registrar. It is quite true that under that Act the guardians are only to pay, according to a certain schedule, fees which are fixed by a scale, but, that being the position of the registrar, when we come to the Act of 1896, in fixing the superannuation allowance it is clear that the registrar is to be for the purpose of that Act deemed to be an officer of the guardians, in the service of the guardians. Section 2 of the Act provides that every officer in the service of the guardians shall be entitled, under certain conditions, to a superannuation allowance, and the scale of the allowance is fixed by section 3, and it is perfectly clear that in fixing the superannuation allowance the guardians are to take into account the salary or wages, as the case may be, and the emoluments during the five years ending on the quarter-day preceding the day on which he ceases to hold this office. Therefore, the question would appear to be, at first sight, quite a simple one—namely, What were the wages or the salary and the emoluments that this gentleman was receiving during that period? Looking at the definition of "emoluments," and particularly in view also of the recent decision of the House of Lords in the case of Salford Guardians v. Dewhurst (42 The Times L.R., 657; [1926] A.C., 619), I cannot doubt that these gratuities, or the gratuity which was annually paid to him since a certain date, was a portion of the emoluments of his office. That being so, the auditor finds that the inclusion of this gratuity was illegal on the ground that, though the sanction of the Minister of Health had been given to the payment of the gratuities, the only effect of that was not to legalize the payments, but merely to prevent disallowance at audit—in other words, he comes to the conclusion that, although by law he could not, at the annual or six-monthly audit, disallow these payments of gratuities, when he has to consider whether the superannuation allowance was a proper one, he may disallow those same gratuities; that is the effect of the finding of the auditor in this case. As my Lord has pointed out, before he can disallow he must justify his disallowance under section 32 of the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1844, and in my view, giving the most liberal construction to this section, I do not think it can be said that these gratuities, which were paid by the guardians, were either moneys that represented a deficiency or loss incurred by the negligence or misconduct of the guardians, nor, in my opinion, did they represent sums for which the guardians were accountable, but not brought by them into account, nor, in my opinion, were these gratuities, within the meaning of this section, moneys which can be described as illegal payments within the meaning of section 32.

For these reasons, shortly, while agreeing entirely with all other reasons given by my Lord in his judgment, I think that this disallowance and surcharge should be quashed.

Mr. Justice Salter.—I agree that this rule should be made absolute to quash the surcharge. The applicants for the rule, however, have asked for more than that; they have asked for a rule to quash the disallowance. The auditor has dealt with the matters, as I think he was obviously bound to do, quite separately. He has powers to disallow and powers to surcharge which are quite distinct. He has given his reasons, first, for the disallowance, and then his reasons for the surcharge. I think that his reasons for the surcharge are insufficient.

As regards the disallowance, I think that he was right, for the reasons which he gave and, indeed, that if he had failed to disallow this item he would have failed to discharge the duty imposed upon him by law. That duty is imposed, first, by section 32 of the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1844, and then, much more briefly, in Article 41 of the General Order for the accounts of unions, January 14, 1867. No one has disputed the validity of the article, and it will be quite sufficient to refer to that, and the only material words are: "In auditing the accounts the auditor shall disallow and shall strike out such payments as are not authorized by law." It rests, therefore, upon the applicants for this rule to show that the payment now challenged was a payment authorized by law. If they fail to do so, then they fail to succeed as to this part of the matter. No one suggests that the common law authorizes this payment. It is a question, therefore, of statutory authorization, and two statutes, and two statutes only, have been relied upon as authorizing this payment.

Before I deal with the first of them it will be convenient to refer to the Births and Deaths Registration Act, 1836, which by section 7 deals with the appointment and by section 29 with the remuneration of registrars of births and deaths. It is sufficient to say that as it seems to me the result of that statute is that the registrar is not a servant of the guardians; that he is an officer who is to be paid, and to be paid solely, by piecework. He is to do that work partly for the guardians and partly for outside private persons, and he is to be paid by fees which are fixed by the statute; he has no legal right to any other remuneration from the guardians or from members of the public as such.

That being so, the first statute to refer to—although it is not the first in date, it is most convenient to refer to it first—is the Poor Law Officers' Superannuation Act, 1896—the Act that is said to make this payment a payment authorized by law. That is an Act of Parliament the object of which, and the sole object of which, was to provide for pensions for poor law officers and servants and for their contribution to such pensions. It provides by section 2 that every officer and servant in the service or employment of the guardians shall in certain circumstances be entitled to a pension. Section 3 provides for the ascertainment of the amount of the pension; it is a certain proportion according to length of service of his salary or wages and emoluments during a certain period. Then comes the section with which we are mainly concerned, section 19, the definition section: "'Officer' includes every officer in the service of an authority to whom this Act applies whether his whole time is devoted to the duties of his office or not; and for the purposes of this Act superintendent registrars and registrars of births and deaths and school attendance officers are deemed to be in the service of the guardians of the union in which their districts are situated." That, as it seems to me, quite clearly does not establish any relation of master and servant between the registrar of births and deaths and the guardians. It does not impose upon him any duty of obedience or any of the other characteristic duties of a servant, or impose upon the guardians any of the liabilities of employers or any of the rights of employers, and among other things I think it does not give to the guardians any discretion as employers to alter the scale of pay fixed by statute, or the method of pay fixed by statute, for their officers.

Then in the same section, under the heading of emoluments, one finds: "'Emoluments' includes all fees, poundage, and other payments made to any officer or servant as such for his own use; also the money value of any apartments, rations, or other allowances in kind appertaining to his office or employment." It appears to me that that cannot mean any sums or advantages which he in fact gets hold of, whether with the sanction of the law or without it. It must mean sums paid to him within the law, and the case of Salford Guardians v. Dewhurst (42 The Times L.R., 657; [1926] A.C., 619) in the House of Lords, which has been referred to, was a case where the gratuity held to be part of the emoluments was a gratuity paid by people who had a right to expend public money in that way on persons who had a right to receive it. Therefore, so far as the Act of 1896 is concerned, it does not appear to me to show at all that this payment is a payment authorized by law, and I think it is directed to altogether different matters.

The only other statute relied upon is the Local Authorities (Expenses) Act of 1887. That is an Act to amend the law relating to expenses of local authorities, and it provides that expenses paid by any local authority whose accounts are subject to audit by a district auditor shall not be disallowed by that auditor if they have been sanctioned by the Local Government Board. This, of course, cannot be relied upon as showing that the Local Government Board have approved, if they have not in fact approved them. I do not want to discuss whether they have approved or not; I do not want to embark upon any speculations of that kind. If they have in fact approved, the section is invoked as showing that this is a payment authorized by law.

The question, therefore, is whether this shows an intention of Parliament that a local authority may, within the law, expend public funds in any manner sanctioned by the public department which controls them. It would require, to my mind, very wide words indeed to bring about so startling a result. It would, I think, be a very dangerous reading, and would open the door to oppression. It seems to me that this statute means no more than I think it says, that Local Government Board auditors are not to disallow that which their Board has sanctioned. It deals with auditing methods. Mr. Wingate-Saul shrank from reading this statute in the wide sense to which I have just referred, and he said that it meant that local authorities might lawfully expend the public money in any manner reasonably sanctioned by the public department. Who is to decide whether the sanction was reasonable; is it to be the auditor or is it to be a Court of law? I do not think that such a reading is possible, and I do not think that this statute in any way makes this payment a payment authorized by law.

The grounds on which the rule is moved are that the district auditor had no jurisdiction to make the surcharge. I agree that he had none. The second is that the gratuities referred to in the surcharge were emoluments within the meaning of the Act. I do not think that they were. The third is that the sanction of the Minister of Health legalized the payment. If that means that it made the payments payments sanctioned by the law, I do not think that it did. The fourth is that the superannuation allowance was allowed in previous audits. I cannot think that the fact that this auditor had omitted to do his duty before prevents him from doing it now.

For those reasons I have thought it necessary, although the matter may not in this case be of much practical importance, to give my reasons for holding that the district auditor was right in disallowing, though not in surcharging, this sum.

K.B. Div.
(Lord Hewart, C.J., Avory and Salter, JJ.)
1926. Oct. 28.

Criminal Law — Assault on prison officer — "Powers, authorities, protection, and privileges of a constable"—Sentence as for assault on constable—Prevention of Crimes Act, 1871 (34 and 35 Vict., c. 112), s. 12—Prison Act, 1898 (61 and 62 Vict., c. 41), s. 10.

Section 10 of the Prison Act, 1898, enacts that "Every prison officer while acting as such shall have all the powers, authorities, protection, and privileges of a constable." A convict who assaults a warder on duty is therefore liable to be sentenced by a Court of summary jurisdiction to six months' hard labour, that being the punishment provided by s. 12 of the Prevention of Crimes Act, 1871, for assaulting a constable when in the execution of his duty.

This was a case stated by Hampshire Quarter Sessions for the opinion of the King's Bench Division upon a point of law which arose upon the hearing of an appeal against a conviction of the appellant by the magistrates of the Petty Sessions holden at Newport, Isle of Wight, within the said county.

The appellant was a convict serving a sentence of penal servitude in Parkhurst prison, Isle of Wight. The respondent was a warder in the said prison and was a prison officer within the meaning of the Prison Act, 1898 (61 and 62 Vict., c. 41).

On June 26, 1926, the appellant was charged before the said Petty Sessions for that he on May 15, 1926, did unlawfully assault the respondent when acting in the execution of his duty as prison officer, contrary to the statute in such case made and provided. The justices, having heard the evidence, convicted the appellant and sentenced him to six months' imprisonment with hard labour, such sentence to take effect from the completion of the sentence of penal servitude.

The appellant duly appealed to the said Quarter Sessions against the said conviction and sentence, and on July 20, 1926, the appeal came on for hearing before Quarter Sessions.

Upon the hearing of the appeal counsel for the appellant contended that the conviction was bad on the face thereof for the reason that for the offence charged against the appellant the justices had no power to impose a sentence of six months' imprisonment. He pointed out that power to impose such a sentence depended upon whether section 10 of the Prison Act, 1898, extended and made applicable to prison officers the statutory provisions which rendered the offence of assaulting a police constable in the execution of his duty an offence triable summarily before justices at Petty Sessions, and he contended that it did not.

He contended that the charge could only have been dealt with as a common assault, the maximum penalty for which, if dealt with on summary proceedings before a Petty Sessional Court, was two months' imprisonment, with or without hard labour. (See section 42 of the Offences against the Person Act, 1861, 24 and 25 Vict., c. 100.)

There were various statutes which rendered the offence of assaulting a police constable in the execution of his duty an offence triable before justices at Petty Sessions, see in reference to county police the County Police Act, 1839 (2 and 3 Vict., c. 93, section 8), which incorporates section 11 of the Special Constables Act, 1831 (1 and 2 William IV., c. 41); in reference to borough police the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882 (45 and 46 Vict., c. 50, section 195). By section 12 of the Prevention of Crimes Act, 1871 (34 and 35 Vict., c. 112), it was provided that where any person is convicted of an assault on any constable when in the execution of his duty such person shall, in the discretion of the Court, be liable to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding six months, with or without hard labour. Section 10 of the Prison Act, 1898, provided that every prison officer while acting as such shall by virtue of his appointment have all the powers, authorities, protection, and privileges of a constable.

After hearing argument Quarter Sessions overruled the above contention of the appellant's counsel, being of opinion that the purpose and effect of the statutory provisions which made it an offence to assault a constable in the execution of his duty were the protection of such constable and that such protection was extended and made applicable to a prison officer by section 10 of the Prison Act, 1898.

Quarter Sessions accordingly proceeded with the hearing of the appeal and in the result dismissed it. On the application of counsel for the appellant they stated this case in reference to his contention as set out above.

The question for the opinion of the King's Bench Division was whether it was within the powers of the Court of Petty Sessions to pass upon the appellant in respect of the offence with which he was charged the sentence of six months' imprisonment, with hard labour.

Mr. W. E. Lloyd appeared for the appellant; Mr. H. G. Garland for the respondent.

Mr. Lloyd, in opening the case, said that it was one in which the Court would have no sympathy for the appellant whatever. There was no authority upon the point raised. The appellant, Pointing, was, in May last, a convict undergoing a sentence of three years' penal servitude for unlawful wounding. On May 15 he was said to have assaulted the respondent, Augustus Wilson, a prison officer. On May 17 he was brought before the Governor. He referred the matter to the visiting justices, who recommended that he should be flogged. That sentence could not be carried out as the appellant suffered from a weak heart.

On June 18 a summons was taken out against the appellant, and on June 26 he was sentenced by a Court of summary jurisdiction to six months' imprisonment, with hard labour, to follow his sentence of penal servitude, in spite of his contention that the justices had no jurisdiction as it was only his good fortune and not his fault that he had not already been flogged.

Pointing appealed to Quarter Sessions, which dismissed his appeal, but stated a case upon the additional point which had been taken on his behalf —namely, whether a person who assaulted a warder was liable to the same penalty on summary conviction as for assaulting a constable, i.e., six months' imprisonment, instead of the two months' imprisonment which was the maximum for an assault on an ordinary individual. By section 10 of the Prison Act, 1898, prison officers were to have "all the powers, authorities, protection, and privileges of a constable." The question was whether the section imposing the heavier penalty for assaulting the constable was a "protection" of the constable within the meaning of that expression. He referred to Archbold's Criminal Pleading ; Stone's Justices' Manual ; and Halsbury's Laws of England, vol. IX., p. 576, and submitted that "protection" referred to the immunity conferred upon police officers for acts done in the execution of their duty. The prison officer was more efficiently protected by the various punishments, culminating in flogging, which might be awarded by the Governor or the visiting justices.

Mr. GARLAND was not called upon.

The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE said that it was a perfectly clear case. The question was whether it was within the power of the Petty Sessional Court to pass on the appellant the sentence of six months' imprisonment, with hard labour. The Quarter Sessions, to which he appealed, were of opinion that it was, and he thought the Quarter Sessions were right. It was not disputed that if the appellant, or, indeed, anybody, assaulted a constable when in the execution of his duty he would be liable to six months' imprisonment, with hard labour. The argument was that that provision relating to punishment did not apply to a prison officer acting in the due discharge of his duty. But section 10 of the Prison Act, 1898, conferred on prison officers, acting as such, all the powers, authorities, and protection of police constables.

The argument for the appellant seemed to depend on two errors. First, it seemed to ignore the whole of that section except the word "protection" ; and, secondly, to put a very narrow limit on the meaning of protection. It involved the desperate proposition that the public was not protected by the fact that there was a punishment for assault.

He thought that the section clearly put prison officers on the same footing with constables so far as the measure of punishment for assaults upon them was concerned. The appellant's proposition was unarguable and the appeal failed.

MR. JUSTICE AVORY and MR. JUSTICE SALTER concurred.

DAPHNE v. SHAW.*

Revenue — Income-tax — Schedule D—Deductions—Machinery and plant—Wear and tear — Obsolescence — Solicitor's law-books — Whether included in "plant"—Finance Act, 1925 (15 and 16 Geo. V., c. 36), s. 16.

The word "plant" in s. 16 of the Finance Act, 1925, which extends to professions the allowance granted to traders under Schedule D of the Income Tax Act, 1918, for the wear and tear and obsolescence of machinery and plant, does not include a solicitor's books which he consults for professional purposes.

This was a case stated by the General Commissioners of Income Tax for the division of Finsbury.

The appellant, Mr. Frank Daphne, appealed to the General Commissioners against an assessment made upon him, under Schedule D of the Income Tax Acts for the year ending April 5, 1926, in respect of the profits of his profession as a solicitor.

In support of his appeal the appellant submitted accounts for the three years ending July 31, 1924. From the average for the three years the appellant claimed to deduct £8 as an allowance for—(a) wear and tear of part of his law library during the year ; and (b) obsolescence of certain books forming part of that library.

It was contended by the appellant : (1) that, under section 16 of the Finance Act, 1925, which extended to professions, employments, vocations, and offices the allowance granted to traders by the Income Tax Act, 1918 (Schedule D, cases 1 and 2, rules 6 and 7), in respect of the wear and tear of machinery and plant, and in respect of expenses incurred in replacing obsolete machinery and plant, he was entitled to prefer a claim for wear and tear of his law library during the year, that being his machinery or plant for the purposes of his profession ; and, further, that he was entitled to claim for certain legal books which had become obsolete in consequence of new legislation ; (2) that the £8 claimed by him was, in the circumstances, a reasonable sum, and should be allowed.

The inspector of taxes contended that the appellant was not entitled to the deduction claimed. Earl of Derby v. Aylmer (31 The Times L.R., 528 ; [1915] 3 K.B., 374) was referred to.

It was agreed that if the General Commissioners decided in favour of the appellant £8 should be deducted.

The General Commissioners held that the books in the law library of the appellant were neither machinery nor plant, and that he was not entitled to relief for either wear and tear or obsolescence in respect thereof.

Mr. Daphne appeared in person ; the Solicitor-General (Sir Thomas Inskip, K.C.) and Mr. R. P. Hills for the Crown.

His LORDSHIP, in giving judgment, said that he was unable to say that the books of a solicitor, or of a barrister, or of a Judge, which were used in the sense of being consulted, were plant. It was impossible to deny the suggestion which one naturally conjured up when the word "plant" was added to the word "machinery." Though section 16 of the Finance Act, 1925, had extended the provisions of Schedule D, that extension did not involve an extension of the sense in which the word "plant" was used. Undoubtedly there were many professions or avocations where plant and machinery were used which would be covered by the use of the words as ordinarily understood. He was sure 99 out of every 100 persons would exclude from plant and machinery the books of reference on their shelves. Undoubtedly the books which were used in the professions did entail a great expense, but he had to administer the law as he found it, and must, therefore, dismiss the appeal, with costs.

* Reported by G. G. BEAGLEY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

GLICKSMAN v. LANCASHIRE AND GENERAL ASSURANCE COMPANY, LIMITED.*

Insurance (Burglary)—Misrepresentation—Concealment—Materiality—Evidence.

The appellant and his partner made to the respondent insurance company through the company's agent a proposal for insurance against burglary. One of the questions on the proposal form was, "Has any company declined to accept or refused to renew your burglary insurance?" The plaintiff and his partner answered jointly, "Yorkshire accept, but proposers refused on account of fire proposal," meaning that the Yorkshire company were willing to grant a burglary policy but refused to do so unless at the same time the assured took out a policy against fire. In fact the appellant had, before the commencement of the partnership, been refused by the Sun Company. The respondents issued the policy, and it contained a condition that any misrepresentation, suppression, concealment, or untrue averment in the answers to the questions on the proposal form should render the policy absolutely void. The partnership having been dissolved during the currency of the policy, the latter was continued for the benefit of the appellant alone. Subsequently the appellant made a claim on the policy. The respondents refused to pay on the grounds (inter alia) that the policy was avoided by misrepresentation in the answer to the question on the proposal form and by concealment of a material fact, and in an arbitration the arbitrator decided in favour of the respondents on both grounds but stated a case.

Held, that there were grounds for supporting the finding of the arbitrator that the refusal of the appellant by the Sun Company was a material fact which ought to have been disclosed, and the award of the arbitrator must be affirmed.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (41 The Times L.R., 566; [1925] 2 K.B., 593) affirmed.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal (41 The Times L.R., 566; [1925] 2 K.B., 593) reversing a decision of Mr. Justice Roche (41 The Times L.R., 434) on a claim made under a burglary insurance policy.

The questions raised by the appeal were whether, in an insurance proposal form signed by partners, it was a misrepresentation to reply to the question, "Has any company declined to accept or refused to renew your burglary insurance?" without disclosing the fact that one of the partners alone had previously had a proposal refused; and whether that non-disclosure amounted to a concealment of a material fact vitiating the policy.

In 1916 the appellant started business in partnership with his cousin, Philip Glicksman, as a ladies' tailor at 4, Albert-square, Commercial-road, and the appellant resided on the premises. In 1918 Philip Glicksman retired from the firm, and from 1918 to 1922 the appellant carried on the business alone and on the same premises. On June 19, 1919, the appellant made a written proposal signed by him to the Sun Insurance Office for the insurance of his stock-in-trade against loss or damage by burglary and housebreaking, and this proposal was declined.

Some time in 1922 the appellant took into partnership one H. Roman, and on November 9, 1922, he and H. Roman, who were then carrying on business on the said premises, made a proposal in writing to the respondents on their printed proposal form for insurance, against burglary and housebreaking, on their stock and utensils in trade on the premises in the sum of £1,800. The proposal form contained, in addition, a number of questions to be answered by the proposers, of which the following, with the answers thereto, were material:—

"7. Have you previously been insured against burglary? If so give name of company.

"Answer: No.

"8. Has any company declined to accept or refused to renew your burglary insurance, or increased your premium, or required special terms or additional precautions to be taken? If so state name of company and dates.

"Answer: Yorkshire accept, but proposers refused on account of fire proposal. . . ."

That proposal was accepted by the respondents and a policy was accordingly issued. It contained a proviso

"that the statements made by the assured in the aforesaid proposal and declaration are true in all respects, and that if either this policy or any renewal thereof be obtained through any misrepresentation, suppression, concealment or untrue averment whatsoever by or on behalf of the assured . . . then this policy and any renewal thereof and all claims thereunder shall be absolutely void . . . ."

The appellant was unable to read or to write except that he could sign his name. On December 15, 1922, the partnership between him and H. Roman was dissolved, and the appellant took over the business and stock-in-trade and continued to carry on the business on his own account, and to reside on the premises with his family. A memorandum dated December 19, 1922, was indorsed on the policy to the effect that the interest therein was thenceforth vested in the appellant alone.

During the period covered by the policy—namely, on the night of February 25, 1923—burglars broke into the premises and stole and carried away part of the stock-in-trade therein, to the value of £1,656 6s. 3d. On March 10, 1923, the appellant made a claim on the respondents for that amount, for which the respondents repudiated liability, and the matter was referred to arbitration. The respondents' defence in its original form was a general denial, but during the reference the arbitrator allowed the respondents to amend their points of defence by pleading the following additional defence :—

"It was warranted by the policy that the statements made by the applicant in his proposal in writing dated November 9, 1922, were true in all respects and that if the policy should be obtained through any misrepresentation, suppression, concealment, or untrue averment by or on behalf of the applicant the policy and all claims thereunder shall be absolutely void. In the said proposal the applicant in answer to the question 'Has any company declined to accept or refused to renew your burglary insurance ?' stated 'Yorkshire accept, but proposers refused on account of fire proposal.' In fact in a written proposal dated June 19, 1919, the applicant had offered his burglary insurance to the Sun Insurance Office and the said Sun Insurance Office had declined the said insurance by letter to the applicant dated June 20, 1919."

The arbitrator stated his award in the form of a special case. He found that the appellant had suffered loss within the meaning of the policy for the full amount of his claim, viz., £1,656 6s. 3d. ; that the answer to the eighth question was untrue ; and that, subject to the opinion of the Court, the respondents were under no liability to the appellant.

By a supplemental award made pursuant to the directions of the Court, the arbitrator declared that the respondents were also entitled to avoid the policy by reason of the concealment or non-disclosure of the material fact that the Sun Insurance Office had previously declined the appellant's proposal as stated in the special case.

Mr. Justice Roche held that the answer to question 8 was not untrue or inaccurate so as to avoid the policy, and that, upon the point of concealment, there was no evidence that the refusal of the Sun Insurance Office had not been communicated to Cohen, the agent of the respondents. He therefore gave judgment for the appellant.

The Court of Appeal (Lord Justice Bankes, Lord Justice Scrutton, and Lord Justice Sargant) reversed that decision, holding that there was sufficient ground to support the arbitrator's finding that the refusal of the former proposal made by the appellant was a material fact which ought to have been disclosed, and that there was sufficient evidence of concealment of that fact. Lord Justice Scrutton and Lord Justice Sargant further held that there was evidence to support the finding that the answer to question 8 was untrue, Lord Justice Bankes expressing no opinion on that point.

Mr. Croom-Johnson and Mr. Claud Mullins appeared for the appellant ; Mr. Rayner Goddard, K.C., and Mr. H. C. Dickens for the respondents.

Viscount Dunedin.—My Lords : One Sapsy Glicksman, a small ladies' tailor, insured against burglary his stock in trade. A burglary happened and a large portion of his stock in trade was taken away, but upon his applying to the insurance company for the insurance money he was met by the allegation that there had been no burglary and no stock in trade. They went to arbitration, and here is what the learned arbitrator said :—"On the hearing of the reference during the opening of the case for the claimant, counsel for the respondents stated to me that the only point he intended to raise was that there had been no burglary as alleged by the claimant and that the goods for which the claim was made were not upon the said premises at the date of such alleged burglary and had not been removed or stolen by burglars as alleged." That was a very serious accusation. It was an accusation which, if it was true, would have put the man in the dock. I remember myself giving somebody three years' penal servitude for exactly the same sort of thing. Here is what the arbitrator said about it :—"I find that the goods in respect of which the claim was made were upon the said premises at such date and were stolen and removed by burglars as alleged by the claimant, and that the claimant thereby suffered loss and damage to the amount of £1,656 6s. 3d." But, in the course of the examination of the claimant, in answer to some more or less casual questions, it seems that he said that he had been turned down by another office, and thereupon the insurance company remembered that he had, like other people, signed a paper when he made application for insurance, and accordingly they asked leave and got leave to put in an amended point of defence. The amended point of defence was :—"It was warranted by the policy that the statements made by the applicant in his proposal in writing dated November 9, 1922, were true in all respects, and that if the policy should be obtained through any misrepresentation, suppression, concealment, or untrue averment"—it should be absolutely void. Then it was said that he had, as a matter of fact, in answer to a question, "Has any company declined to accept or refused to renew your burglary insurance ?" said, "Yorkshire accept, but proposers refused on account of fire proposal" ; whereas, in fact, in a written proposal dated June 19, 1919, the applicant had offered his burglary insurance to the Sun Insurance Office and the said Sun Insurance Office had declined it. It was not quite plain sailing even then, because when the proposal came to be looked at it was found that at the time when the proposal was made he was in partnership. The word "you" in English is either singular or plural, and when you come to the answers to the questions there is, what I may call, a somewhat inextricable confusion between the singular and the plural. Of course, literally speaking, if the word "you" is used in the plural, as naturally it should have been because two people were applying, then it was quite true that there had not been any refusal of an insurance ; but it was not true if you take it in the singular. The arbitrator came to the conclusion that it voided the policy and an appeal was taken on a stated case to Mr. Justice Roche. Mr. Justice Roche came to an opposite conclusion—I do not altogether wonder when one thinks of the scene : On the one hand Mr. Cohen, agent for the insurance company, keen, as he was quite entitled and bound to be, to get business for the insurance company, and, on the other hand, this wretched little ladies' tailor of whom the arbitrator tells us that he could neither read nor write and could only sign his name, and whose natural and best language was Yiddish and not English—surely an impar congressus. Mr. Justice Roche held that there was no proof of concealment ; and he held upon the other question that the answer was really made in the plural.

My Lords, for the reasons that I shall presently state, I am unable to agree with Mr. Justice Roche, but at least I am left with this impression, that those—shall I call them attractive ?—qualities which we are prone to ascribe to the Hebrews, among whom Shylock has always been the prototype, have been quite as satisfactorily developed on the part of this insurance company as ever they were by the little Polish Jew.

Then I come to the law. It has often been stated, but perhaps it is just as well to state it again. A contract of insurance is denominated a contract uberrimae fidei. It is possible for persons to stipulate that answers to certain questions shall be the basis of the insurance, and if that is done then there is no question as to materiality left, because the persons have contracted that there should be materiality in those questions; but quite apart from that, and alongside of that, there is the duty of no concealment of any consideration which would affect the mind of the ordinary prudent man in accepting the risk. Now, as I have said, upon this proposal two questions arose. First, the question arose upon what I call the plural and the singular. One of the learned Judges in the Court of Appeal has said that he would like further to consider this. Mr. Justice Roche decided it in the sense that the question was really put in the plural and that therefore there was no untrue answer. There were certain cases quoted to us which go to the same view. Two of the learned Judges in the Court of Appeal took the other view. My Lords, I do not think it necessary that we should come to a conclusion on which of these views is right, and I therefore do not propose myself to express any opinion upon them because I think the ground of judgment is quite clear on the other point. It is narrow enough, because when you come to the law as to materiality and concealment, of course there are certain circumstances which are so obviously material that it will not be taken from any man to say that he did not know it. If you are insuring a ship on a time policy and that ship had been badly knocked about three weeks before, of course you could not be heard to say that you did not think that was a material circumstance. But here the whole point really comes to turn upon this—and this is the ground of the judgment of the learned Judges in the Court of Appeal—that, never minding the singular or the plural, the fact that a question of this sort was put showed that the insurance company thought it was material whether a proposal had been refused or not, and that that was brought to the knowledge of the claimant. My Lords, under the circumstances I have considerable doubts, but then I am not entitled to take any view of my own on that, because that is a fact and the arbitrator has found it as a fact and I cannot get beyond the arbitrator's finding. I think that the reasoning of the learned Judges in the Court of Appeal is impeccable. It was brought to the knowledge of the claimant that it was a material fact and he certainly did not disclose it and, therefore, the policy is void.

Therefore, my Lords, with unfeigned regret, I move your Lordships that this appeal be dismissed with such costs as there are in a case in forma pauperis.

Lord Atkinson.—My Lords: I concur. I wish to say one word in reference to the observations of Lord Justice Scrutton. I think it is a lamentable thing that insurance companies will abstain from shaping the questions that they put to intending insurers on such occasions in clear and unambiguous language. For instance, in this particular case, all that it was necessary to say was, "Did you two or either of you make an application to the Sun Insurance Company for a policy against burglary?" This whole case and all the expense would have been prevented had that simple method been adopted.

Lord Shaw of Dunfermline.—My Lords: I agree with both the judgments just delivered.

Lord Wrenbury.—My Lords: It is with the very greatest reluctance that I concur in the motion which is proposed from the Woolsack. I think it a mean and contemptible policy on the part of an insurance company that it should take the premiums and then refuse to pay upon a ground which no one says was material. Here, upon purely technical grounds, they, having in point of fact not been deceived in any material particular, choose to avail themselves of what seems to me the contemptible defence that, although they have taken the premiums, they are protected from paying.

Lord Carson.—My Lords: Without committing myself to the strictures passed upon the respondent company I concur in the conclusion arrived at that the appeal should be dismissed with costs as proposed.

BIRKENHEAD SCHOOL, LIMITED v. DRING.*

Revenue—Income-tax—Public school—Claim of allowance—Absence of elements of permanence—Income Tax Act, 1918 (8 and 9 Geo. V., c. 40), Sched. A, No. VI., r. 1 (c).

The appellants, a limited company, owned and carried on a high-class secondary school managed by Governors who were partly elected by the shareholders and partly nominated by the Crown. By the company's articles no profit was to be divided amongst members. Practically the whole of the receipts of the company arose from fees paid for pupils. The appellants claimed under Schedule A, No. VI., rule 1 (c), of the Income Tax Act, 1918, an allowance on the ground that the school was a public school.

Held, that the elements of permanence connoted by the word "foundation" were part of the essence of a public school, and as these elements were absent the appellants were not entitled to the allowance claimed.

This was a case stated by the Commissioners for the General Purposes of the Income Tax Acts.

The appellants, the Birkenhead School, Limited, a limited company formed under the Companies Acts, appealed against assessments to income-tax under Schedule A of the Income Tax Acts for the year ending April 5, 1922. The amount of the assessments was not in dispute, but the company claimed to be entitled to relief under Schedule A, No. VI., Rule 1 (c) of the Income Tax Act, 1918, in respect of the school buildings, offices, and premises belonging to the company.

The rule provides as follows:—

"The following further allowances shall be made under this schedule:— . . . (c) The amount of the tax charged on any . . . public school . . . in respect of the public buildings, offices, and premises belonging thereto, and so far as not occupied by any individual . . . master thereof whose total annual income . . . amounts to £150 or more, or by a person paying rent for the same."

The company owned and carried on at Birkenhead the Birkenhead School, which, with the preparatory school attached, was a high-class secondary school of about 450 boys, of whom about 40 were boarders in the school house. It was managed by a governing body consisting of not less than three and not more than 15 governors, who were elected by the shareholders of the company in accordance with the articles of association, together with three special governors nominated by the Crown. The governors of the school were directors of the company.

By Article 84 of the articles of association it was provided that "No bonus, dividend, or profit shall be paid, allotted, or divided to or amongst the members, but all surplus revenue, or any part thereof, shall be carried to reserve, or applied towards the reduction of debt, or the increase of the benefits and usefulness of Birkenhead School and Birkenhead Preparatory School in such manner as the governors shall in their absolute discretion think fit."

No bonus or dividend had ever been paid to the shareholders since the incorporation of the company.

The school buildings, playing-fields, and lands were acquired by and were the property of the company. Practically the whole of the receipts of the company arose from fees paid for pupils. Shares in the company were frequently purchased by parents who desired to send their sons to the school, as, in addition to the ordinary school fees, a "nomination" fee of £1 11s. 6d. per term was charged in the case of boys who were sons of persons who were not shareholders in the company, or who were not nominated by a shareholder.

It was contended on behalf of the company that the Birkenhead School was a public school in that it possessed the four necessary elements :—(i) it had a charitable substratum ; (ii) it was managed by a public body—namely, a body of governors without remuneration and including Government nominees : (iii) no private person had any interest in the school ; and (iv) it had as its object the benefiting of a large class of the community ; and therefore the company was entitled to an allowance on the amount of the tax charged, as being an amount charged on a public school in respect of the premises belonging thereto.

It was contended, inter alia, on behalf of the Crown that the school did not fulfil the tests for establishing that it was a public school, and that no allowance could be granted under Schedule A, No. VI., Rule 1 (c).

The General Commissioners were of opinion that the school had a charitable substratum and that it was for the benefit of a large class ; but that it was not managed by a public body, and that the profits and other benefits did become payable to or receivable by private persons, and further, that the school had not a perpetual foundation. They held that the company was not entitled to exemption either as a public school or as a charity.

Mr. Cyril King appeared for the appellants ; the Solicitor-General (Sir Thomas Inskip, K.C.) and Mr. R. P. Hills for the Crown.

Mr. Justice Rowlatt, in giving judgment, said that the foundation of the Birkenhead School was not of a permanent character. It continued to exist because it offered, so far as the boys and their parents were concerned, the advantages of a public school, but the continuance of its existence was dependent on the corporate will of the members of the company. It was true that the members of the company had hitherto received no dividend, but the company was something more than the mere machinery for collecting subscriptions to found a school. The case was really one of a company which was running a school without paying dividends, but which was liable to be wound up at any time. The elements of permanence connoted by the word "foundation" were part of the essence of a public school, and those elements were here absent. He was of opinion, therefore, that the finding of the General Commissioners was right and that the appeal must be dismissed.

TATE AND LYLE, LIMITED v. LONDON AND NORTH EASTERN RAILWAY COMPANY AND LONDON MIDLAND AND SCOTTISH RAILWAY COMPANY.*

Railways — Rates — Transitional period till appointed day—Power to reduce rates and then raise them within maximum—Railways Act, 1921 (11 and 12 Geo. V., c. 55), s. 60.

Under s. 60 of the Railways Act, 1921, which applies to the transitional period between August 15, 1921, and the day to be appointed by the Railway Rates Tribunal for the coming into force of the new rates to be approved by the Tribunal, the rates in existence on August 15, 1921, are maximum rates, and the railway companies are entitled to reduce them, and to raise them again without applying to the Tribunal, if by so doing they do not exceed the maximum.

Decision of Astbury, J. (42 The Times L.R., 725), affirmed.

This was an appeal from a judgment of Mr. Justice Astbury (42 The Times L.R., 725) which raised a question of outstanding interest to the trading community and to all persons interested in railways.

The action was brought by the plaintiffs, on behalf of themselves and other traders, as a test case to question the right of the defendant companies and other railway companies to charge certain rates. The amount involved by the decision was said to be about £25,000,000, although the action itself was in respect of a small sum. The facts, as found by Mr. Justice Astbury, were shortly as follows :—

The action was brought by agreement in respect of certain consignments of sugar handed by the plaintiffs to the defendant companies. The companies, by their counter-claims, sought payment of the difference between the amount of the minimum reduced charges and of the new charges made by the companies after June 29, 1926, under notices given by them on June 12, 1926.

In September, 1920, the base rates previously charged were raised by the Minister of Transport by

* Reported by G. T. Whitfield-Hayes, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

100 per cent., together with a flat rate of a shilling per ton. That order affected not only the normal base rates, but also the "exceptional rates" which the companies charged to certain traders for carriage over certain distances, according to the particular mode of conveyance or the volume of traffic carried. Those exceptional rates formed about 80 per cent. of the rates charged, and amounted in number to about 80,000,000. By the Railways Act, 1921, the existing railway companies were amalgamated into four groups, and a new Court was formed called the Railway Rates Tribunal, which, as regards questions of rates, took the place of the Railway and Canal Commission. The control of the Minister of Transport over the railways was to cease on August 15, 1921, and the companies were to prepare a new classification of merchandise and new schedules of rates (to be called standard charges), which were to be approved by the Tribunal.

Those new standard charges were to come into force on a day to be fixed by the Tribunal called the "appointed day," but the preparation of the classification and schedules had proved a much longer task than was expected, and the "appointed day" had not yet been fixed. The Act contained stringent provisions as to existing exceptional rates, which were either to be agreed between the companies and the traders or fixed by the Tribunal, and provisions were made as to new exceptional rates.

Section 60, upon which this appeal really turned, contained the transitory provisions until the appointed day, under which the existing rates were to be continued as in force on August 15, 1921.

The material parts of section 60 were as follows:—

"A . . . railway company which is liable to have applied to it a schedule of standard charges shall, notwithstanding anything contained in any special or general Act or in any agreement, be entitled till the appointed day to make such charges . . . as were in force as respects the railway on the fifteenth day of August, 1921, or, where no such charges were in force on that date, then such reasonable charges as shall, in case of difference, be determined by the Rates Tribunal:

"Provided that at any time after the said fifteenth day of August, and before the appointed day,

(i.) Any representative body of traders may apply to the Rates Tribunal to reduce the aforesaid charges or any of them . . ."

Sub-clause (ii.) gave a similar right to a single trader, and (iii.) a right to a railway company to apply for an increase.

Under that section the Federation of British Industries, a representative body of traders, in May, 1922, applied to the Rates Tribunal to reduce the rates, and an arrangement was made with the companies whereby the rates were reduced from 100 per cent. to 75 per cent. above the old base rates, and the flat rate per ton was reduced from 1s. to 6d. In May, 1923, the companies voluntarily reduced the rates to 60 per cent. above the base rates. In July, 1923, on a further application by the Federation of British Industries, an arrangement was made by which the rates were reduced to 50 per cent. above the base rates. On neither of those applications was any order made by the Tribunal, except that by consent the applications were dismissed.

One question which arose in the present action was whether the arrangement made in July, 1923, constituted a binding legal agreement that the rates then fixed should continue until the appointed day unless varied by the Tribunal, as the plaintiffs contended, or whether, as the companies contended, they were at liberty at any time to raise those rates provided that they did not exceed the rates in force on August 15, 1921.

On June 12, 1926, all the railway companies gave notice that as from June 29 the exceptional rates charged under the arrangement would be increased to the level of 60 per cent. above the base rates. To this the traders objected, and by arrangement this action was brought as a test case. The plaintiffs contended that, apart from the question of the nature of the arrangement made in July, 1923, the companies had no power under section 60 of the Act of 1921 to raise any rate which had been reduced unless they had the consent of the Railway Rates Tribunal. The companies contended that the rates mentioned in the section were only maximum rates, and that they were entitled to raise any rate that had been reduced, without application to the Tribunal, provided that it did not exceed the maximum.

A further special question arose between the plaintiffs and the defendant companies. Before July, 1923, the companies had charged the plaintiffs for the conveyance of sugar from Silvertown to Leicester the same exceptional rate in whatever manner the goods were conveyed; but after that date they agreed to carry sugar, if sent in consignments of five tons or more on a truck, at a slightly lower rate, i.e., 22s. 6d. per ton instead of 22s. 8d. The plaintiffs claimed that that was a new exceptional rate which, under section 37 of the Act of 1921, could only be varied by the Railway Rates Tribunal. The defendant companies contended that there was a rate in existence on August 15, 1921, for the conveyance of sugar in five-ton trucks which was the same as in the case of other modes of conveyance, and that the reduced rate was only a favour granted and that they were entitled to raise it like any other rate.

Mr. Justice Astbury found for the defendants on both points. On the main question he thought that the companies were entitled to reduce their rates, and, having reduced them, to raise them again without applying to the Tribunal, provided that they did not exceed the maximum in force in August, 1921.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Mr. W. A. Greene, K.C., and the Hon. Stafford Cripps appeared for the appellants; Sir John Simon, K.C., and Mr. Bruce Thomas for the respondents.

The Master of the Rolls, in the course of his considered judgment, said that the question really turned on the construction of section 60 of the Act of 1921. Agreeing, as he did, with the judgment of Mr. Justice Astbury, it would have been hardly necessary to do more than express his concurrence but for the fact that the case had been fully argued afresh in the Court of Appeal.

Section 1 of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1894, cast upon the railways the onus of proving that any increase of rates made after December 31, 1892, was reasonable. By the Ministry of Transport Act, 1919, any rates or charges directed by the Minister of Transport were to be "deemed to be reasonable" while the Minister controlled the railways. Under that Act orders were made for increases of the rates charged, up to 100 per cent., and those were the rates which were legally in force when the Railways Act, 1921, became operative on August 19, 1921. The companies then took over control. The rates charged were "deemed to be reasonable" under the Act of 1919, and, the first section of the Act of 1894 being expressly repealed by section 86 of the Act of 1921, the companies were relieved from the burden of establishing that their charges were reasonable. It mattered not whether they were originally standard rates or exceptional rates; they might be the rates of 1913, plus 100 per cent., plus a flat rate. However arrived at, they were the rates enforceable and enforced.

The purpose of the Railways Act, 1921, was to fix standard rates, but until the ambitious schemes to that end were realized section 60 provided transitory provisions. (His Lordship read the material parts of the section.) The railways meanwhile were "entitled" to make the charges in force on August 15, 1921, and the right was expressed to be "notwithstanding anything contained in any special or general Act, or in any agreement." By those words all restrictions or hampering engagements were simply swept away, and the end was reached by a short cut.

In his opinion it was significant that in the section the word "charges" was used; it was not right to read it as a synonym for "rates." The inclusive term "charges" seemed to be used advisedly. The charges in force in August, 1921, were maxima. The railways were "entitled" to charge them, and their discretion to do so was not fettered. There was no express limitation of the railway companies' power to vary them. If some limitation were to be introduced to cut down the simple words "shall be entitled till the appointed day to make such charges," it must be derived aliunde—from some Act of Parliament, or agreement, or from the history of the past, all of which was swept away by the words beginning "notwithstanding."

The appellants argued that the main part of section 60 was to be interpreted by a consideration of the proviso—

"Provided that at any time after the said fifteenth day of August, and before the appointed day,

"(i.) any representative body of traders may apply to the Rates Tribunal to reduce the aforesaid charges . . ."

and they said that a special meaning must be given to "aforesaid charges." He agreed with Mr. Justice Astbury that "aforesaid charges" must mean the charges in force in August, 1921. He could not read them as charges which the railways had in fact been making within their powers, and which they could not subsequently alter or vary. It might be, however, that if the Railway Rates Tribunal acceded to an application under the proviso, by railway company or trader, to increase or decrease charges, that substituted rate would become one which the company were "entitled" to charge, and so would become an "aforesaid charge."

As to the five-ton rate, he thought, on the facts, that it was a misnomer to describe that as a separate and new rate, and thus a charge which was not in force on August 15, 1921. The correct view seemed to be that that was a charge in force for transit of sugar, and that the four-ton rate was modified to the advantage of the trader upon certain conditions being fulfilled by him. Finally, as to the alleged agreements with traders by which the railways were said to be estopped from taking the action complained of, he could not find on the facts that there were any such binding agreements. The appeal must therefore be dismissed.

Lord Justice Sargant said that the judgment of Mr. Justice Astbury as to the facts had been accepted as substantially accurate by the appellants and by the respondents, and it was unnecessary to re-state them. It seemed to him (Lord Justice Sargant) reasonably clear that the words of section 60 of the Railways Act, 1921, entitling the companies to make such charges as were in force on August 15, 1921, when taken in their ordinary meaning, did not simply authorize the rigid continuance of the precise charges so in force, but gave the companies a discretion to make charges up to, but not exceeding, the charges of August, 1921. The words of the section "shall be entitled to make such charges" seemed to give a power, but not in any way to prescribe the exercise of that power to the full extent. The donee, as in the case of a power to charge jointures or portions in settlements of real estate, was at liberty to charge the maximum sum mentioned, or any such lesser sum as he might think fit. If authority were wanted for that, it might be found in Julius v. Bishop of Oxford (5 App. Cas., 214), and it was not immaterial to notice that the very phrase "shall be entitled to" was used in section 24 (10) of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1888, at a time when it was clear that the charges then authorized were maximum charges. Sir John Simon, too, was quite correct when he argued that there were in the antecedent railway legislation two quite distinct and contrasted conceptions, namely, first the charges which railway companies were entitled to make at their discretion within certain limits, and, secondly, the charges which they from time to time decided to make within those limits, and rendered eligible by entry in their rate books after the giving of sufficient previous notice.

If that were then the effect of the first part of section 60, was there anything in the rest of the section to prevent the charge now proposed, 60 per cent. in excess of basic rates, being legal, merely because there had been an intermediate charge of only 50 per cent. excess? There did not seem to be anything. Proviso (i) dealt only with a reduction by the Rates Tribunal. Proviso (ii) was immaterial. Proviso (iii) dealt with the discretionary power of the Rates Tribunal to authorize increased charges. He (the Lord Justice) could not accept the alternative suggestion of the appellants that in that proviso the phrase "the aforesaid charges" meant the charges actually being made from time to time by the companies. Much stress had been laid by the appellants upon the alleged improbability that the Legislature would have intended to get rid during the interval before the appointed day of the beneficial restrictions imposed on the raising of existing rates by the Act of 1894. Whether these restrictions were altogether beneficial to traders might be doubted, for they must have tended to discourage valuable experimental deductions, but at all events that particular aspect of the matter did not seem to help the appellants, for, by section 86 of the Act of 1921, while section 14 of the Regulation of Railways Act, 1873, was repealed only as from the appointed day, section 1 of the Act of 1894 was repealed forthwith, and therefore during the interval the companies appeared to have been deliberately restored to the position of relative freedom which they occupied before 1894. Upon the first point, therefore, it appeared that the appeal must fail.

Upon the second point, there did not seem to be much substance in the arguments of the appellants. It was true that on August 15, 1921, the railways had not made any differentiation between sugar in lots of four tons and upwards and a smaller sub-class of this class which was ultimately created and consisted of sugar in lots of five tons in a truck. But, all the same, the total class did exist, and each individual consignment in the class, whether four tons or more, or five tons or more in a truck, was subject to a charge at the four ton rate, and was in fact so charged. There was therefore a charge in force on August 15, 1921, on the whole of the original class, and the railways had done no more than lower the original exceptional rate as regards that sub-class.

As regards the allegation that there had been a binding agreement as to rates made between the companies and the Federation of British Industries, it seemed to him (Lord Justice Sargant) that any bargain made related only to a present reduction of rates, and it was never intended that the reduction should last until the appointed day, or until a new order of the Rates Tribunal.

Lastly, there was no substance in the contention that the reductions in rates which had been made, from an additional 100 per cent. to 75 per cent., and from 60 per cent. to 50 per cent., should be regarded as having been made by orders of the Railway Rates Tribunal. The appeal failed.

LORD JUSTICE LAWRENCE said that it was to be observed that the expression used in section 60 was "shall be entitled to charge" and not "shall charge," and there was in the context nothing which demanded that the section should be construed otherwise than according to its natural meaning. It was said that the construction which Mr. Justice Astbury had placed on the section had the effect of reversing the policy pursued by the Legislature ever since the passing of the Act of 1894, a result which ought not to be imputed to the Legislature; but the weight which might be attributed to that argument was discounted by the fact that section 60 contained only transitory provisions, and that section 1 of the Act of 1894 was expressly repealed. After all, the Court could only endeavour to ascertain the policy of the Legislature by construing the language employed to express it.

Upon the further points taken, his Lordship agreed with the judgments delivered by the other members of the Court.

INLAND REVENUE COMMISSIONERS v. TRUSTEES OF THE ROBERTS MARINE MANSIONS.*

Revenue — Income-tax — Charity — Boarding-house at reduced charges—Claim to exemption —Income Tax Act, 1918 (8 and 9 Geo. V., c. 40), s. 37 (1) (b).

By a declaration of trust "a home or place of residence" was founded and endowed, "where persons requiring temporary rest and change of air for the benefit of their health may obtain the same." About half the income of the home came from payments by visitors, who included convalescents, persons needing rest and change, and holiday applicants. On a claim by the trustees for exemption from income-tax on the ground that the trust was established for charitable purposes only,

Held, that as the object of the trust was in reality to establish a seaside boarding-house at reduced charges and there was nothing to show an intention either to relieve poverty or to exclude persons in good health, the trustees were not entitled to the exemption claimed.

This was a case stated by the Commissioners for the Special Purposes of the Income Tax Acts.

The Crown appealed against the decision of the Special Commissioners, who had held that the respondents, the Trustees of the Roberts Marine Mansions, were entitled to exemption from income-tax for the two years ending April 5, 1925, on the ground that the trust was established for charitable purposes only.

The material words of the trust, which was established by Sir John Reynolds Roberts, draper, by a declaration of trust dated July 14, 1903, were as follow:—

"Whereas it is desired to found a home or place of residence where members of the drapery and allied trades and others requiring temporary rest and change of air for the benefit of their health may obtain the same . . . it is hereby agreed and declared . . . that . . . the trustees shall stand and be seised of [the Marine Hotel, Bexhill-on-Sea, Sussex] and any other property which may be conveyed to them . . . upon trust that the trustees do and shall permit such premises to be occupied and used as a home or homes or place or places of residence (primarily) for members of the drapery and allied trades and (secondarily) for members of other trades and professions where persons requiring temporary rest and change of air for the benefit of their health may obtain the same."

The home was supported by the income from investments, including the original endowment; by subscriptions and donations (mainly from firms in the drapery and allied trades); and by payments by visitors. The payments by visitors formed about one-half of the income of the home.

Letters of recommendation were issued to subscribers and donors to the institution, the number of such letters issued to each subscriber or donor depending on the amount of his contribution. Visitors to the home were admitted either with or without letters of recommendation, but only about 10 per cent. came without a letter. A visitor coming without one had to have a letter of introduction.

There were three categories of visitors to the home:—

(1) Convalescents from illness, who had to furnish a medical certificate; (2) persons resting, i.e., persons in need of rest and change of air for the benefit of their health; and (3) holiday applicants.

It was contended on behalf of the trustees, inter alia:—(1) that the trust was for the benefit of an important section of the community; (2) that the trust was for the relief of poverty; (3) that the trust was for the benefit of the health of the beneficiaries; and (4) that the trust was established for charitable purposes only and the income of the trust had been applied to charitable purposes only.

It was contended on behalf of the Crown, inter alia:—(1) that, as the benefits of the trust were not confined to poor persons the trust was not one for the relief of poverty; (2) that as the benefits of the trust were primarily confined to members of the drapery and allied trades the trust was not one for the benefit of the community as a whole; (3) that, even if the trust could be regarded as a trust for the benefit of the health of the beneficiaries, such a trust was not necessarily a charitable trust; (4) that, as the trustees had power to admit, and did, in fact, admit, purely holiday applicants irrespectively of considerations of health, the trust was not one exclusively for the benefit of the health of the beneficiaries; and (5) that the trustees were not a body of persons or trust established for charitable purposes only, and their income was not, by virtue of the declaration of trust, applicable to charitable purposes only.

The Special Commissioners held that the trust was one for charitable purposes only and that the claim for exemption succeeded.

The Crown appealed.

The Solicitor-General (Sir Thomas Inskip, K.C.) and Mr. R. P. Hills appeared for the Crown; Mr. Raymond Needham for the respondents.

Mr. Justice Rowlatt, in giving judgment, said that on the face of the deed which established the trust there was nothing to show that there was any intention of helping to relieve poverty. The relief of poverty was not confined to the relief of abject poverty, and no doubt that particular home would be of great advantage to persons who were not too affluent. Moreover, it was true that, in carrying out the trust, the trustees gave first choice to persons who were convalescent and required a change of air, and preference to persons who had letters of recommendation; but it was to be observed that, quite outside that class, holiday visitors were received at the home. In effect, a very benevolent donor had provided a house with a certain endowment, which was an assisted seaside boarding-house, for persons in a particular trade and for others. The Special Commissioners had decided that the words, "where persons requiring temporary rest and change of air for the benefit of their health may obtain the same," ought to be construed as providing for the relief of sickness. There was, however, no breach of trust on the part of the trustees if they admitted to the home persons who were perfectly well. The words merely meant persons who had deserved a holiday, and required one for the retention of their health. The object of the trust deed was, in reality, to establish a seaside home where persons, especially those in certain trades, could be admitted at reduced charges. In cases where the law had recognized a valid charitable trust the relief of poverty had appeared prominently in the intention of the donor, but the present case failed to satisfy the requirements of the law in regard to charities. The appeal would be allowed, with costs.

REX v. NORFOLK JUSTICES—EX PARTE PORTER.*

Rating—Sewer rate—Non-payment—Distress—Costs—Distress (Costs) Act, 1817 (57 Geo. III., c. 93), s. 1—Distress (Costs) Act, 1827 (7 and 8 Geo. IV., c. 17)—Sewers Act, 1833 (3 and 4 Will. IV., c. 22), s. 55.

The power given to Commissioners of Sewers by s. 55 of the Sewers Act, 1833, to levy the costs of a distress is limited in the cases of distress for sums under £20 by the provisions of the Distress (Costs) Acts, 1817 and 1827.

This was a rule nisi for an order in the nature of a mandamus to justices of the Grimshoe Division of the County of Norfolk to hear and determine according to law a complaint preferred by Joseph Porter, the applicant, against Thomas Frank Harrington, bailiff to the Ouse Drainage Board, for that he, having levied a distress on Mr. Porter's goods for a sum of less than £20, in respect of rates levied by the board, unlawfully charged and retained out of the produce of such goods costs and charges exceeding those prescribed by the Distress (Costs) Acts, 1817 and 1827, and Mr. Porter claimed treble the amount under those Acts.

The detailed facts are not material to the only question at issue in the Divisional Court. The applicant was one of many ratepayers in the district of the Ouse Drainage Board who refused to pay the rates levied by the board. There was organized opposition both to the rates and to the sales of distresses, with the result that the board found it necessary to conduct the sales in Cambridge under police protection. In the present case the amount distrained for was £4 16s. 11d. A horse was distrained, the applicant refused to pay, and the bailiff accordingly had to arrange for its carriage by rail to Cambridge. Expenses were incurred both for the bailiff's lodging and for the stabling and carriage of the horse. At the auction no one but the applicant attended, and he refused to bid. The horse was eventually sold for £10, which was less than the amount of the rates and the expenses actually incurred, and no overplus was returned to Mr. Porter, who preferred this complaint, alleging that the amount of costs which could lawfully be taken was limited to the sums named in the Distress (Costs) Acts, 1817 and 1827. It was contended for the board that the justices had no jurisdiction to hear the complaint, as section 55 of the Sewers Act, 1833, and section 7 of the Sewers Act, 1849, contained no limitation of the amount of costs which might be levied, and that the matter was one within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Court of Sewers, and the applicant's only remedy was by appeal to Quarter Sessions under section 47 of the Land Drainage Act, 1861. The justices accepted this view, and declined to hear Mr. Porter's complaint.

Mr. Montgomery, K.C., and Mr. Gerald Howard showed cause; Mr. Pritt supported the rule.

The Lord Chief Justice.—This is a rule nisi for an order in the nature of a mandamus to justices to proceed to hear and determine, pursuant to the statutes in that behalf, a complaint preferred by one Porter against one Harrington for taking more costs of levying a distress than are permitted under the Distress (Costs) Acts, 1817 and 1827. The ground upon which the rule was obtained was that the justices had jurisdiction to hear that complaint and that they had not heard it.

The question, and it is by no means without interest, turns on the construction of certain old statutes. It appears, upon the rather meagre affidavits before us, that as soon as the matter was mentioned to the justices objection was taken that the complaint was manifestly based on the Distress (Costs) Acts, which no longer had any application to a sewers rate. The justices, it seems, forthwith accepted that contention, and refrained from exploring the merits of Mr. Porter's complaint, because they were satisfied that the statutes on which he relied had ceased to apply.

It is contended that the justices were right because the effect of the Sewers Act, 1833, and the Sewers Act, 1849, is entirely to get rid of the Distress (Costs) Acts, 1817 and 1827, so far as sewers rates are concerned.

Attention has been directed to the case of Coster v. Headland (22 The Times L.R., 441 ; [1906] A.C., 286), and it seems to me that the reasoning in that case, though it specially referred to a poor rate, has no less application to the present matter. It may well appear on a superficial view that there are clauses in the Sewers Acts inconsistent with the Acts of 1817 and 1827. The same argument was used with no less force in Coster v. Headland (supra), where Lord Loreburn said, at page 288 : "We have under consideration 'charges' for 'taking, keeping, and selling distress.' An Act of 1827, which says in terms that charges for distress shall, in cases not exceeding £20, be according to a particular schedule, is still upon the statute book. Here is a charge for distress in a case under £20, and that charge is beyond the schedule rate. That seems to me necessarily to conclude our decision, unless there is some special reason showing that the Act is inapplicable." Lord Loreburn proceeded to examine the question whether the statutes there in question were incompatible, and came to the conclusion that the statutes said to be incompatible ought to be read together. "Even if a new standard is set up by the Act of 1849, is it incompatible with the special limitation being still preserved under the Act of 1827 as to distresses not exceeding the sum of £20 ? I think it is not incompatible, and that it makes no difference whether the one Act precedes or follows the other. I read them both together. One of them says that the charges are to be reasonable, the other says that the charges in cases not exceeding £20 are to be according to the schedule." In like manner Lord Macnaghten says : "I think the statute of 1827 is a statute of universal application, and when the statute of 1849 was passed it applied to it, and would only not have applied if it had been specially excluded." I cannot see why that language is more applicable to a distress for poor rate than it is to a distress for sewers rate. Lord Robertson, in the same case, says that the Act of 1827 "lies in wait, as it were, for Acts which may be passed, and imprints upon them a certain limitation." Lord Davey delivered a judgment of marked brevity. He said : "The reasons stated by Lord Justice Stirling seem to me so clearly put that I am quite content to accept what he has said as a judgment of my own." When one turns to the judgment of Lord Justice Stirling (21 The Times L.R., 123 ; [1905] 1 K.B., 219, at p. 234) one finds passages singularly applicable to the matter now before us. "But that Act was not repealed. It remained on the statute book ready to come into operation as soon as further provision was made with regard to the expenses of distresses for poor rates, unless the Legislature thought fit to provide otherwise. The Act of 1849 in substance restored the provisions of the repealed Act of 1754, 27 Geo. II., c. 20, and it did not repeal the Act of 1817, nor, in my opinion, the Act of 1827. The provisions of those two Acts must, I think, be taken to amount to a definition by the Legislature of what are to be deemed reasonable charges in respect of the expenses of the distresses contemplated by the Acts respectively in cases where the sum demanded and due does not exceed £20." And a little later : "The Distress (Costs) Act, 1827, is, it may be observed, a general Act dealing not only with poor rates but with other rates as well, and the limitations which it imposes are still in force, as it appears to me, with regard to distresses for such other rates." That is the judgment which Lord Davey in terms so significant approved.

It is not suggested that the Sewers Acts have expressly repealed the Distress (Costs) Acts. What is said is that a comparison of the Sewers Acts, on the one hand, and the Distress (Costs) Acts, on the other, reveals such incompatibility that so far as sewers rates are concerned, the provisions of the earlier Acts are by implication repealed. I do not think that that proposition is established. Indeed, I think that in section 55 of the Sewers Act, 1833, and in section 7 of the Sewers Act, 1849, a distinction is drawn between charges antecedent to the distress warrant and the charges of the distress. The former are to be specified in the warrant ; the latter are left vague. It is the latter with which the Distress (Costs) Acts deal.

I think these statutes are all capable of being read together, and if that is true, in the cases with which they are concerned, the limitations imposed by the Distress (Costs) Acts, 1817 and 1827, remain. Though what is being recovered is a sewers rate, if the scale is exceeded, I do not think there is anything to prevent the complainant going to the justices to ask for appropriate relief.

I think that the rule should be made absolute, and that the case should go back to the justices with a direction that the Distress (Costs) Acts are still of full force and effect, and that the limits laid down in those Acts are those which are to be observed by persons levying distresses for sums less than £20.

Mr. Justice Avory.—I agree. The question is whether a later statute is inconsistent with an earlier statute. The judgment which my Lord has delivered, following the House of Lords in Coster v. Headland (22 The Times L.R., 441 ; [1906] A.C., 286) is reinforced when it is remembered that that case followed after Hill v. Pannifer (20 The Times L.R., 324 ; [1904] 1 K.B., 811), where Mr. Justice Channell said this, dealing with the Distress for Rates Act, 1849 : "I think the only question we have to consider is whether the words of the operative part of the statute 12 and 13 Vict., c. 14, are inconsistent with the continued existence of a statutory limit of the charges in respect of these distresses which had previously existed. It seems to me that they are. It is inconsistent with there being a maximum limit of charges to say that a man is to have his reasonable costs. The present case shows it. There are costs which do exceed that maximum limit, and which are found to be in point of fact reasonable. It seems to me, therefore, that the later statute is necessarily inconsistent with the continued existence, not of the other statute as a whole, but of the other statute as applicable to distress for poor rate, which is the subject of this case." That is the view presented by Mr. Montgomery. It was expressly overruled by the Court of Appeal in Coster v. Headland (21 The Times L.R., 123 ; [1905] 1 K.B., 219), where Lord Collins, M.R., said, at p. 231 : "I feel bound to differ from the decision of the Divisional Court in Hill v. Pannifer (supra)." The House of Lords adopted the views of the Court of Appeal, and overruled Hill v. Pannifer (supra).

Mr. Justice Salter.—I am of the same opinion. I think Mr. Montgomery's strongest point was that relating to the costs of obtaining the distress warrant which are allowed by section 7 of the Sewers Act, 1849. Under the Distress (Costs) Acts no provision is made for the costs of obtaining the warrant, and therefore it is urged that the statutes are inconsistent. But I see that the same point arose in Coster v. Headland (22 The Times L.R., 441; [1906] A.C., 286), and I think that that decision concludes this case.

FAULKNER v. HYTHE CORPORATION.*

Private Street Works — Objection to proposed works — Application by local authority to justices — To be made before works are executed — Private Street Works Act, 1892 (55 and 56 Vict., c. 57), ss. 7, 8.

When an objection is lodged to proposed works under s. 7 of the Private Street Works Act, 1892, the local authority must apply under s. 8 to the justices to determine the objection before the works are executed. After the works are completed, the justices have no jurisdiction to determine an objection under s. 7.

This was a case stated by justices for the borough of Hythe, sitting as a Court of Summary Jurisdiction at the Town Hall, Hythe, to determine the matter of objections made under section 7 of the Private Street Works Act, 1892, in pursuance of section 8 of that Act, on an application by the respondents in respect of a notice of objection made by the appellant under section 7 of the Private Street Works Act, 1892, to the proposals of the respondents relating to property situate in Albert-road, Hythe. The application was heard on July 13, 1926, when the said Court of Summary Jurisdiction, having heard an objection to their jurisdiction made by counsel for the appellant, decided that they had the power to hear and determine within the meaning of section 8 of the Private Street Works Act, 1892.

Upon the hearing of the said matter the following facts were agreed between counsel for the respondents and counsel for the appellant.

The respondents as the Urban Authority within their district resolved that Albert-road (a road upon which the appellant's property abutted) was not sewered, levelled, paved, metalled, flagged, channelled, made good, and lighted to the satisfaction of the Urban Authority, and that the respondents as such Urban Authority as aforesaid should sewer, level, pave, metal, flag, channel and make good and provide proper means for lighting such street and that the expense incurred by the respondents should be apportioned on the premises fronting, adjoining, or abutting on such street or part of the street in pursuance of section 6 of the Private Street Works Act, 1892.

The respondents' surveyor prepared:—

(a) A specification of the private street works referred to in the resolution with plans and sections.

(b) An estimate of the probable expenses of the works.

(c) A provisional apportionment of the estimated expenses between the premises liable to be charged therewith under the Act. These were duly approved by the respondents in the manner provided by the Private Street Works Act, 1892.

The resolutions approving the specification, plans and sections, estimate and provisional apportionment were published in the manner specified in part 2 of the Schedule to the Private Street Works Act, 1892, and copies thereof were served on the owners of the premises, including the appellant, shown as liable to be charged in the provisional apportionment, within seven days after the date of the first publication, namely, on December 29, 1923, and the necessary publications were made.

An amended apportionment was duly served on the appellant on January 21, 1924.

On January 23, 1924, the appellant served a notice on the respondents in writing objecting to the proposals of the urban authority on ground (b) specified in section 7 of the Private Street Works Act, 1892, namely, that Albert-road was a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large.

No application to the Court of Summary Jurisdiction to appoint a time for determining the matter of objections under section 8 of the Private Street Works Act, 1892, was made by the respondents until after the work was completed and final apportionment made and notice thereof served. The notice of final apportionment was served on the appellant on September 1, 1925, and a similar objection was made by the appellant under section 12 of the Private Street Works Act, 1892, by notice in writing on the respondents on September 3, 1925, as had been raised to the said proposals of the respondents under section 7 of the Private Street Works Act, 1892.

On July 2, 1926, the respondents as such urban authority as aforesaid applied to the Court of Summary Jurisdiction to hear, determine and appoint a time for determining the matter of the said objection made by the appellant under section 7 of the Private Street Works Act, 1892, in pursuance of section 8 of the Private Street Works Act, 1892.

The date appointed was July 13, 1926.

On the part of the appellant it was contended: That the Private Street Works Act, 1892, should be construed as a whole and that section 8, in view of the preceding and subsequent sections of the Act and of the scheme of the Act and certain obiter dicta of Lord Alverstone, C.J., and Mr. Justice Wills, should be read as if the words "before the commencement of the works" were inserted in the section after the words "at any time after the expiration of the said month" and before the words "may apply to a Court of Summary Jurisdiction."

On these grounds the appellant contended that upon the true construction of the Private Street Works Act, 1892, the justices had no jurisdiction on July 13, 1926, to hear and determine the said objection made by the appellant to the proposals of the respondents under section 7 of the said Act.

On the part of the respondents it was contended that the appellant was not in any way prejudiced by the hearing being delayed, since if the Court decided that the highway was repairable by the inhabitants at large he and others would be relieved of the expenditure, and that the words in section 8 "at any time after the expiration of the said month" must bear their ordinary interpretation, and that the justices were not at liberty to insert words into a statute which did not appear therein.

The attention of the justices was called by the appellant to the case of Wirral Rural District Council

* Reported by J. W. Hall, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

v. Carter (19 The Times L.R., 153 ; [1903] 1 K.B., 646) and the obiter dictum of Lord Alverstone, C.J., on page 649 and certain expressions used in the same case by Mr. Justice Wills, and to the case of Hayles v. Sandown Urban District Council ([1903] 1 K.B., 169) and Pearce v. Maidenhead Corporation ([1907] 2 K.B., 96). It was admitted that these cases were not cases which directly decided the case before the Bench, but it was contended that the expressions of the learned Judges should bear weight.

The appellant referred to section 12 of the Private Street Works Act, 1892, and contended that after the final apportionment was made and notice thereof served the only grounds of objection which could be raised to the final apportionment were the grounds set out in subsection 2 of section 12 of the Act, and that this was not consistent with the Court of Summary Jurisdiction having the power to determine an objection made under section 7 of the said Act after the final apportionment had been settled.

The justices were of opinion that the obiter dicta quoted were merely ancillary to the case before the Court and were not in any way considered judgments or applicable to the present case ; and that section 12 of the Private Street Works Act, 1892, was not inconsistent with construing section 8 in the words of that section in that, until the notice of objection of the appellant to the provisional apportionment had been dealt with under section 8, it would be impossible to make a binding legal final apportionment to which sections 12, 13, and 14 would apply.

The justices considered that they had no right to insert words in an Act of Parliament unless subsequent sections of the same Act were entirely inconsistent with the ordinary construction to be placed upon the words.

The question upon which the opinion of the Court was desired was whether the justices, upon the above statement of facts, came to a correct determination and decision in point of law in holding that they had jurisdiction despite the lapse of time and the events which had happened, and, if not, what should be done in the premises.

By the Private Street Works Act, 1892, section 6 (3) : ". . . During one month from the date of the first publication the approved specifications . . . shall be kept deposited at the urban authority offices. . . ."

By section 7 : " During the said month any owner of any premises shown in a provisional apportionment as liable to be charged with any part of the expenses of executing the works may . . . object to the proposals of the urban authority on any of the following grounds . . . (b) that a street or part of a street is (in whole or in part) a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large. . . ."

By section 8 (1) : " The urban authority at any time after the expiration of the said month may apply to a court of summary jurisdiction to appoint a time for determining the matter of all objections made as in this Act mentioned, and shall publish a notice of the time and place appointed and copies of such notice shall be served upon the objectors. . . ."

Mr. C. R. Havers appeared for the appellant ; Mr. W. M. Andrew (Mr. A. F. Clements with him) for the respondents.

The Lord Chief Justice.—This is a case stated by justices, and the point which is involved in it may be very concisely stated. It is whether in section 8 of the Private Street Works Act, 1892, a true construction of the words relating to the application by the urban authority at any time after the expiration of the month therein referred to, involves the meaning that the application is to be made while the works are still proposed works and before they have been started upon. Reference has been made to certain observations in Wirral R.D.C. v. Carter (19 The Times L.R., 153 ; [1903] 1 K.B., 646), in Hayles v. Sandown U.D.C. ([1903] 1 K.B., 169), and Pearce v. Maidenhead Corporation ([1907] 2 K.B., 96), which assume, rather than hold, that that is the true construction. In my opinion that is the true construction as is made plain by the whole scheme of this statute, and, moreover, by particular phrases to be found in these sections. The scheme is this : That where the street is not yet sewered, levelled, paved, &c., the urban authority may pass a resolution and the surveyor shall thereupon prepare a specification, estimate, and provisional apportionment. That resolution has to be published in the manner provided by section 6, and there is to be a month during which, as provided by section 7, the owner of any premises shown in the provisional apportionment as liable to be charged may, by written notice, object to the proposals. The grounds of such objections are enumerated, and one finds in the body of the objections, for example (d), that the proposed works are insufficient or unreasonable or that the estimated expenses are excessive. The work is then a matter of proposal. Passing to the next section, one finds that it is the duty of the urban authority to apply to a Court of summary jurisdiction to appoint a time for determining the matter of all objections made as in this Act mentioned, that is to say, they must apply for objections to be heard to the proposed works. Then follow section 9, as to incidental works, section 10 as to apportionment, and then a very significant section, section 11, where the whole process is to be repeated de novo if the urban authority from time to time desire to amend the specification, plans, &c., and that chapter of the story, so to say, is closed and we pass to section 12, beginning with the words : " When any private street works have been completed." I do not see that the words " before the commencement of the works " are omitted from section 8. In my view, the scheme of these sections and the vocabulary employed, show that that application is to be made before the commencement of the works, otherwise it would be grotesque to speak of objections to proposed works. It is not necessary to repeat the facts of this case. The point of them is this : That it was not until the whole work had been carried out and the whole of the expense incurred and the final apportionment made, that this particular owner of premises had an opportunity, if indeed it was an opportunity, of taking the preliminary point that this street, as to which he was to bear a part of the cost of repair under this statute, was all the time a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large. That was not an objection which could be taken at the time of the hearing : it was an objection which arose upon the proposed works. I think, therefore, that the point taken by the learned counsel for the appellant in the Court below was right, and that the justices were without jurisdiction at that stage to deal with such an application. I think, therefore, that this appeal succeeds and that whatever order, and there seems to be some doubt as to the precise terms and effect of the order made, was in those circumstances made by these justices is null and void.

Mr. Justice Avory.—I am of the same opinion. The only ground upon which the decision of the justices that they had jurisdiction can be supported is the ground taken by Mr. Andrew, that under section 8 there is no limitation of time within which the urban authority may apply to the Court of Summary Jurisdiction; but when that section is looked at, I think it is clear that this is one of those instances where the word "may" has to be construed in a mandatory sense, and further, it is clear, looking at this section, that that provision about the urban authority applying to the Court only has relation to the question of an objection which has been made under section 7 to the proposed works, and it can have no application to an objection which is provided for by section 12 after the works have been completed. The word "may" here is undoubtedly used in the permissive sense, because there may be or may have been no objection raised, and therefore there may be no need for the application to the Court. But it clearly contemplates that, if an objection has been made under section 7, then the urban authority shall apply to the Court of Summary Jurisdiction, and in my opinion, if they fail to do that, then the justices have no jurisdiction at all to deal with any question of final apportionment.

Mr. Justice Salter.—I am of the same opinion. If sections 9 and 10 of the Act are read as it appears to me they should, strictly speaking, be read, before sections 7 and 8, I think it will be sufficiently clear that Parliament was intending that objections to the provisional apportionment should be dealt with and disposed of before the works are begun, and I think that view is considerably strengthened by a consideration of the terms of section 11.

IN RE SIKES—MOXON AND ANOTHER v. CROSSLEY AND OTHERS.*

Will — Construction — Specific legacy — "My piano"—Sale of article after date of will—Subsequent purchase of similar article—Wills Act, 1837 (1 Vict., c. 26), s. 24.

A testatrix, who at the time when she made her will had an ordinary piano that had been converted into a player-piano, made in her will a bequest of "my piano." The testatrix afterwards bought a new motor player-piano, and the old piano was sold and removed from her residence, and was not in her possession at her death.

Held, that as the particular piano bequeathed had been sold before the death of the testatrix the specific legatee was not entitled to the motor player-piano.

Miss Hannah Maria Sikes, of Doe Royd, Almondbury, Huddersfield, by her will dated June 4, 1921, appointed the plaintiffs, Mr. George Dunhill Moxon and Mr. James Edward Mellor, her executors and trustees. The will contained, among other provisions, the following bequest:—"I bequeath my piano to Beatrice Elizabeth Leigh." The testatrix directed her trustees to divide her residuary estate between the defendants, the Huddersfield Infirmary and the Victoria Sick Poor Nurses' Home, Huddersfield. Among the pecuniary legacies was one of £2,000 to Beatrice Elizabeth Leigh.

On May 29, 1923, the testatrix purchased from Messrs. Moore and Moore, of London, an electric motor player-piano for £228 18s. and a stool, making a total of £231 8s., which sum was paid by her on June 7, 1923. The old piano was removed from the testatrix's residence in June, 1923, and was not in her possession at the date of her death on February 14, 1926.

Beatrice Elizabeth Leigh, on April 18, 1922, married Mr. William Royston Crossley. She was the first defendant to the originating summons, which was issued by the plaintiffs for the purpose of deciding whether the electric motor player-piano which the testatrix possessed at the date of her death passed to the defendant Beatrice Elizabeth Crossley, or whether it formed part of the residuary estate of the testatrix bequeathed to the defendants, the Huddersfield Infirmary and the Victoria Sick Poor Nurses' Home.

The piano which the testatrix had at her house at the time when she made her will had been originally an ordinary piano, but had been converted into a player-piano. It was alleged by the defendant Mrs. Crossley that the testatrix sold it to her (Mrs. Crossley's) husband for £5 at the time when she bought the new electric motor player-piano.

Mr. R. H. Hodge appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. F. R. Evershed for the first defendant, Mrs. Crossley; and Mr. Wilfrid M. Hunt for the other defendants, the residuary legatees.

Section 24 of the Wills Act, 1837 (1 Vict., c. 26), provides that every will shall be construed, with reference to the real estate and personal estate comprised in it, to speak and take effect as if it had been executed immediately before the death of the testator, unless a contrary intention shall appear by the will.

Mr. Justice Clauson, in giving judgment, said that in her will the testatrix was pointing to, and meant to give, that particular piano which she possessed at the date of her will, though the word "my" might not be quite conclusive to make a gift a specific gift. But having arrived at that conclusion with regard to the gift in this will of "my piano," could it be said that a contrary intention appeared on the face of the will? Mr. Justice Swinfen Eady, as he then was, in the case of In re Clifford—Mallam v. McFie (28 The Times L.R., 57; [1912] 1 Ch., 29), referred with approval to, and applied, the following passage in a judgment of Vice-Chancellor Wood, in Goodlad v. Burnett (1 K. and J., 341, at p. 348):—"When I refer to a particular thing, such as a ring or a horse, and bequeath it as 'my ring' or 'my horse,' it seems to me there might be considerable difficulty in saying that the 'contrary intention' to which the Act, in its 24th section, refers does not appear on the face of the will."

In his (his Lordship's) opinion, the result was that there was a contrary intention on the face of this will, and the specific legatee did not get the piano because the particular piano bequeathed to her had been sold before the death of the testatrix. The costs would come out of the residuary estate.

LAYZELL AND ANOTHER v. THOMPSON AND OTHERS.*

Highways — Ferry — Franchise ferry—Grant—Evidence.

The Court held that a franchise ferry between South Benfleet and Canvey Island had been granted to the plaintiffs' predecessors in title.

This was an action by Mr. Albert Richard Layzell and Mr. William Henry Theobald for a declaration that they were entitled to and were possessed of an ancient ferry across Benfleet Creek between the causeway at South Benfleet, Essex, and the highway opposite on Canvey Island. They also sought an injunction to restrain the defendants, their servants, and agents, from disturbing the plaintiffs in the possession or enjoyment of the ferry.

Mr. Macmorran, K.C., and Mr. Hodge appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. Manning, K.C., and Mr. G. M. Simmonds for the defendants.

Mr. MACMORRAN said that the defendants had disturbed the plaintiffs' ferry by the establishment and maintenance of a rival ferry service over the creek separating the mainland of Essex from Canvey Island. The population of Canvey Island had in recent years increased from 300 to 5,000. It was only necessary for the plaintiffs to prove a possessory title. (See Peter v. Kendal (6 B. and C., 703); and Trotter v. Harris (2 Y. and J., 285).) The disturbance could not be justified. There had been a ferry at the place in question since 1848.

Mr. MANNING said that the plaintiffs' ferry was not an ancient or franchise ferry with an obligation to serve the public at all hours of the day or night. A ferry granted by Royal Charter was a continuation of the main road, and it could not be said that the plaintiffs had any exclusive title of that kind.

MR. JUSTICE ROMER, in delivering judgment, said that the case was unique in one respect among ferry cases, because at low water the tidal creek could be traversed on foot. There was a highway on the mainland down to the causeway, and the highway was continued on the Canvey Island side. Carts could proceed over the causeway at low water, and foot passengers could do so over planks and stepping-stones. He had a very difficult question to determine, and one which he wished could have been submitted to a jury. It was difficult because of the almost total absence of documentary evidence in support of the claim to the ferry.

The census of 1911 showed a population of 500 in Canvey Island. At the present time it appeared that there was a resident population of over 5,000. Consequently, in considering the evidence of user in past days, one must expect it to be comparatively meagre. The ferry was never of any great value, and was from time to time held by people of no very great education or substantial position in life. One might therefore readily expect the various owners to be ignorant of the duties attached to a franchise ferry. As to the nature of a franchise ferry, reference had been made in the course of the arguments to Letton v. Gooden (L.R., 2 Eq., at pp. 130, 131); and to Simpson v. Attorney-General (20 The Times L.R., 761; [1904] A.C., at p. 490).

His Lordship also referred to Hammerton v. Earl of Dysart (31 The Times L.R., 592; [1916] 1 A.C., at p. 102). No authority had been brought to his notice indicating that the owner of a franchise ferry was bound to charge the same toll at all times of the day and at all times of the year. Two other cases were useful as showing the kind of evidence on which a jury should find the existence of a ferry. They were Trotter v. Harris (2 Y. and J., 285) and Peter v. Kendal (6 B. and C., 703). He also referred to Pease and Chitty on "Markets and Fairs" at p. 23.

There was evidence of acts by former owners of the ferry, e.g., in respect of the charges, which were not permissible, but those acts rather indicated a want of knowledge than a recognition of the fact that no exclusive right had been granted. On the whole, regarding himself as a jury, he came to the conclusion that in times gone by there had been a grant of a franchise ferry to the predecessors in title of the plaintiffs who were in possession of the ferry. That being so, he must grant the injunction.

TOLLEMACHE v. INLAND REVENUE COMMISSIONERS.*

Revenue — Supertax — Occupation of family mansion—Permission of trustees—Annual value of house—Whether to be included in occupant's income—Income Tax Act, 1918 (8 and 9 Geo. V., c. 40), Sched. A.

The Court held that the occupant of a family mansion, under the terms of a will by which trustees were given general powers of management of the real estate and a discretion to admit to the mansion the present occupant or certain members of his family during his lifetime, must be regarded as being in occupation under the will, and that the profits and gains representing the annual value of the house formed part of his income for purposes of supertax.

This was a case stated by the Commissioners for the Special Purposes of the Income Tax Acts.

The appellant, the Right Hon. Bentley Lyonel John Tollemache, Lord Tollemache, appealed against assessments to supertax in the sums of £17,434 and £18,000 for the years ending April 5, 1921, and April 5, 1922.

By the will of the appellant's grandfather, the late Lord Tollemache, the mansions of Peckforton Castle, Cheshire, and Helmingham, Suffolk, were devised to trustees upon certain trusts. The trustees during the life of the appellant were given powers to manage or superintend the real estates and generally to deal with the estates as if they were the absolute owners thereof, and to exercise all the powers which by the Settled Land Acts, 1882 to 1890, were conferred on a tenant for life in possession of land. There were provisions for the payment of annuities, interest on legacies, and other sums charged on the real estates, and for the discharge of mortgages and other charges affecting the real estates. The residue or so much thereof as the trustees in their uncontrolled discretion should think fit was to be applied to the maintenance and benefit of the appellant during his life, or for the benefit of certain other persons as the trustees should determine. There was the following further proviso :—

"Provided always that it shall be lawful for the trustees during the lifetime of Bentley Lyonel John Tollemache to permit him or his wife or any of his children to occupy and enjoy the mansions or either of them with the furniture and effects therein and the garden parts and appurtenances."

The trustees at all material times permitted the appellant to occupy Peckforton Castle and to enjoy the use of the furniture of the castle, and they also paid to him an allowance of £600 a month. It was admitted by the appellant that that sum, together with the appropriate addition for income-tax, should be included in his supertax returns. The annual value of Peckforton Castle for the purposes of assessment to income-tax under Schedule A of the Income Tax Acts for each of the years ending April 5, 1920, and April 5, 1921, was £859 5s., and the appellant was assessed to income-tax under Schedule A in respect of the premises for each of these years.

The following were the items the inclusion of which in the supertax returns was disputed :—

—	1920-21. £ s. d.	1921-22. £ s. d.
(i.) Annual value of Peckforton Castle ..	859 5 0	859 5 0
(ii.) Rates, &c., on Peckforton Castle paid by trustees	303 6 7	141 3 5
(iii.) Appellant's supertax paid by trustees ..		2,798 4 6 2,000 0 0

The payments under (ii.) and (iii.) were made by the trustees directly.

It was contended on behalf of the appellant : (a) That as regards item (i.) Peckforton Castle was vested in the trustees, who had absolute discretion to deal with it as they pleased ; that the appellant had no right to reside there ; that the trustees could turn him out at any time ; that, accordingly, the appellant had no power to sublet the castle, and that the annual value thereof formed no part of his total income. (b) That as regards item (ii.) it was part of the trustees' duty to keep up the property and pay the rates and taxes thereon, and that these payments were not payments made on behalf of the appellant. (c) That as regards item (iii.) these payments were casual gifts and, being made directly by the trustees, were not received by the appellant as income. (d) That neither the annual value of the castle nor any of the payments under heads (ii.) or (iii.) formed part of the appellant's income for the purposes of supertax.

On behalf of the Crown it was contended : (a) That as regards item (i.) the appellant was in the position of a tenant for life of the castle, or, alternatively, that he was occupier of the castle with the permission of the trustees and had the power of subletting. (b) That as regards item (ii.), if the appellant was in the position of tenant for life of the castle the rates and taxes would fall upon him and these payments were made by the trustees for his benefit. (c) That as regards item (iii.) these payments were made in discharge of the appellant's debts and were for his benefit, and that therefore they were on the same footing as the monthly allowances paid to him by the trustees. (d) That the annual value of the castle and the payments under heads (ii.) and (iii.) formed part of the appellant's income for the purposes of supertax.

The Special Commissioners decided :—(1) That the annual value of Peckforton Castle and grounds should be included in the supertax returns. (2) That the supertax payments made by the trustees on behalf of the appellant were clearly payments made for his benefit, and that these payments should be included in his supertax returns. (3) That on the view that the appellant was the occupier of Peckforton Castle he was liable for the rates and taxes thereon, and the payment of these by the trustees was a payment on his behalf, and this amount should be included in the supertax returns, and income-tax must be added to the payments under (ii.) and (iii.).

From this decision an appeal was brought.

Mr. A. M. Latter, K.C., and Mr. Cyril King appeared for the appellant ; the Solicitor-General (Sir Thomas Inskip, K.C.) and Mr. R. P. Hills for the Crown.

Mr. Justice Rowlatt, in giving judgment, said that the matter was really a simple one. A house had been assessed under Schedule A. The question of supertax arose, and it became necessary to find the total income of the person living in that house. The question to be determined was whether the annual profits and gains represented by the annual value of the house were his profits and gains, or, on the other hand, were the profits and gains of some other person, so that they did not come into the occupant's income at all, though he had the advantage of having the house at his disposal.

There had been cases where the question at issue was whether the occupation by the subject was merely occupation and nothing more, the familiar example being occupation by a servant of his employer's house, where every conceivable interest remained in the employer. It had been held that when the interest remained wholly with a person in the position of employer the servant was not assessable. In the present case, however, there was no question of there being any relation of employer and employed. The real question was whether the appellant was to be considered as being in a position analogous to that of a person who had been merely lent a house, or whether the house should be regarded as having been his house for the time that he lived in it.

He was of opinion that the appellant clearly occupied the house under the will and that there was no analogy to the case of a loan at all. It was true that the trustees had a discretion whether they would admit him or not, but when once he was permitted to live in the house he must be regarded as being in occupation under the will as long as he remained there. That appeared to be the principle laid down in Drummond v. Collins (31 The Times L.R., 482 ; [1915] A.C., 1,011). The Solicitor-General had submitted that, in his view, when once the trustees had given the appellant permission to reside in Peckforton Castle they could not turn him out. It was not necessary to express any opinion on that point, as he (his Lordship) was deciding the case on the footing that the trustees could turn him out, but that they had not done so in the year in question. It was grotesque to say that Lord Tollemache, living in the home of his ancestors, was there in the position of a gratuitous licensee. Precisely the same reasoning applied to the income allowed to the appellant under the will. It could not be said that he had received it on the footing of either generosity or charity.

The decision in Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Wemyss (8 Tax Cas., 551) did appear to present a substantial difficulty. The distinction there drawn was that the will contained an extraordinary clause of forfeiture. It was difficult to see why such a clause of forfeiture in any way affected the question of occupation or interest in lands before the forfeiture occurred, but the Judges in that case had certainly laid great stress on that clause, and he was justified in distinguishing the present case on the ground that there was no such forfeiture clause.

In view of his decision on the first point, it followed that the appellant was in rateable occupation of the house, and the rates paid by the trustees must be regarded as having been paid on his behalf. The appeal would be dismissed, with costs.

Court of Appeal. (Bankes, Scrutton, and Atkin, L.JJ.) 1926. Nov. 5.

REX v. NORTH—EX PARTE OAKEY.*

Prohibition—Ecclesiastical Court—Order made without jurisdiction—Vicar alleged to have committed an ecclesiastical offence—General citation—Non-appearance of vicar—Order for costs against him in his absence—Right of appeal against order—Delay in applying for writ—Prohibition not refused.

Prohibition will issue in respect of an order of an Ecclesiastical Court made without jurisdiction, notwithstanding that an appeal lay from such order to a higher Ecclesiastical Court and thence to the Privy Council.

This was an appeal by the Rev. John Polycarp Oakey, vicar of Eye, from the judgment of the Divisional Court, consisting of the Lord Chief Justice, Mr. Justice Avory, and Mr. Justice Shearman (the latter dissenting), discharging a rule nisi for a writ of prohibition directed to the Vicar-General and Official Principal of the Consistory Court of Ipswich, the prohibition being from proceeding against the Rev. John Polycarp Oakey under an order of the Consistory Court, ordering him to pay the costs and expenses incurred by Miss Short, a parishioner of Eye, who applied to the Consistory Court for a faculty to restore a fresco on the wall of the church of St. Peter and St. Paul, which represented angels carrying a scroll, bearing the words "Worthy is the Lamb that was slain," and which had been obliterated by distemper during some restoration work in the church, and also from proceeding on a monition requiring the vicar to pay, within fourteen days, the taxed costs, amounting to £42 13s. 6d., and the expenses of restoring the fresco, amounting to £74 14s. 6d.

The writ of prohibition was asked for on the ground that the judge of the Consistory Court had exceeded his jurisdiction in ordering the vicar to pay the costs and expenses, as the vicar was no party to the proceedings before the judge of the Consistory Court.

Mr. Ernest Charles, K.C., and Mr. Harold Hardy appeared for the appellant; and Mr. E. W. Hansell for the respondent.

Mr. Ernest Charles, in opening the appeal, said that Miss Mary Elizabeth Short, of Hillside, Eye, had applied to the Consistory Court for a faculty to restore a fresco on the wall of the church of St. Peter and St. Paul at Eye, which had been painted in 1869 by her father, Mr. William Short, who was an accomplished artist. The fresco, which had been obliterated by distemper during restoration work, represented angels carrying a scroll bearing the words "Worthy is the Lamb that was slain." The Church Council supported the petition for a faculty to restore the fresco.

The practice in the Ecclesiastical Court was to submit the petition to the Chancellor, and he, having considered it, then issued his fiat for a citation to be issued. If there was no appearance to the citation, it went through if approved by the Chancellor. The citation issued was sent to the vicar to be put up on the door of the church, and was an invitation to anyone interested in the parish to enter an appearance to the citation and say, if they objected, that they did not want the fresco restored.

In this case no appearance was entered to the citation, and Mr. North held a Court on July 24, 1925, at the church of St. Peter and St. Paul. There was no opposition. The vicar did not appear at the hearing on July 24. The Tacon trustees, who were patrons, appeared, and expressed regret that the fresco had been distempered over; they said that they had employed a very distinguished architect to do the restoration work and that they took the whole responsibility. The Tacon trustees financed the work of restoration.

The Chancellor granted to Miss Short the faculty to have the fresco restored, and directed the Rev. J. P. Oakey to pay the costs of the proceedings and to pay the expenses incurred in restoring the fresco. This order was made by the Chancellor, notwithstanding the fact that the Rev. J. P. Oakey was not a party to the proceedings. He did not enter an appearance to the citation, and did not oppose. Such an order, contended counsel, was contrary to justice and to the rules of the Common Law. The petitioner, having got the faculty which she petitioned for, was satisfied, but the Chancellor made an order for costs against one who was not a party to the proceeding. He ordered the vicar to pay the costs, although there was no opposition. It was contrary to law and to justice that a person who was not a party to a proceeding should be burdened with the costs of it.

Lord Justice Bankes said that the only question which the Court had to decide was that of jurisdiction, and the Court would not go into the merits of the case.

Mr. Charles contended that the decision of the majority of the Divisional Court was based on a misconception with regard to the effect of a general citation. The majority of that Court had treated the citation as binding on the vicar because the petitioner had put the names of certain persons in the petition, and on that ground it was said that he had to come to the hearing to show cause, failing which he must pay the whole of the costs of the proceedings and the expenses of restoring the fresco. A proceeding by way of special citation was a different thing from a citation issued in the ordinary way. A general citation was only an invitation. If it were desired to enforce a person's attendance, that must be done by serving on him personally a citation which required him to do something, and informing him that if he made default an order would be made against him. That was a different matter from a general citation. In this case it was the trustees who had given the order to do the restoration work, and it was they who paid for it, and the architect was employed by them. If anybody should intervene, the trustees were obviously the persons to do so. There was good ground in this case for the issue of the writ of prohibition.

Mr. E. W. Hansell, for the respondent, said that the only question the Court had to decide was whether the writ of prohibition ought to issue, and the Court had not to see whether the action of the Consistory Court was all that it should be. The whole trouble was caused by the action of the vicar. In 1923 a faculty was granted to the vicar and churchwardens which authorized certain work to be done, but did not authorize interference with this particular fresco. Therefore the vicar allowed something to be done which he was not authorized to do, and being done, was clearly illegal. Another question which the Court would consider was that of delay. In July, 1925, the order against the vicar was made, and in September the vicar was served with that order, which stated quite clearly that the vicar was to pay the two sums in question. He also knew in September that it was proposed to enforce that order, and the vicar did absolutely nothing until March 9, 1926. Anybody who applied for a writ of prohibition must apply promptly.

But the main question for decision was whether the majority decision of the Divisional Court was right, viz., that this was not a case for prohibition, but for appeal. It was open to the vicar to appeal, first to the Court of Arches, and then to the Privy Council. The decision of the majority of the Divisional Court was right.

Lord Justice Bankes.—This is one of those unfortunate cases in which difficulties have arisen in a parish because of some unauthorized interference with either a memorial, or a memorial window, or a pew, or some part of the ornamentation of the church in which some particular person, or some particular family, has a special interest, and it is all the more unfortunate where, as here, a dispute like that results in litigation. I very much regret, from one point of view, that the Court is called upon to intervene, and one regrets that the Court should be called upon in any case similar to this case to intervene ; but my own feeling in this particular case is that there is a special reason for regret, because it is so obvious that the whole of the difficulties which have arisen here and have been referred to might have been obviated if a little more care had been exercised, or a little more forethought on the one hand, and, on the other hand, one assumes from the evidence that was given by the trustees and by the architect, that even if this order was to stand, the money would not come out of the reverend gentleman's pocket, but would come out of the trustees' pocket, who, before the Chancellor, took the whole responsibility. However, one cannot allow oneself to be influenced by such considerations, nor can one for one moment in one's own mind form on the merits of the dispute, if I may use that expression, any opinion which should influence one's decision upon the particular point that has been brought before the Court.

What seems to me to be, and what must be the first consideration here, is, what is the rule of law in reference to such a question as is here brought before us, where it is alleged that an order has been made in a judicial proceeding against a person who has never had an opportunity of being heard before the order was made ? There is no sort of doubt about what the rule of law is, and what is the rule of law applicable, not only to proceedings in the King's Courts, but to proceedings in the Ecclesiastical Courts. I will just refer to a passage in Broom's Legal Maxims in which the rule of law is laid down in quite plain terms, which I think must be generally accepted without reference to particular authority. What is stated there is this (7th edition, at p. 89) : "It has long been a received rule, that no one is to be condemned, punished, or deprived of his property in any judicial proceeding, unless he has had an opportunity of being heard." That seems to me the overriding rule which this Court has to apply in reference to an application such as this, and I should like just to refer to one or two authorities where that rule has been appealed to and applied in cases which were commenced before the Ecclesiastical Courts. There is one case in 1832, Capel v. Child (2 Cr. and J., 558). It is quite true that the proceedings were not there challenged by process of prohibition, but there are some observations in Mr. Justice Bayley's judgment to which I wish to refer. The short facts there were these. It was a case arising in what was then the diocese of London, and the complaint against an incumbent was that he neglected his duties, and a monition issued directing him to appoint a curate and pay a curate. He did neither the one nor the other. The Bishop then appointed a curate, and the reverend gentleman neither paid the curate nor allowed him to do any duty in the parish, and ultimately, after a further monition, the Bishop issued a sequestration. The validity of these proceedings was challenged. The other case was a case in the diocese of Worcester, and there the complaint was that the incumbent did not reside in his vicarage, and the Bishop issued a monition requiring him to reside in his vicarage. That reverend gentleman seems to have been possessed of a terse and forcible vocabulary. He addressed letters to his Bishop, to which I will refer in a moment. Ultimately the Bishop considered that the vicar had not complied with the monition, and issued a sequestration, and there again the proceedings were challenged. In each case the rule of law to which I have referred was the one upon which reliance was placed, and in each case the Court has, I think, made valuable observations in reference to the application of that rule to this class of case. In Capel v. Child (supra), this is what Mr. Justice Bayley said, and I should like to read some substantial portion of his judgment. He says, at p. 579 : "It would be quite sufficient if the Bishop were to call the party before him, and to state to him the grounds on which he thought the duties were inadequately performed, by reason of his negligence ; and he should have asked whether he had or had not any grounds on which he could answer that charge ; but, is it not a common principle in every case which has in itself the character of a judicial proceeding, that the party against whom the judgment is to operate should have an opportunity of being heard ? In our Courts of Law you cannot obtain a judgment against a party without entering an appearance for him, so that it shall seem as if he had appeared. He either does actually appear, or else you enter an appearance for him, according to the Act of Parliament expressly made for that purpose, and made because it is considered an invariable maxim of law that you cannot proceed against a party without his having the opportunity of being heard, and without his appearing in Court, before a judgment shall be pronounced against him. In the case of proceedings before magistrates on summary conviction, if the conviction does not state either that the party was summoned, or that he appeared, the conviction is bad. If you remove a corporator, and it turns out that he was not summoned, however gross and flagrant his misconduct may have been, he is entitled to be restored ; and I know of no case in which you are to have a judicial proceeding, by which a man is to be deprived of any part of his property, without his having an opportunity of being heard. There is a case of Rex v. Benn and Church (6 Term Rep., 198), in which, where a warrant of distress, which is in the nature of an execution, had issued, not grounded on a previous summons, Lord Kenyon laid it down most distinctly as an invariable maxim of our law that no man shall be punished before he has had an opportunity of being heard. Now in this case it is impossible, as it seems to me, to say that the requisition is not in the character of a judicial proceeding. It does not call upon the party to show cause, but, transit in rem judicatam, it requires him to do the act ; and the period of time from which he is to do that act is the period of time limited by the Act of Parliament—giving him no further time to show cause against the requisition being acted upon. And the appointment of a curate by himself ; what is the effect of that ? Why, the effect of a curate being appointed by himself, or of an appointment of a curate by the Bishop, is, for so long a time as the curate shall continue, to deprive him of a portion of the profits of his benefice ; it is, to all intents and purposes, a deprivation from him, for so long a time as that curate shall continue, of £75 a year." In the other case of Bonaker v. Evans (16 Q.B., 162) there is a short passage in the judgment which I should like to refer to, but I may perhaps, by way of passing, refer to the language of the reverend gentleman when he was called upon to reside in the rectory. In answer to the first monition, in which he was directed to reside in the rectory, the reverend gentleman said : "To the Right Reverend Bishop," and so forth, "I," so-and-so, "vicar" of so-and-so, "as by this my affidavit, solemnly declare that, on Saturday, the 19th instant, I took possession of, and commenced residence in, my said damp and uncomfortable hole of a vicarage house at Church Honeybourne aforesaid, in consequence of your monition." What he did was that he went to sleep there a certain number of nights, and the Bishop apparently had him watched, and having had him watched he issued another monition in which he inserted the number of dates upon which the reverend gentleman had slept there. In reply to that monition the reverend gentleman said : "In reply to your letter of the 31st ultimo enclosing, by order of the Bishop, 'a copy return of the number of nights Mr. Bonaker has slept in the vicarage house at Church Honeybourne since service of the monition,' I beg to say that the author is a malicious liar." However, that is not so material. What is material is the passage from the judgment of Baron Parke in which he said (16 Q.B., at p. 171) : "The Bishop, then, acting judicially in this respect, the main question for our consideration is, whether the sequestration ordered by him is a proceeding simply in the nature of a distress to compel residence, or altogether, or even in part, in pœnam for previous non-residence or absence. If it be the latter, then the Bishop ought to have given the incumbent an opportunity of being heard before it was issued ; for no proposition can be more clearly established than that a man cannot incur the loss of liberty or property for an offence by a judicial proceeding until he has had a fair opportunity of answering the charge against him, unless indeed the Legislature has expressly or impliedly given an authority to act without that necessary preliminary." There are a number of authorities which could be cited to the same effect. I only refer to those because they do definitely state that this procedure in the Ecclesiastical Court is in the nature of a judicial proceeding. They do definitely state that an order of sequestration and an order for payment of a sum of money are, either or both of them, acts affecting the person or property of the individual which cannot properly, according to our law, be made unless and until the individual has had an opportunity of being heard before the making of the order. In those circumstances, it seems to me that our duty is, regardless of the facts or merits, to consider whether, in this particular case, in view of the nature of the proceeding taken—that is, the application for prohibition—the Chancellor has offended against that rule.

With regard to the form of the application, it is agreed that the issue of the writ is discretionary, and it is said that in this case there are several grounds upon which the Court should refuse to exercise its discretion. One is the question of time. It is quite clear that the Court takes into consideration the question whether there has been a long delay in making an application in dealing with the question whether it should exercise its discretion. Here, in my opinion, there has been no such delay as would justify the Court in exercising discretion against the applicant, because the monition, which I regard as an effective part, and a very effective part, of the order which is complained of, was not issued till February 11, 1926, and the motion for the rule nisi was on the following March 9. I think myself, therefore, that the objection on the ground of time fails.

Then it is said that the Court ought to take into account the fact that there is a right of appeal, and should not grant the rule in a case where there is, as here, a right of appeal. I am not going to express any opinion on the question whether there is a right of appeal, but if the contention of the party is that he is no party to the proceedings in which the order has been made, there may be a question whether he has any right of appeal. I will assume, for the purpose of my judgment, that there is a right of appeal : even then the matter is discretionary, but I think there is an authority to which Lord Justice Atkin has called my attention, White v. Steele (12 C.B.N.S., 383), in which the Court definitely stated that in their opinion the fact that there was an appeal to the Court of Arches was no ground for refusing a prohibition in a case somewhat similar to the present. I think, therefore, that no objection can successfully be taken to the exercise of discretion on either of those two grounds.

That brings one to the facts of the case. I do not want to go into them for the purpose of considering whether the view taken by the Chancellor was right or was wrong. It is quite obvious that the reverend gentleman was in default in this sense, that he could have prevented what is complained of if he had interfered. That is quite plain, but whether that justified the view which the Chancellor took and the order which he ultimately made, is not a matter for me to consider. I have only to consider the proceedings that were taken, and I have to ask myself : Had this gentleman any opportunity of dealing with, or answering, the case which was in fact made against him, before the order was made ? In my opinion he had not. First of all, there was the petition for the faculty. The petition, I think, negatives the idea that any order against this vicar personally was going to be asked for. It was necessary, in order to get the faculty, to suggest to the Court by the form of the petition that what had been done had been done without authority, and that was so stated in the petition, but it seems to me that, if the petition, after stating that fact, merely goes on to ask that the applicant may have authority to reinstate what had been obliterated, any ordinary person reading it would understand that, although the ground for the petition was that what had been done had been done wrongfully, no request was going to be made to the Court that the person who was said to have acted wrongfully should either pay the costs of the proceedings or pay the costs of the reinstatement. So much for the petition. Then the petition is followed by a citation. That citation is in an antiquated form, but no doubt it fulfils its purpose, because the object is to give all and sundry who are interested in the particular matter an opportunity of coming forward to state any objection that they may have, and therefore it is addressed in the widest possible terms, but it is addressed in terms which were probably brought into existence when conditions and times were very different from what they are to-day. However, there is the citation. What is the effect of the citation? It is to give anybody and everybody interested the opportunity to appear—every parishioner, every person who can say that he is specially interested. But what is the effect, if any, if those persons to whom the opportunity is given do not appear. It seems to me that no distinction can be drawn between the butcher, the baker, and the candlestick maker, and the vicar and any other parishioner. They are all in the same position for this purpose. The opportunity is given to all and every one of them to appear, but, if they do not appear, it seems to me that they are all standing on exactly the same footing. They are persons who do not appear, and therefore, in my humble judgment, it is quite plain that they are not parties to any proceeding that may follow, and not being parties, as at present advised, my opinion is that the Chancellor had no jurisdiction to make an order against them either for costs or in any other form without intimating specially and, if need be, by a special citation, that an order is asked for against the person who has not appeared, and who is, therefore, not a party.

That, in my opinion, is sufficient to dispose of the whole matter, because, the citation being in the form in which it was, following the petition asking merely for a faculty that this lady should be entitled to restore what had been obliterated, there is no notice either to the vicar or to anybody else that any order, except the one specially mentioned, is to be asked for. In spite of that the Chancellor proceeded to make two orders which, in my opinion, he had no jurisdiction whatever to make. One was that the vicar should pay the costs of the proceedings; the other was that he should pay the costs of the restoration. In my judgment there was no obligation upon the vicar, the order being, as I think, obviously on the face of it, made without jurisdiction, to take any action until some one chose to make that order effective against him by some process of execution. That process commenced by the issue of the monition, and then he acted, and, in my opinion, he acted in time. If he had complained only of the monition, I think he would have had good ground for complaint, because it seems to me that there was no jurisdiction, without giving him an opportunity of being heard, to make an order as against him, that he should pay any particular sum for the restoration, whatever that sum may amount to. I have, I think, indicated sufficiently the grounds upon which I am unable to agree with the Court below, and the reasons why I think that these proceedings, from beginning to end, as against this applicant, were without jurisdiction, on the ground that the Chancellor did not recognize or give effect to the elementary rule of law that he ought not to make any such orders against this vicar, or anybody else, without giving him an opportunity of being heard.

I think the result is that the appeal must be allowed, with costs here and below, and I can only repeat my regret that this particular dispute has found its way into the Courts of Law.

Lord Justice Scrutton.—This is a case of some difficulty, as is apparent from the division of opinion in the Court below and the arguments to which we have listened during the last two days. It is perhaps important to state clearly exactly what the Court is doing in this case, because I see that when the judgment of the Chancellor was given in the Consistory Court of Eye it was received with cheers by the audience, and it is important to make quite clear that this Court is not deciding the merits of any question between the clergyman and the lady in this case.

A faculty having been granted to the rector and churchwardens to do certain work in the church of Eye in connexion with a war memorial, somehow or other an existing fresco, painted by the lady's father, was distempered over, that obliteration not being provided for in the faculty. The lady, not unnaturally, felt aggrieved. Whether or not the clergyman is responsible for that improper proceeding, whether or not the lady has due cause to complain of the action of the clergyman, is not being decided in this case at all. This is not an appeal from the Chancellor's decision, and this decision here given has nothing to do with the merits and it should not be received with cheers by anybody either here or in the important town of Eye. This is a technical proceeding, in that it is an application to the King's Courts to prohibit action from being taken on an order of the Ecclesiastical Courts, on the ground that that order was made without jurisdiction, and such an argument and the decision of this Court have nothing whatever to do with the merits of the question whether the clergyman was right or wrong or had anything to do with the obliteration, or whether the lady was right or wrong in complaining of the action of the clergyman.

There seems to be no doubt that, if the form of the proceedings in this case had been that a citation was issued to the clergyman by name, asking that a faculty should issue ordering him to restore, at his own expense, the fresco which had been obliterated, the matter would have been entirely within the jurisdiction of the Ecclesiastical Court, and an order might quite properly have been made, if the evidence justified it, against the clergyman to restore and pay the expense of restoring the fresco that had been obliterated, and this Court could not possibly have interfered with the decision of the Ecclesiastical Court. There seem to be ample precedents for that kind of proceeding. I find one in the case of Sieveking and Evans v. Kingsford (36 L.J. Eccl. Cases, 1); I find another in the case of Hopper v. Davis (1 Lee's Eccl. Rep., 640). In each of these cases the person who had removed from a church a particular ornament, without justification, was dealt with by the Ecclesiastical Courts, after notice to him in which he was specially cited, and in one case he was ordered to restore, and in the other case he was not ordered to restore, according to the merits. If that form of procedure had been followed in this case, no application to this Court would have lain, but unfortunately that form of procedure was not followed in this case. The lady presented a petition that it was desired that the fresco of angels should be restored, and requested the Ecclesiastical Court "to decree a Faculty for the purpose aforesaid." One understands, and Mr. Hansell agrees, that in the practice of the Ecclesiastical Courts that faculty would be granted to the person who applied for it—i.e., the lady who would do the work—but nothing whatever is said in the petition that a further order will be asked for, "though I do the work the clergyman is to pay the expense of it." That does not appear anywhere in the petition. Following that petition, a citation is issued, which I have no doubt is in an old form, addressed to all and singular, clerks and literary persons in the Diocese of St. Edmundsbury, "informing this collective assembly that it is desired that the fresco of angels should be restored," and calling upon them to show cause, if they desire to show cause, why a licence or faculty should not be granted to the petitioner accordingly. That, in the same way, gives no intimation to anybody that what is really going to be asked for is an order that, though the lady does the work, the clergyman shall pay the expense of it because he has without authority been a party to removing part of the church and, therefore, ought to pay for putting it back.

In my view, an order that anyone should pay the costs of putting back work removed without a faculty is in the nature of a penalty for an ecclesiastical offence, and it appears to me that it is one of the most fundamental principles of English law that if you are going to impose on any person a penalty for anything in the nature of an offence you shall not do so until you have clearly informed that person that the application is going to be made against him, so that he may know with what he is charged and have an opportunity of attending and meeting it. My Lord has referred to a number of cases in which that principle has been laid down. They begin with one in which some old Judge, with the quaint reference of the times, says that the first precedent was when the Lord God expelled Adam and Eve from the Garden, but He did not do so until He had called upon them to answer, and there is a series of cases from that time all laying down the same principle. In the one that my Lord has referred to—that is, Bonaker v. Evans (16 Q.B., 162)—Baron Parke states, at page 171: "The Bishop, then, acting judicially in this respect, the main question for our consideration is, whether the sequestration ordered by him is a proceeding simply in the nature of a distress to compel residence, or altogether, or even in part, in pœnam for previous non-residence or absence. If it be the latter, then the Bishop ought to have given the incumbent an opportunity of being heard before it was issued; for no proposition can be more clearly established than that a man cannot incur the loss of liberty or property for an offence by a judicial proceeding until he has had a fair opportunity of answering the charge against him."

In my view to issue a general summons to the clerks and literati of the diocese of St. Edmundsbury without including in it any statement that the thing asked for is an order that one of those clerks shall pay a sum which is in the nature of a penalty for an ecclesiastical offence is not to give a fair opportunity to that person to appear, knowing the nature of the charge against him, and answer it. Lord Justice Thesiger, in the case to which we have been referred of Martin v. Mackonachie (4 Q.B.D., 697, at p. 732), says: "The mode in which that suit is to be conducted, the sentence which it is open to the Judge to pronounce, and the means by which that sentence is to be enforced, are all, in the absence of statutory provision relating to these matters, to be regulated by the practice of the Court itself, and in respect of which if the Judge errs, appeal and not prohibition would be the proper remedy, unless his error involves the doing of something which, in the words of Mr. Justice Littledale in Ex parte Smyth (3 Ad. and E., 719, at p. 724), is 'contrary to the general laws of the land,' or, to use the language of Mr. Justice Lush in the Court below, is 'so vicious as to violate some fundamental principle of justice.'" In my view to order a man to pay what is in the nature of damages or a penalty for an offence without specifically informing him that an application is to be made that he shall pay those damages, in order that he, having notice of the exact charge made against him, may attend and meet it, is, in the language of Lord Justice Thesiger and the language of the case I have cited, contrary to both matters that are mentioned. It is contrary to the general law of the land. It is so vicious as to violate the fundamental principles of justice. The petition and the citation are both perfectly consistent with an application that the lady shall restore the fresco at her own expense. There is nothing, in my view, on the face of them to show what is going to be asked for, that a person unnamed as a special party shall be ordered himself to bear the costs of the work which the lady is getting a faculty to do.

In my view, therefore, the original order of the Chancellor was so without jurisdiction that prohibition would lie, but, further, it appears to me that the issue of the monition was equally without jurisdiction, for though the clergyman had notice of the order and notice of the taxation of costs, he had no notice that the monition was going to apply peremptorily, ordering him to pay a named sum for the costs of the reparation and restoration, and no notice either of the amount or that the monition was going to issue, and according to the ordinary principles of administration of justice in England (which I hope are not inconsistent with the principles of true religion administered by the Ecclesiastical Courts) he should have had specific notice of what was going to be asked against him. The Divisional Court below have dealt with three matters. The majority have said, first of all, that in their view there was such delay that the prerogative writ of prohibition, which is a discretionary writ, should not issue. In my view, so long as a sentence is unexecuted prohibition may lie if there is a threat to execute it, although a considerable time has elapsed from the time when the original sentence which it is then proposed to execute was promulgated. I agree with what appears to be only a dictum of Mr. Justice R. S. Wright, a Judge of great familiarity with this class of case, in In re London Scottish Permanent Building Society (63 L.J., Q.B., 112), that an application for prohibition is never too late so long as there is something left for it to operate upon; and when the sentence is unexecuted, a threat, a statement of intention to execute it, in my view, may be followed by a writ of prohibition, though a considerable time has elapsed from the time when the original sentence was promulgated. That is the way in which the objection that there has been delay appears to me to be disposed of. Secondly, it is said that where there is an appeal no prohibition will lie. The case to which my Lord has referred (White v. Steele, 12 C.B.N.S., 383), and to which my brother Atkin has referred us, appears to me to answer that.

The judgment of Mr. Justice Shaw Willes shows that in the opinion of the very strong Court that delivered that judgment the fact that there was an appeal was not necessarily in any way fatal to the claim for prohibition. The third question raised before the Court below was whether the Ecclesiastical Court had jurisdiction to deal with this matter. As I have said, I have no doubt they could have dealt with this matter on an application properly framed, and this Court could not have interferred with their decision on the merits, but in my view, on the proceeding as framed, they had no jurisdiction to inflict penal consequences upon a person not expressly named as a party to the proceedings who had no notice that an order in the nature of a penal order was to be made against him.

For these reasons, on this particular application, I think the appeal must succeed and the writ of prohibition must go, but as I said at first nothing that I have said is to be taken as any expression of opinion on the merits as between these parties, or that there is any justification for clergymen doing work in their church which is not included in a faculty, or any justification for ecclesiastical architects, however eminent, doing things which there is no faculty for them to do. England has suffered enough from eminent ecclesiastical architects in the past without their being given any greater liberty to exercise their own peculiar views in churches. As I have said, that is not the question before us. The question before us is the technical question whether the writ of prohibition should issue, and for the reasons I have given I think that such a writ should issue in this case.

Lord Justice Atkin.—This is a case which originated in the Consistory Court of the diocese of St. Edmundsbury by an applicant, Miss Short, who made quite a usual application for a faculty to have restored a decoration in the church which had been obliterated without any lawful authority. She was especially interested in the matter because the fresco was a fresco which had been executed some 50 years before by her father, who appears to have been a distinguished artist. There is no doubt that the decoration had been obliterated without authority, and that she was clearly entitled to the faculty for which she asked. She had stated in her petition that the decoration had been obliterated by order of the vicar, but she asked for no relief against the vicar and she merely asked that a faculty should be accorded to her to restore the fresco. The ordinary procedure was adopted in the case of an ordinary application for a faculty. There was a general citation issued and published in the ordinary way by notice upon the church door. It was a citation for the granting of a faculty, a citation to all the parishioners and inhabitants of the parish, and to all other persons, that is to say, persons, not inhabitants or parishioners, who were interested in the subject-matter, and a notice that, if any persons desired to object to the granting of the faculty, they were to appear before the Chancellor at a named date. Nobody did appear. The Chancellor fixed a time for the hearing of the application in public, and thereupon he made an order. The vicar did not appear. The vicar, as appears from the evidence, was in fact in a nursing home, and apparently he at the time of the hearing of the application was not in the least minded to resist the application. The only evidence before the Chancellor in connexion with the vicar, as far as I can see—we have had the notes—was, not that the vicar ordered the obliteration of the fresco, but that he consented to the obliteration of the fresco. The Chancellor, having decreed that the faculty should issue, at the same time made an order that the decoration should be restored at the expense of the vicar, and ordered the vicar to pay the costs. The question is whether there was any jurisdiction to make that order at all. The matter having proceeded to taxation of costs and to a monition upon the vicar to pay the costs within 14 days, and also a sum of £74 odd, which was stated to be the expense of restoring the decoration, within 14 days, the vicar now applies for a rule for a prohibition to prohibit the Chancellor from proceeding upon the original order and upon the monition.

It appears to me that the question which we have to decide is whether or not the Chancellor had jurisdiction, in the circumstances of the case, to make the original order upon the vicar; and it appears to me that he had not. The citation is a general citation, addressed, as I have said, not to the vicar in particular but to the parishioners and inhabitants of the parish. I do not know whether a vicar is a parishioner; he probably is. He certainly is an inhabitant, and in that sense he is included in the general citation. But apart from that there was no special direction of the citation to him, and it is quite plain, to my mind, that there was no claim in the petition for any special relief against him, or any kind of notice that he would be ordered or required to pay any costs, either of the proceedings or of the expenses of restoration. To my mind, if a Chancellor seeks to exercise any coercive power over a parishioner, or anybody else who comes within the scope of the general citation, he must see that something further is done than the general citation, and must see that the person against whom the power of the coercive jurisdiction is sought to be exercised has in fact received special notice that some sort of proceeding is being taken against him, and that some such order may be made; and in the absence of a special citation of that kind it appears to me that there is no jurisdiction in the Chancellor to exercise coercive jurisdiction over anybody in circumstances such as I have mentioned. I think, therefore, that the Chancellor had no jurisdiction to order the vicar to pay the expenses of restoring the decoration and no jurisdiction to order him to pay the costs of the proceeding.

Therefore it is quite unnecessary to deal further with the facts of the case except in so far as the facts have been discussed before us. At the present moment I am not satisfied that the Chancellor, on the mere application to restore an ornament which has been removed without a faculty, would have jurisdiction to order the vicar to pay the costs of the restoration, unless it were proved that he was the person who in fact caused the ornament to be removed; and I doubt for myself whether the mere fact that an incumbent consented to something being done which was contrary to ecclesiastical law is in itself, on such an application, sufficient ground for ordering him to pay expenses. It may very well be that such a consent is in the nature of an offence against ecclesiastical law, and it may very well be, therefore, that it brings him within the punitive jurisdiction of the Chancellor; but it appears to me that that may very well be solely the subject of a special application on that footing. I say no more about it than that. I do not intend to decide the point. In any case, it is quite obvious that the incumbent ought to have special notice of such a grave charge as that he has been in fact privy to a breach of the ecclesiastical law, and has subjected himself to such penalties as may be appropriate to that.

There being no original jurisdiction, it appears to me that the vicar is entitled to a prohibition, and that he is entitled to a prohibition because there has been a breach of the fundamental principle of law, that a party is entitled to have a notice of claim against him and to be heard before he can be deprived of his property or his rights. The order being made without jurisdiction, it was quite without effect; it was a brutum fulmen upon which nothing could validly be done. The parties proceeded to tax the costs under the order. The order for taxation was, as I have said, made without jurisdiction, and it appears to me to have no effect upon the vicar's liability. They then proceeded to claim a monition against the vicar, requiring him to pay costs, and also requiring him to pay the sum which I think the monition adjudicates to be the sum of £74 odd, a sum which the vicar had no opportunity at all of questioning and no opportunity of ascertaining whether that was a correct sum or not. I think, with my brother Scrutton, that that in itself would indicate that that monition, so far as it related, at any rate, to the expenses, was made without jurisdiction; but it matters not in the view I take, because it obviously followed upon an order which had been made without jurisdiction.

In those circumstances, the applicant appears to me to be entitled to a writ of prohibition because he is threatened with a sequestration of his living for non-compliance with an order made without jurisdiction. Only two grounds, I think, can be suggested, or were suggested, why the writ should not go. One was, that it was said that the vicar ought to have appealed from this order to the Court of Arches. To begin with, I myself am very far from satisfied that he had a right of appeal at all, because I am very doubtful whether the true position is that a person has any right to appeal unless he has been made properly a party to the cause or matter either by being specially cited or by in fact appearing upon the general citation. It appears to me quite plain that the fact that there is a remedy by appeal is no answer to a writ of prohibition, where the want of jurisdiction is a want of jurisdiction based upon the breach of a fundamental principle of justice, as I deem this to be. There is plenty of authority for the proposition that prohibition will lie, notwithstanding appeal, both in the case of Ecclesiastical Courts—a case which has been mentioned by the Lord Justice—and also in the case of County Courts, where prohibition has gone over and over again, notwithstanding the fact that there was also a right to question the judgment by appeal.

The only other question is the question of time, and upon that I see no reason at all for withholding the writ. An order has been made by a Court which has no jurisdiction, which, as far as the applicant is concerned, is a mere brutum fulmen, and which, while no proceedings are taken upon it, does not affect him at all, but which, as soon as proceedings are taken, will very closely touch, I suppose one may say, his pocket in respect of sequestration, quite apart from the indignity of the proceeding. Then is the time when he is called upon to act. He does act, within, I think, less than a month from the time of the issue of the monition to him. That seems to be a very reasonable time, in view of the complicated questions which arose, questions of law. I think he was entitled to take advice upon the matter, and I do not think it is suggested that he was not. I do not think that there has been any delay which the Court ought to take into account.

For these reasons it appears to me that the appeal should be allowed with costs here and below, and that the rule should be made absolute for prohibition as prayed.

Mr. CHARLES.—The appeal will be allowed accordingly, my Lord?

ROBINSON, FISHER AND HARDING v. BEHAR.*

Sale of Goods—Auction—Conditions of sale—"Lot to be taken away . . . the day after sale"—"All lots uncleared . . . shall be re-sold"—Refusal by buyer to clear lots—Whether re-sale obligatory upon auctioneers.

Certain goods were put up for sale by auction, the conditions of sale printed on the auctioneers' catalogue providing: "The lot to be taken away and paid for . . . the day after sale," and "upon failure of complying with the above conditions . . . all lots uncleared within the time aforesaid . . . shall be re-sold." A purchaser, through his own negligence, bid for a lot for which he had not intended to bid, and the lot was knocked down to him. He afterwards endeavoured to persuade the auctioneers to put up the lot for sale again, but they declined. Upon his refusing to pay, an action for the purchase price was brought by the auctioneers, and the purchaser contended that under the conditions of sale it was obligatory upon the auctioneers to re-sell the lot in question, and that he could be charged only with any deficiency upon re-sale.

Held, that the words "all lots uncleared . . . shall be re-sold" did not impose any obligation upon the auctioneers, but merely conferred upon them an option of re-selling at their discretion, and that the auctioneers were entitled to recover the full price at which the lot was knocked down to the purchaser.

This was an appeal from the judgment of the Judge of the West London County Court, who had given judgment for £56 in favour of the plaintiffs, Messrs. Robinsen, Fisher and Harding, auctioneers.

The plaintiffs had put up certain goods for sale by auction at Willis's Auction Rooms, St. James's-square, on December 9, 1925. The goods were offered for sale upon certain conditions of sale printed in the auctioneers' catalogue, the material conditions being as follow:—

"4. The purchasers to give in their names and places of abode, and to pay down 5s. in the £, or more, in part of payment, or the whole of the purchase-money, if required; in default of which, the lot or lots so purchased to be immediately put up again and re-sold.

"5. The lot to be taken away and paid for, whether genuine and authentic or not, with all faults and errors of description, at the buyer's expense and risk, the day after sale; neither Messrs. Robinson, Fisher and Harding nor the sellers being responsible for the correct description, genuineness, or authenticity of, or any fault or defect in, any lot; and making no warranty whatever.

"7. Upon failure of complying with the above conditions, the money deposited in part of payment shall be forfeited; all lots uncleared within the time aforesaid shall be re-sold by public or private sale, and the deficiency (if any) attending such re-sale shall be made good by the defaulter at this sale."

The defendant, Mr. Jack Behar, carpet dealer, had intended to bid for Lot No. 62, but was absent in the smoking room when that lot was knocked down, and returned to the sale room after Lot. No. 63 had been put up and its description announced. Under the impression that Lot No. 62 was still being offered, he bid £56, and Lot No. 63, a Persian carpet, was knocked down to him at that price. As soon as he discovered his mistake, he asked the auctioneers to put up Lot No. 63 for sale again. They, however, declined, and again on the following day refused a similar request. The defendant refused to remove the lot, or to pay for it, and the plaintiffs sued him for £56, the price at which it had been knocked down to him. The defendant pleaded that the lot had been sold to him under a mistake. He further contended that, upon his refusal to clear the lot the day after sale, the auctioneers were obliged under condition 7 of the conditions of sale to re-sell, and that his liability was confined to the deficiency, if any, upon such re-sale. The County Court Judge found as a fact that the defendant had been negligent, and the plea of mistake therefore failed. He gave judgment for the plaintiffs for £56.

The defendant appealed.

Mr. J. D. Casswell appeared for the appellant; Mr. W. H. Moresby for the respondents.

Mr. Justice Avory.—This was a claim by the plaintiffs, who are auctioneers, for £56, the price of goods bargained and sold on December 9, 1925. The particulars of claim are as follow: "The £56 is the amount of the defendant's bid for a Persian carpet (being Lot 63) at an auction sale by the plaintiffs held on December 9, 1925, at Willis's Rooms, King-street, St. James's-square, S.W.1. The bargain and sale relied on is the said sale at the said auction." It appears that the defendant intended to purchase another lot, No. 62, but that, owing to his own negligence, he made a mistake and purchased Lot. No. 63 for £56. Prima facie, therefore, there was no answer to this claim; the defendant did not dispute that he had in fact bid for this particular lot, and that it had been knocked down to him. It was, however, contended on behalf of the defendant that he was not liable in this action by reason of the conditions of sale printed on the auctioneers' catalogue. The argument presented is a curious one, and it means that if a man has bought something and afterwards regrets it, he can insist under condition 7 of these conditions of sale on the lot being re-sold and the deficiency, if any, being made good by the defaulter. It might happen that in such a case there would be no deficiency, and that the lot would be sold at an enhanced price, and the Court is not told what would be the contention in such circumstances. The argument is that, because under condition 5 "The lot is to be taken away and paid for, whether genuine and authentic or not, with all faults and errors of description, at the buyer's expense and risk, the day after sale," and because this buyer did not take away this lot the day after sale, it thereupon became compulsory upon the auctioneers to re-sell and debit the defendant with the deficiency or, as I have suggested, credit him with any surplus. Counsel has strenuously argued that condition 7 is mandatory and compulsory, and that it is impossible to give any other meaning to it. Looking at conditions 4, 5, and 7, I have no hesitation in coming to the conclusion that the words "shall be forfeited," "shall be re-sold," in condition 7 are not mandatory or compulsory upon the auctioneers, but permissive, and must be read in that sense; in other words, condition 7 confers on the auctioneers an option to exercise the powers conferred on them by its terms, and the present defendant is not entitled to insist on the performance of these conditions, but was in the circumstances liable to pay. I am of opinion, therefore, that the learned County Court Judge rightly decided that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover. I say nothing about a point in regard to waiver of these conditions of sale by the parties which was taken below, and which, it is said, the County Court Judge was inclined to favour. I do not think it necessary to express any opinion on that point, as I am clear upon the grounds which I have stated that this appeal ought to be dismissed.

Mr. Justice MacKinnon concurred.

W. N. HILLAS AND COMPANY, LIMITED v. REDERI AKTIEBOLAGET ACOLUS.*

Ship—Charterparty—"Cargo to be brought to and taken from alongside the steamer"—Meaning of "alongside"—Custom of port of Hull.

The plaintiffs, as shipowners, chartered a steamer to the defendants to carry a cargo of timber from the Baltic to Hull. The charterparty contained a clause as follows: "Cargo to be loaded and discharged with customary steamship dispatch . . . according to the custom of the respective ports. . . . The cargo to be brought to and taken from alongside the steamer at charterers' risk and expense as customary." The steamer arrived at Hull in due course. One customary mode of discharging a timber cargo at the port of Hull was to erect a staging from the ship's side to a line of rails on which bogies ran, and to place the timber on the bogies. The nearest rail was some distance away from the side of the quay. On the refusal of the defendants to carry the timber to the bogies, the plaintiffs did the work and claimed to recover the cost from the defendants. The defendants proved that by the custom of the port of Hull the cost of placing the timber on the bogies was to be borne by the shipowners.

* Reported by H. B. Hemming, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held, that the custom relied on by the defendants was inconsistent with the language of the charterparty, that the word "alongside" was not proved to have acquired any conventional meaning in the timber importing trade at Hull, and that the plaintiffs were therefore entitled to recover.

The Turid (38 The Times L.R., 423 ; [1922] 1 A.C., 397) followed.

This was an appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal (42 The Times L.R., 69) affirming a judgment of Mr. Justice Greer (41 The Times L.R., 546).

The respondents, the owners of the steamship Oresund, chartered the steamer to the appellants to proceed to Karlesborg and there load from agents of the appellants a full cargo of timber, and, being so loaded, to proceed to Hull (Victoria Dock) or West Hartlepool as ordered. Clause 3 of the charterparty provided as follows : "The cargo to be loaded and discharged with customary steamship dispatch as fast as steamer can receive and deliver during the ordinary working hours of the respective ports, but according to the custom of the respective ports, Sundays, general or local holidays (unless used) in both loading and discharging excepted. . . . The cargo to be brought to and taken from alongside the steamer at charterers' risk and expense as customary."

The steamer loaded a cargo of timber under the charterparty, and arrived at the Victoria Dock, Hull, as ordered. One usual mode of discharging a timber cargo at that dock was that a platform should be erected from the ship's side to a line of rails on which bogies ran, and that the timber should be placed on the bogies and run to the timber merchant's yard. The distance from the edge of the quay to the nearest rail was about 18 feet. The platform consisted of some portion of the cargo.

The appellants declined to take the cargo from the side of the quay to the bogies. The respondents were therefore obliged to do the work themselves, and they demanded from the appellants the expenses which they had incurred. The appellants refused to pay, and the respondents then brought an action to recover this sum.

The appellants by their points of defence alleged, and they proved, a custom of the port of Hull as to the discharge of wood cargoes, by which the shipowner was obliged to remove the cargo from the steamer and place it upon the quay space opposite the steamer, or upon bogies running along the quay at which the steamer lay, or to lower the cargo into open lighters supplied and brought alongside by the receivers, and to pay for the labour necessary to perform the above work. This custom was embodied in a document signed by the representatives of the Timber Trade Federation and of the Documentary Committee of the Chamber of Shipping on June 23, 1899.

Mr. Justice Greer held that the custom in this case imposed duties on the respondents of taking the goods beyond a place that could properly be described as "alongside," and that the appellants had failed to prove that the word "alongside" had acquired a special trade meaning in the Hull timber inporting trade. He therefore held that the custom was inconsistent with the express words of the charterparty. In his opinion the case was indistinguishable from The Turid (38 The Times L.R., 423 ; [1922] 1 A.C., 397). He accordingly gave judgment in favour of the respondents.

The Court of Appeal (Lords Justices Bankes, Scrutton, and Atkin) affirmed this decision.

Mr. Stuart Bevan, K.C., Mr. Le Quesne, K.C., and Mr. Clement Davies, K.C., appeared for the appellants ; Mr. Raeburn, K.C., and Sir Robert Aske, for the respondents, were not called on.

The Lord Chancellor.—My Lords, where the meaning of a commercial document in common business use has been the subject of judicial decision, it is plainly undesirable in construing a similar document to draw fine distinctions.

The charterparty which is here in question was the subject of decision in the case of The Turid (38 The Times L.R., 423 ; [1922] 1 A.C., 397), decided in this House in the year 1922, and, after giving full consideration to the argument on behalf of the appellants, I have found it impossible, as did the Court of Appeal, to distinguish the present case from the case of The Turid (supra). Here, as in that case, the charterparty provides that the cargo is to be "taken from alongside the steamer at charterers' risk and expense as customary." Here, as in that case, the charterers pleaded that there was a custom of the port under which the expense in dispute was to be paid by the ship. The expense in question in The Turid (supra) was the expense of putting up a staging from the ship, which had to lie some distance from the quay, and of carrying the timber across that staging on to the quay. In the present case the sum in dispute represents the cost of putting up a staging from the ship, which in this case was alongside the quay, to certain rails and carrying the timber across that staging and placing it on bogies on those rails. It was held in the case of The Turid (supra) that the charterers were liable for the expense, and I can see no reason why that decision should not apply in the present case.

It is said that there is a distinction, because here the staging was placed across land, whereas there it had to cross the water. That seems to me not to be a substantial distinction. In each case the timber had to be taken from alongside the ship and carried for some distance. Again, it is said that here no additional expense was thrown upon the ship by reason of this staging, because the charge of the stevedores was the same as if the timber had been dumped on the quay-side. I do not think that that point is really open. The claim was for the additional expense caused by this operation, and the judgment was for any additional expense so caused. The amount has been agreed between the parties, and I think it is no longer possible to maintain that nothing whatever could in any case be recovered in this action.

Lastly, it is said that, in view of the custom at Hull, the word "alongside," which normally refers to or connotes contiguity, has a special meaning, and that under the custom delivery "alongside" means delivery either into a lighter or on to bogies on the rails or on some space beyond the rails. In my view, the evidence fell far short of establishing that meaning of the word "alongside." I agree with a sentence in the judgment of Mr. Justice Greer where he said : "In my judgment, a custom of the kind proved in this case, which is not expressly directed to establish a customary meaning of a word, cannot be said to have this effect indirectly merely because the custom cannot be given effect to without giving a special meaning to the word." In my view, that argument, like the others, fails.

My Lords, on the whole, I am of opinion that this appeal fails, and should be dismissed with costs.

BRACEY v. PALES.*

Landlord and Tenant — Restrictions — Tenant rent-free — Whether protected — Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920 (10 and 11 Geo. V., c. 17), s. 12 (7).

The Rent Restriction Acts afford no protection to a tenant who is rent-free.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Deputy-Judge of the Barnet County Court, holding that the defendant, Mr. William Henry Pales, a painter and decorator, who had for many years been in the employ of a building firm, and had been permitted by his employers to reside rent-free in a house belonging to them which came within the protection of the Rent Restriction Acts, could not avail himself of the provisions of the Acts.

The plaintiff, Mrs. Ellen Bracey, was the widow and executrix under the will of her husband, who was a member of a firm of builders and decorators at Watford and Boreham Wood, Herts. The defendant, Mr. William Henry Pales, was a painter and decorator, in the employ of the above firm. He had for many years occupied a cottage known as The Homestead, Boreham Wood, which belonged to his employers. Adjoining the cottage was a yard belonging to the builders, and one of their signboards was displayed there.

The defendant first occupied the cottage in 1905 and it was not disputed that he had paid rent for it before the war. In 1916 he went abroad on military service and was absent for three years. During his absence his wife died, and his children ceased to reside in the cottage, which was afterwards let to a Mrs. Harding. On his return from military service the defendant resumed his former employment and at first occupied another house at Boreham Wood. After a short time The Homestead became vacant and he occupied it again. There was a conflict of evidence whether any rent was paid by the defendant after the war, but the County Court Judge found that none had in fact been paid.

In April, 1925, Mr. Bracey, the defendant's employer, died, and his widow, the present plaintiff, continued to carry on the business for a time. On September 12, 1925, she gave up the business and told the defendant of her intention to do so, but nothing was said in regard to the defendant's residence at The Homestead. A few days later a Mr. Fudge, who had been in the habit of collecting rents for the plaintiff's husband, called on the defendant and suggested that henceforward the defendant should pay a rent of 13s. 7d. per week. The defendant paid rent for three weeks, but Mr. Fudge subsequently received instructions from the plaintiff's solicitors to refund the amount paid by the defendant.

On February 22, 1926, the plaintiff brought an action against the defendant claiming possession of The Homestead and mesne profits since September 12, 1925. The defendant contended that he was protected as a tenant lawfully in possession under the Rent Restriction Acts. The County Court Judge held that the defendant had been allowed to remain as a servant rent-free in The Homestead at Mr. Bracey's pleasure and that he could not avail himself of the protection afforded by the Acts. Accordingly he gave judgment for the plaintiff.

The defendant appealed.

Mr. Malcolm Hilbery appeared for the appellant; Mr. H. I. P. Hallett for the respondent.

MR. JUSTICE SALTER, in giving judgment, said that, if it had been necessary to determine whether the defendant had ever been a common law tenant of the plaintiff or her husband since 1919, a question of some difficulty might have arisen. It was, however, not necessary to decide that question because, even if the defendant had been a common law tenant, he was not now a tenant within the meaning of the Rent Restriction Acts so as to be entitled to avail himself of their protection. If he were a tenant at all, it was clear that he was a tenant rent-free, and the Acts afforded no protection to such a tenant. That conclusion could be supported if one had regard to the structure of the Acts; to the decision in Hornsby v. Maynard (41 The Times L.R., 102; [1925] 1 K.B., 514), where it had been laid down that rent for the purposes of those Acts meant pecuniary rent only; and more particularly to the wording of section 12, subsection 7, of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920. Section 12 was the definition section, and by subsection 7 it was provided:—

"Where the rent payable in respect of any tenancy of any dwelling-house is less than two-thirds of the rateable value thereof, this Act shall not apply to that rent or tenancy . . . and this Act shall apply in respect of such dwelling-house as if no such tenancy existed or ever had existed."

When one applied that section to the present case, it became clear that the house in question was one to which the Act applied, but that the tenancy of the defendant was to be regarded as if it did not exist and never had existed. Since there was no existing tenancy of the defendant to which the Act applied, then he ceased to be a tenant for the purposes of the Act, and the case was removed from the restriction upon orders for possession which was enacted by section 5, subsection 1, [re-enacted by section 4 of the Act of 1923]. The plaintiff, therefore, was entitled to avail herself of her common law legal right to possession, and the appeal failed.

MR. JUSTICE MACKINNON concurred.

Leave to appeal was granted.

TODD v. EGYPTIAN DELTA LAND AND INVESTMENT COMPANY, LIMITED.*

Revenue — Income-tax — Company—Residence —Management abroad—Whether resident in this country—Income Tax Act, 1918 (8 and 9 Geo. V., c. 40), Sched. D., Cases IV. and V.

Although a company, which is registered in this country but has its control and management abroad, resides where it is controlled and managed, yet it does not reside there exclusively, but it necessarily resides in this country so as to be liable to income-tax, because it is obliged by law to perform in this country certain duties which cannot be performed from abroad, such as the keeping of a register of shareholders and allowing the public to inspect the register.

This was an appeal by the Crown from a decision of the General Commissioners for Income Tax for the City of London given on November 16, 1925, upon an appeal by the Egyptian Delta Land and Investment Company, Limited, whose registered office was at No. 211-214, Gresham House, Old Broad-street, against assessments to income-tax under Cases IV. and V. of Schedule D in respect of the years 1919, 1920 to 1924, and 1925.

The company was incorporated in England in 1904, and among its objects were the purchase of lands in Egypt and the development of the resources of those lands. In 1907 by a special resolution of the company it was resolved :—"That it is desirable that the business and affairs of the company should henceforth be managed and directed entirely from Egypt and that accordingly the articles of association be varied."

In pursuance of that resolution the business of the company was in 1907 transferred to Cairo, and had since been controlled, managed, directed, and carried on entirely in Cairo. All the London directors retired in that year and a new board, the members of which were all permanently resident in Cairo, was appointed. No directors' meeting had since been held in the United Kingdom. The secretary resided in Egypt, and the seal and all books of the company were kept in Egypt. The company's banking account was with the National Bank of Egypt at Cairo, the company's account with the London agency not being entirely closed, but being used only for the payment of small disbursements, to the amount of £8 or £9 annually, made by the agency on instructions from Egypt. The register of transfers was kept in Cairo, where transfers of shares were passed before being registered in London. The accounts were made up and audited, and dividends were declared and paid exclusively from Cairo.

In order to comply with the requirements of the Companies Acts there was a registered office of the company in London at which the registers of members and directors and bearer warrants were kept. To meet those statutory requirements the company paid a fee to Mr. F. J. Horn, who provided them (together with several other companies) with a registered office at his address at Gresham House, where their name appeared on the door. No room or part of a room was appropriated to the company, and there were in fact more companies than rooms. The London secretary performed the statutory duties of filing the annual summary with the Registrar (after it had been checked and signed in Egypt), and also dealt with correspondence from shareholders and transmitted to Cairo applications for share warrants and transfers which might be sent to the registered office. His position was purely formal ; he had no power of attorney and no power to do anything more than the law required the company to do here.

The company contended that the case of Swedish Central Railway Company, Limited v. Thompson (41 The Times L.R., 385 ; [1925] A.C., 495) was distinguishable, that the company was resident in Egypt and not in the United Kingdom ; and that the mere fact that it had a registered office here and complied with the statutory requirements of the Companies Acts did not constitute residence for the purposes of the Income Tax Acts.

The Crown contended that the case was not distinguishable from Swedish Central Railway Company, Limited v. Thompson (supra) ; that the essential and important elements of incorporation in this country, of the situation of the registered office here, and of the activities required by law to be performed here, were present in this case ; and that the activities of the London secretary were appreciable and important.

The General Commissioners held that Swedish Central Railway Company, Limited v. Thompson (supra) was distinguishable, and that the company was not resident here.

The Crown appealed.

The Attorney-General (Sir Douglas Hogg, K.C.) and Mr. R. P. Hills appeared for the Crown ; Sir John Simon, K.C., and Mr. Bremner for the respondents.

Mr. Justice Rowlatt, in giving judgment, said that one thing was clear, namely, that the mere fact of registration in this country did not determine the question of residence. A company could be registered without any tie of locality being put upon it. In those circumstances the authorities decided that it could not be said to reside in the place to which it merely owed its birth. Another point he thought was clear—that where a company had its control and management there it resided, although not necessarily exclusively. What he had to decide was whether a company which had an establishment in this country but was managed abroad necessarily resided here.

It was not only that a company had to perform certain duties here, such as the making of returns, which it might do from abroad, but the Act required that it should have a place here. It seemed to him, applying the analogy of a natural person, that the company was always to be at home here. Sir John Simon had treated that obligation of the company as an obligation to have a place where process could be served. That was true, but the other obligations —to keep a register, to allow the public to inspect the register, &c.—were all things which the law insisted that the company should be here to do. It seemed to him that that constituted the idea of residence. It was contended that the company could change its residence, and that was true of residence in the sense of the place where it managed its affairs, but Parliament had said that the registered office must be in this country. That was perhaps an accident, but the company must have an establishment somewhere, and that establishment was here. Companies could not be incorporated as ambulatory bodies having no residence anywhere.

That was his opinion upon the question, but even if his opinion had been otherwise he would have hesitated long about expressing it in view of what Lord Justice Warrington (as he then was) said in Swedish Central Railway Company, Limited v. Thompson ([1924] 2 K.B., 255).

It was said that that was obiter. He thought that it was not a mere "remark by the way" but a ground of the decision, though it might be that the decision was also based upon a wider ground. He thought that the appeal should be allowed.

HODSON AND ANOTHER v. BARNES (BARNES AND OTHERS INTERVENING).*

Will—Seaman's will—Writing on eggshell—Wills Act, 1837 (1 Vict., c. 26), s. 11.

The defendant's husband, who was a pilot on the Manchester Ship Canal, executed a will in ordinary form in 1920, and after his death in 1925 the defendant found in his bedroom on the top of a wardrobe an empty eggshell on which was written in her husband's handwriting, in indelible ink, "17—1925. Mag. Everything i possess.—J. B." The initials of the name of the defendant's husband were "J. B.," and he always called her "Mag."

The plaintiffs, as executors, propounded the will of 1920, and the defendant, alleging that the will of 1920 had been revoked by her husband's true last will, made in 1925 while at sea—namely, the writing on the eggshell—claimed a grant of letters of administration with the will of 1925 annexed.

Held, (1) that without the aid of evidence from extrinsic circumstances the writing on the eggshell could not be deemed to be a testamentary disposition, (2) that it was not proved to have been made at a time when the testator's position corresponded to that of a soldier in expeditione, and the Court must pronounce against the alleged will of 1925 and in favour of the will of 1920.

For the first time in the records of the Court writing on the shell of a hen's egg was propounded as a will. The action concerned the testamentary dispositions of the late Mr. James Barnes, a pilot on the Manchester Ship Canal, formerly of Greenbank, Allport-lane, Bromborough, who died on June 18, 1925, leaving property worth about £5,500. The plaintiffs, Messrs. William Henry Hodson and Robert Southwood, as executors, propounded a will of the testator dated October 27, 1920, executed in ordinary form.

The defendant, Mrs. Margaret Barnes, the widow of the testator, said that the will propounded was revoked by the true last will made by the testator in 1925 while at sea, and that that will, which was written on an egg, appointed her the universal legatee and devisee of the property. She claimed a grant of letters of administration with the will of 1925 annexed.

The executors traversed the defence. Mr. Robert Barnes, of Copthill, Peaslake, Surrey, son of the testator, and other relatives who were interested under the 1920 will, intervened, and also disputed the 1925 will and propounded the will of 1920.

Mr. Clifford Mortimer and Mr. A. Lewey appeared for the executors; Mr. Bayford, K.C., and Mr. T. Bucknill for the widow; and Mr. Cotes-Preedy, K.C., and Mr. G. Tyndale for the interveners.

Mr. Bayford, opening the case for the defendant, said that the testator was employed by the Manchester Ship Canal Company as a pilot, and that he also had a retainer from the Anglo-American Oil Company. He died on June 18, 1925, aged 68. The will set up by his widow was written in the testator's handwriting, in indelible ink, on the empty shell of a hen's egg. It read as follows:—

"17—1925. Mag. Everything i possess.—J. B."

The President.—It is a fragile thing. It is here.

This was propounded, continued counsel, as the will of a seaman at sea under section 11 of the Wills Act, 1837, and was sufficient to pass the whole of the estate. The testator, who was a widower when he married the defendant in June, 1914, always called her "Mag." By his first wife he had three sons, William, Ernest, and Robert.

In 1917 he had an accident in a ship and suffered internal injuries. He had to diet himself, and he took eggs with him when he went to his work. He made the will of October, 1920, after a bad heart attack. That will gave to the widow £400 and an annuity of £52, a house in Beaconsfield-road, Tranmere, for life, and certain jewelry and trinkets; £100 to the testator's son William; and half of the residue in trust for the testator's son Robert absolutely, and the other half in trust for the four children of his son Ernest, who died in 1918. In August, 1924, the testator bought a bungalow at Bromborough. He told his wife several times later that he intended to execute a codicil. Once he told her that he had made another will.

On June 17, 1925, he went to Liverpool on business and was taken very ill. His wife brought him home, and he died next day. The will of 1920 was read after the funeral, and, as the defendant always thought that there had been a codicil, she entered a caveat. She was cleaning out the testator's bed room on October 15, 1925, when she found in the well on the top of a wardrobe an eggshell and a piece of paper charred at one end with some sealing wax on it. The wardrobe top was very dusty, but not the shell, and it could not have been there long. On the egg she read the writing and at once summoned a maidservant and her mother, and also her solicitor, Mr. T. W. McLean, who saw the egg.

In law, a pilot was a mariner or seaman, which expressions included, roughly, anybody in the merchant service. It had been decided that a purser, a chaplain, a naval surgeon, and even a woman typist in the Lusitania (In re Hale; [1915] 2 I.R., 362) came within that category. Where a person came within that category he was on maritime service. There were many cases of wills being made in harbour. Counsel referred to In re M'Murdo (L.R., 1 P. and D., 540); In re Patterson (79 L.T., 123), where a will was made on a river ; In re Lay (2 Curt., 375), where a will was made on shore ; and In re Parker (2 Sw. and Tr., 375). In the present case the testator's service was partly in the tidal portion of the river Mersey. There was also authority for a testator's initials being sufficient in certain circumstances.

Mrs. Margaret Barnes, giving evidence, said that the testator, after being put on diet, often took uncooked eggs with him when he went to work. They were boiled for him at the pilots' station. He had told her that he did not want to make another will because the solicitor's fees were so heavy. After 1924 he often said that he was leaving her everything.

The eggshell was produced, resting in cottonwool in a small wooden box, and was identified by the witness. It had a small hole at one end and had evidently been blown.

Mrs. Barnes, cross-examined, said that she was present at the death of her husband's son Ernest, and she and the testator had promised that he (the testator) would leave something to Ernest's children.

Mr. MORTIMER.—Was there any reason for his leaving all to you to the exclusion of his children ?—He had been very good to them. It was a natural thing to leave all to his widow.

The witness agreed that Mr. Hodson, managing clerk to Messrs. Simpson, North, and Co., was a close friend of the testator. She had not told Mr. Hodson that her husband was a bad old man and that she was going to upset his will. Her husband was not eccentric. They had had several quarrels in 1925.

In reply to Mr. COTES-PREEDY, Mrs. Barnes said that she was a barmaid before marrying the testator in 1914.

Mr. Noel C. Callister, a helmsman on the Manchester Ship Canal, said that he remembered the testator aboard a ship one day asking if an officer knew how to blow an egg correctly.

After further evidence was given of the nature of the testator's service, and that the egg was shown by the defendant to three witnesses directly after she found it, Mr. MORTIMER and Mr. COTES-PREEDY submitted that there was no case.

Mr. BAYFORD referred to In re Austen (2 Rob. Ecc., 611) (which the PRESIDENT distinguished from the present case) ; In re Corby (1 Spinks, 292) ; In re Hayes (2 Curt., 338), and In re Saunders (L.R., 1 P. and D., 16). He recalled an unreported case during the Boer War which came before Lord Gorell, where the words "all to mother," written by a soldier on half an envelope, were admitted as a soldier's will. The soldier died on active service.

The PRESIDENT.—And was in peril of his life. Here the man was not on a desert island. He had access to paper and ink any day, and had already made two wills.

Mr. W. H. Hodson, one of the plaintiffs, said that he was managing clerk of the Liverpool firm of solicitors acting for the plaintiffs, and had been with them for 60 years. He had known the testator for 20 years as a friend, and had prepared wills for him in 1906 and 1920. He had often met him after the 1920 will was executed, and he had never expressed a desire to alter it.

Further evidence having been given for the plaintiffs, there was a short legal argument.

LORD MERRIVALE (to Mr. Mortimer).—Does your argument come to this : That a seaman at sea in the sense of section 11 of the Wills Act, 1837, must be in practically the same position as a soldier in expeditione ?

Mr. MORTIMER.—Yes, my Lord. "At sea" are the essential words.

The PRESIDENT, in giving judgment, said that he found, as a fact, that the writing on the eggshell was that of the testator. The two questions which then arose were :—(1) Was it a testamentary disposition ? (2) Was it a will of a mariner at sea within the exception provided by the Wills Act, 1837 ? It was not difficult to conceive a state of facts in which unquestionably it would be a testamentary document. Barnes had handed the eggshell over to a custodian to be put in a secret place. But the writing itself, without any evidence from extrinsic circumstances, could not be said with any certainty to be a testamentary disposition. It ran :—"17—1925. Mag. Everything i possess.—J. B." Taken by itself, who could say that it disposed of the property ? If the word "to" had been there, it might have made a considerable difference, but he must follow the principle defined by Sir John Nicholl in Passmore v. Passmore (1 Phill. Ecc. Rep., at p. 218) :—

"The Court must judge . . . whether it was written and intended as a formal, permanent will . . . or whether it was a deliberative and temporary paper, which expressed the impression and wishes of the moment, and was never afterwards thought of, or adverted to. In the latter case it can only be established by the aid of extrinsic circumstances."

In the present case the testator was familiar with the process of making a landsman's will. As a testamentary act the writing on the egg was one of the most grotesque proceedings conceivable on the part of a man in a responsible position, with a mind capable of grasping the subjects involved, and with ample facilities for making an ordinary will. He was asked to say that the testator took the egg, from which he had blown out the contents, and had written his will upon the shell after a paroxysm of heart trouble. Not only was it one of the most incredible things of which he had ever heard, but it was inconsistent with the character of the testator. The Court must act on proof and not on speculation and conjecture.

All that the evidence showed was that in a recess on the top of a wardrobe the eggshell was found, together with a piece of paper which had been used as a taper to melt some sealing wax. Correspondence by the widow, written before the discovery of the shell, showed that the will of 1920 was the only one of which she had any knowledge. He must hold that the writing on the eggshell was not a testamentary disposition.

There was another difficulty which went to the root of the widow's case. He shared the opinion of his predecessors that nothing should be done to limit the operative value of section 11 of the Wills Act, 1837, with regard to nuncupative wills, but it must not be fantastically extended to cases to which it was not intended to apply. Extreme cases had arisen with regard to soldiers and seamen on service, but even supposing that the testator was a mariner at sea for certain parts of his duties, it did not follow that he was a mariner at sea at all times in the sense of the exception provided by the Wills Act, 1837.

He did not find affirmatively that the writing on the egg was made when the testator was on shipboard, or going to his duties there, or returning from them, or that his position corresponded in any way with that of a soldier in expeditione. His duties were intermittent. At times he was living ashore in a bungalow. The allegations of the defence therefore failed.

His Lordship pronounced against the alleged will on the eggshell and in favour of the will of 1920. He would not go so far as to say it was a cruel joke on the part of the testator, as suggested by Mr. Bayford. He would allow the widow's costs out of the estate, and also those of the interveners.

RIVERSDALE MILL COMPANY, LIMITED v. HART.*

Master and Servant—Truck Acts—Lancashire cotton trade—"Standard list" of wages—Deductions for bad work—Truck Act, 1831 (1 and 2 Will. IV., c. 37), ss. 3, 23—Truck Act, 1896 (59 and 60 Vict., c. 44), ss. 2, 9.

Section 3 of the Truck Act, 1831, provides for the payment in current coin of the Realm of "the entire amount of the wages earned by or payable to any artificer . . . in respect of any labour done by him."

Section 23 permits an employer to make, and contract to make, reasonable deductions from wages in respect of certain specified matters.

Section 2 of the Truck Act, 1896, prohibits an employer from making, except under certain conditions, "any contract with any workman for any deduction from the sum contracted to be paid by the employer to the workman, or for any payment to the employer by the workman for or in respect of bad or negligent work or injury to the materials or other property of the employer. . . ."

Section 9 provides for the exemption from the provisions of the Act by order of the Secretary of State of persons engaged in certain trades, either generally or within a particular area.

By order dated March 3, 1897, the Secretary of State exempted from the provisions of the Act persons engaged in the weaving of cotton in the county of Lancashire.

The respondent, a weaver of cotton in Lancashire employed by the appellants, was negligent in performing certain work and, in accordance with a custom which had long existed in the Lancashire trade, the employers deducted a reasonable sum from the "standard list" rates of wages which had been agreed between the employers' and workers' organizations, as the remuneration for good, merchantable cloth, and paid her the balance as her wages.

Held (per Avory and Salter, JJ., Lord Hewart, C.J., dissenting), that this deduction was not illegal as being in contravention of the provisions of the Truck Acts.

Per Avory and Salter, JJ.: The implied contract between the parties was that the respondent should be paid according to the "standard list," subject to a fair deduction for bad work, and that, as the order of March 3, 1897, exempted the parties from the provisions of s. 2 of the Act of 1896, the appellants were entitled, as they would have been before the passing of that Act, to make deductions for bad work in calculating the amount of wages due. The deduction was made from the standard list to ascertain the wages earned; it was not made from the wages earned.

Per Lord Hewart, C.J.: "The entire amount of the wages earned by or payable to" the respondent within section 3 of the Act of 1831 was the amount specified in the "standard list" and not that amount less an uncertain sum to be assessed by the employers by way of damages, and, therefore, the deduction made by the appellants was illegal.

Judgment in favour of the employers was given in this appeal, by way of case stated, from Bolton justices, which raised the question of the legality of the customary method of paying pieceworkers in the textile trades.

The respondent, a woman textile pieceworker named Nellie Hart, preferred in the Bolton Police Court against the appellants, her employers, the Riversdale Mill Company, Limited, a claim under the Employers and Workmen Act, 1875, for the sum of 6d., being the balance of wages alleged to be due to her and unlawfully deducted by the employers, who counterclaimed for 1s. in respect of damages suffered by them through the negligence of the respondent.

It was admitted that the respondent was negligent, and that the 1s. claimed by the employers was a fair claim for the damage done to the employers' cloth through her negligence.

The case stated found that it was the duty of the respondent to weave a good merchantable cloth by performing her work without negligence and in a careful manner; that she was to be paid for her work according to a standard list, an implied condition of which was that the prices in the list should apply to good merchantable cloth produced by the observance by the respondent of her duty as a weaver. There was a practice to pay more than the standard price if the materials provided by the employer were defective, as payment for extra work due to defective material. But if the workmanship of a weaver was bad or negligent, there was, and had been for many years, a custom to pay a sum less than the sum contained in the standard list—namely, the standard list price less compensation assessed by the employer of a reasonable amount in respect of the loss suffered by him through damage to his cloth. It was admitted for the purpose of the case that the deduction of 6d. was fair and reasonable and less than the actual loss caused to the employers.

The employers contended that section 3 of the Truck Act, 1831, had nothing to do with a deduction for bad work; that the amount of wages "earned by" and the amount "payable to" a workman were not necessarily the same thing, but that in this case the amount shown in the standard list was not "earned" because some of the work was bad, and that that amount was subject to a deduction for bad work. Nor was it "payable" to the weaver, because the amount to be paid was the net wage after the deduction, which formed no part of the wages. It was further contended that the effect of the order made by the Home Secretary on March 3, 1897, exempting the cotton weaving industry from the operation of the Truck Act, 1896, was to leave the industry free to make contracts permitting deductions in respect of bad work.

On the part of the respondent it was contended that the claim was based upon section 3 of the Truck Act, 1831, and that the Truck Act, 1896, had no application to the case.

The justices were of opinion that the standard list was the rate of wages applicable, and held that the employers had illegally deducted 6d. by way of fine from the wages of the respondent, and gave judgment for the respondent for 6d. On the employers' counterclaim the justices gave judgment in their favour for 1s.

The employers appealed.

Mr. Cyril Atkinson, K.C., and Mr. Harold Derbyshire appeared for the appellants; Mr. Eastham, K.C., and Mr. Laski for the respondent.

The following judgments were read:—

The Lord Chief Justice.—This is a case stated by justices for the county borough of Bolton. It arises out of a complaint or claim preferred by the present respondent under the Employers and Workmen Act, 1875, against the present appellants, the Riversdale Mill Company, Limited, who were the employers, for the sum of 6d., being a balance of wages alleged to be due to the respondent as a weaver of the employers, and unlawfully deducted from her wages. That complaint or claim was heard on February 1, 1926. The justices found that the sum of 6d. was illegally deducted and they accordingly awarded the respondent that amount. The employers had counterclaimed for the sum of 1s. in the following terms: "Take notice that upon the hearing of this summons the defendants intend to set up a counterclaim against the plaintiff for damages sustained by the defendants by reason of the plaintiff's negligence in the discharge of her duties as a weaver and/or in the alternative damages for breach of contract of service. Particulars: April 28, 1925, To value of cloth belonging to the defendants and damaged by the plaintiff by reason of the plaintiff's negligence in the discharge of her duties as a weaver, 1s. . . ." Upon this counterclaim the justices found for the employers and awarded them 1s. as damages.

The employers were dissatisfied with the determination and accordingly a case was stated. It is not necessary that I should read the whole of the case, but certain parts of it ought to be read. It was admitted by counsel for the respondent, for the purposes of the case, and only for the purposes of the case, that the respondent was negligent and that the 1s. claimed by the employers was a fair claim for the damage done to the employers' cloth through the negligence of the respondent. The case further finds that the respondent was employed by the employers as a cotton weaver in a cotton weaving mill under a customary contract of service whereby the employers were to find the warp and the weft and the respondent was to weave the warp and the weft into cloth. The case goes on to say that it was the duty of the respondent to weave a good merchantable cloth by performing her work without negligence and in a careful manner, and that the respondent was to be paid for her work according to a standard list, and then the case adds the following words: "An implied condition of which was that the prices in the list should apply to good merchantable cloth produced by the observance by the respondent of her duty as a weaver." In other words, the respondent was employed to weave well and not to weave badly.

The case goes on to say: "In the event, however, of the material provided by the employers being defective, there is a practice to pay a sum higher than that contained in the standard list as payment for extra work due to defective material." On the other hand, "if the workmanship of a weaver was bad or negligent, there is and has been for many years a custom to pay a sum less than that contained in the standard list—namely, the standard list price less compensation assessed by the employer of a reasonable amount in respect of the loss suffered by the employer for damage to his cloth. It was admitted for the purpose of the case that the deduction of 6d. made in this case for bad work was fair and reasonable and less than the actual loss caused to the employers." Then comes this significant paragraph: "Deductions for bad work are and have been for many years the usage and custom in the cotton weaving trade of Lancashire and have always been and are an incident of a weaver's contract of service and have always been and are taken into account in calculating the correct wages. It was admitted by the employers' witnesses that fines and deductions for bad and negligent work had always been objected to on principle by the workmen as a class." It was further mentioned to us in the course of the argument, and it is common ground, that a weaver is employed from day to day and a contract of service can be put an end to by one day's notice. "A wages book was produced by the employers, the production of which was objected to by counsel for the workman on the ground that such book was not receivable in evidence against the workman, and it was admitted by the witness producing the book that the weavers did not sign the book and were not concerned with the book." A specimen sheet of the book is exhibited to and forms part of the case, "subject to the fact that we, the said Court, refer to the said objection as to the admissibility of this document."

In that state of facts it was contended by the respondent that the claim was based upon the provisions of section 3 of the Truck Act, 1831, whereby the entire amount of the wages is payable to the workman and no deduction is lawful, except the deductions mentioned in that Act. The employers, on the other hand, contended that section 3 of the Act of 1831 had nothing to do with the deduction for bad work, that the Act dealt only with payment to a workman in kind instead of in coin, and that the amount of wages earned by and the amount of wages payable to a workman were not necessarily one and the same thing. Such is the case as stated, and upon the questions which it involves I have the grave misfortune to differ from the other members of the Court.

The first question which arises is: What was the amount of wages payable to the respondent under the contract with the employers? The justices were of opinion that the standard list was the rate of wages applicable, and that, in my view, was a conclusion of fact by which this Court is bound if there was evidence to support it. In my opinion, there was ample evidence to justify such a conclusion, and, indeed, on the facts as stated, I should have come to the same conclusion myself. It seems to me that the real contract between the parties was that the wages for work done should be paid in accordance with the standard list, and that if the workmanship was bad or negligent the employers should be entitled to compensation, that is to say, to damages, to be assessed at a reasonable sum in respect of the loss suffered by them—a totally different thing from making a deduction from wages. The employers seem to have recognized that that is the true position by counterclaiming 1s. in respect of the damage sustained by them. Moreover, Mr. Eastham told us, and I accept what he said, that the argument for the employers before the justices proceeded on the basis that the 6d. was in fact a deduction from the respondent's wages and that it was permissible for employers to make a deduction from wages for bad work; and in the sheet of the wages book produced by the employers and exhibited to the case the column in which the deduction would appear is headed "Abatement for bad work, &c.," and this abatement would be made from the amount in the column headed "Weavers' Wages" in order to arrive at the amount in the final column headed "Net Wages."

I cannot help thinking that the argument advanced before us on behalf of the employers was an ingenious afterthought. The scheme of it was to get rid of any difficulty connected with deductions from wages by the simple device of saying that no deduction should be regarded as having been made from wages inasmuch as the amount of the wages was not ascertained until the deduction had been made. From what, then, are the deductions to be made? Apparently from some notional figure representing an ideal standard of wages which never becomes actual until suitable deductions have been made from it. I am bound to say that, if this kind of reasoning is sound, both the Legislature and the Courts would appear to have wasted a good deal of time upon problems connected with the Truck Acts.

It follows that, in my opinion, "the entire amount of the wages" payable to the respondent was the amount specified in the standard list, and not that amount less an uncertain sum to be assessed by the employers by way of damages, and if this view is correct, the case is concluded by the decision of the House of Lords in Williams v. North's Navigation Collieries (1889), Limited (22 The Times L.R., 372; [1906] A.C., 136), where it was unanimously held that section 3 of the Truck Act, 1831, renders illegal any deduction by an employer when he is paying wages other than the deductions expressly authorized by the Act.

With regard to the so-called custom to make deductions for bad work, it is sufficient to say that, even if the practice had been generally recognized and acquiesced in as a term of the contract by the workmen, instead of having been always objected to by them on principle, it would have been, in my opinion, illegal as a contravention of the provisions of the Truck Act, 1831.

It may be observed that, if the appellants' contention that the entire amount of wages earned or payable is the amount specified in the standard list less an uncertain sum to be assessed by the employers for bad or negligent work were right, no weaver in Lancashire would ever know with any certainty what his wages are to be. If he were asked what wages he earns, he would have to say: "I do not know. There is a standard list of wages, but deductions of uncertain amount to be assessed by my employers on account of alleged bad work may be made from the wages specified in the standard list, so that I never know how much I am earning." Such a state of things is, in my opinion, quite contrary to the provisions and the spirit of the Truck Acts. See the analysis of the Act of 1831 in the judgment of Mr. Justice Keating, concurred in by Mr. Justice Williams and Mr. Justice Willes, in Archer v. James (2 B. and S., 61)—an analysis, I may say, not differed from by the rest of the Court.

In view of the decision of the House of Lords already referred to, it is, I think, unnecessary to consider the arguments addressed to us with reference to the Truck Act of 1896. I think, therefore, that this appeal fails.

Mr. Justice Avory.—With the profoundest respect for the judgment just delivered by my Lord, I am unable to concur in it. The question before the justices in this case was whether the respondent, Nellie Hart, was entitled to claim from the appellants the sum of 6d. as the balance of wages due to her as a weaver in a cotton mill in Lancashire. The justices held that the said sum of 6d. had been illegally deducted from the wages by way of fine and gave judgment in her favour for that sum. On behalf of the respondent it is contended that the non-payment of the said sum of 6d. amounted to a deduction from the wages earned in breach of section 3 of the Truck Act, 1831, and that under section 4 of the same Act she was entitled to recover the same. On behalf of the appellants it is contended that the entire amount of the wages earned by the respondent had been actually paid to the respondent in accordance with the statute. In my view, the effect of the findings in the special case is that the respondent was employed to weave a good, merchantable cloth, under an implied contract that she should be paid for her work according to a standard list, subject to a fair and reasonable deduction for bad work. It is admitted that the 6d. is a fair and reasonable deduction in this case, and therefore, in my opinion, the amount paid to the respondent less the 6d. did represent the entire amount of the wages earned by her.

The question that arises is whether the calculation of the amount of wages in this manner is forbidden by the Truck Acts, 1831 to 1896, or by the decisions upon those Acts. With regard to the statutes, I find nothing in the principal Act of 1831 which expressly forbids a deduction for bad work in the calculation of the wages. The Hosiery Manufacture (Wages) Act, 1874, section 1, expressly recognizes the right to deduct for bad workmanship. The Truck Act, 1896, by section 2, forbids any deduction from the sum contracted to be paid to the workman, or any payment by the workman to the employer for or in respect of bad work unless the terms of that section are complied with. In my opinion, this section impliedly recognized that deductions for bad work had theretofore been lawfully made in calculating the amount of wages due and introduced a new protection for the workman in respect to such deductions, but section 9 of the Act of 1896 provided that the Secretary of State might grant exemptions from the provisions of the Act in respect of persons engaged in any particular trade within any specified area, and by Order made on March 3, 1897, the Secretary of State granted exemption from those provisions in respect of persons engaged in all branches of the weaving of cotton in the county of Lancashire. The result, therefore, is that while that Order remains in force the employer is not affected by the provisions of the Act of 1896, and in my view is entitled, as he was before that Act, to make deductions for bad work in calculating the amount of wages due. I see no difference in principle between this case and the case of the worker employed in piecework, the amount of whose wages cannot be calculated until it is ascertained at the end of the week what work she has done.

The question remains whether the decisions on these statutes are in conflict with the view which I have expressed. In the case of Williams v. North's Navigation Collieries (1889), Limited (22 The Times L.R., 372 ; [1906] A.C., 136), which was relied on for the respondent, there was no dispute that the entire amount of the wages had been earned by the workman, and the deduction which was objected to was for an antecedent debt due to the employer. It is true that in that case Lord Loreburn, L.C. (22 The Times L.R., at p. 372 ; [1906] A.C., at p. 140), used the expression that the employer " in ascertaining how much is payable as wages . . . can subtract nothing except the deductions expressly sanctioned by the Act," but I think that must be read in its application to a case where the entire amount of the wages earned by the labour of the workman is not in dispute. The cases of Chawner v. Cummings (8 Q.B., 311) and Archer v. James (2 B. and S., 61) were relied on by the appellants and, in my opinion, support their contention in this case. In both of these cases there was a difference of opinion in the Exchequer Chamber, but they were not dissented from in the House of Lords in Williams v. North's Navigation Collieries (1889), Limited (supra). On the contrary, both Lord Davey and Lord Atkinson, who commented upon them, expressed the opinion that the basis of the decision in those cases was that the alleged deductions were elements only in calculating the real amount of the workman's wages. Lord Davey (22 The Times L.R., at p. 373 ; [1906] A.C., at p. 142), said : " In Chawner v. Cummings (supra) the plaintiff was presumed to have contracted upon the usual and well-known terms in the trade, and certain customary deductions which had been made from his nominal wages were held not to be in the nature of payment at all, but the mode of calculating and ascertaining the actual amount of his wages. Archer v. James (supra) was a similar case, and was decided in the first instance on the authority of Chawner v. Cummings (supra). In the Exchequer Chamber three Judges held that Chawner v. Cummings (supra) was wrongly decided, and three other Judges, on the other hand, approved the decision, and held that the deductions in question in the case before them were in the same category and were elements only in calculating the real amount of the workman's wages." Lord Atkinson (22 The Times L.R., at p. 374 ; [1906] A.C., at p. 146) said : " The several authorities cited appear to me to support rather than refute the contention of the appellants. They may, I think, be roughly divided into two classes—namely, those cases like Chawner v. Cummings (supra), in which charges were made by the employer for the use of the instrument by which the workman did his work and earned his wage ; and those like Hewlett v. Allen (8 The Times L.R., 793 ; 10 The Times L.R., 464 ; [1892] 2 Q.B., 662 ; [1894] A.C., 383), in which payments were in effect made by the master out of the wages by the authority of the workman for certain purposes not prohibited by the Truck Acts. . . . In the first class of cases it was successfully contended that the charges made by the master were not deductions properly so-called from sums due for wages earned, but were sums to be taken into account in ascertaining the amount of wages actually earned."

In the case of Pritchard v. James Clay (Wellington), Limited (42 The Times L.R., 139 ; [1926] 1 K.B., 238), this Court held that there had been an infringement of the Truck Act of 1896 on the ground that the provisions of that Act with regard to the deductions had not been complied with. In view of the fact that the cotton weaving trade in Lancashire is exempt from the provisions of that Act, I do not think that this decision has any application to the present question.

I, therefore, come to the conclusion that neither in the statutes nor in the reported decisions is there anything making it illegal to calculate the wages earned as was done in this case, and that the respondent was not in the circumstances entitled to recover the 6d., and that the appeal should accordingly be allowed. The fact that the appellants put forward a counterclaim ought not, in my view, to be regarded as inconsistent with their contention on the main question, but only as an alternative to their defence, and it should, in the circumstances, be dismissed and this case remitted to the justices to enter judgment for the appellants on the claim and for the respondent on the counterclaim, with such costs as the justices may determine.

Mr. Justice Salter.—I agree that this appeal should be allowed. In my opinion, the justices were wrong on both points. They should have dismissed the claim and the counterclaim. The contract between the parties was wholly an implied contract—implied from the usage and course of dealing in the trade. The contract, so far as it deals with payment, provides for three events : First, where the employer provides good material and the workman does good work ; secondly, where the workman does good work but the employer provides bad material ; and thirdly, where the employer provides good material and the workman does bad work. In the first event, the agreed amount of the wages is the sum shown on the standard list. In the second event, the agreed amount of the wages is a sum larger than that shown on the standard list, but the method of ascertaining it is not set out in the case. In the third event, the agreed amount of the wages is a sum to be computed by subtracting from the standard list such sum as the employer reasonably considers to be fair. If the first event had happened the amount of wages earned by the workman would have been 8s. 11½d. If the second event had happened, the wages earned would have been some larger sum. The event which in fact happened was the third, and the employer subtracted from the 8s. 11½d. the sum of 6d. This was admittedly a reasonable sum, and the amount of wages earned by the workman was therefore 8s. 5½d. : 8s. 5½d. was paid to the workman in cash.

I entertain some doubt whether there was any evidence of a trade usage from which the term set out in the case could be implied in the contract, because it is found that the workmen always objected to the alleged usage. Further, it might be said that this usage, even if proved in fact, is bad in law as being unreasonable, oppressive, or uncertain. If the term of the contract set out in the case is not valid, then the contract, so far as it is set out in the case, makes no provision for the event which has happened. But the employer has availed himself of the workman's labour and taken the cloth and doubtless sold it. That being so, there is an implied promise to pay what is fair and right. The plaintiff's claim on quantum meruit is found in the case. It is 7s. 11½d. If, then, the alleged usage is good, the plaintiff has been paid in cash the full amount of the wages earned by or payable to her. If the alleged usage is bad, she has been paid in cash 6d. more than the full amount of the wages earned by her. The plaintiff had, therefore, no cause of action against the defendants at common law. The defendants, also, had no cause of action against the plaintiff. Even if the bad work was a breach of the contract (which I doubt, seeing that the contract provided for it), the defendants suffered no damage thereby, because they paid a reduced sum for the work, a sum fixed by themselves. The counterclaim should have been dismissed.

Then, is there anything in the Truck Act, 1831, to give the plaintiff a cause of action for 6d. more than she has been paid, although she has no right to it at common law? That Act deals mainly with payment in kind. So far as it deals with non-payment and deduction and set-off it deals with two matters—the right of the employer to satisfy a cross-claim by deduction from wages earned and the right of the employer to satisfy his cross-claim by set-off in the workman's action for wages. There are three cases: First, where the cross-claim is permitted by the Act (sections 23 and 24). Here the employer may deduct from the wages earned. In this case, the wages payable are less than the wages earned. Secondly, where the cross-claim is for a matter forbidden by the Act (sections 5 and 6). Here the employer can neither deduct from the wages earned nor set-off against an action for wages. Indeed, by section 6, the cause of action is destroyed altogether. Thirdly, where the cross-claim is for a matter neither permitted nor forbidden by the Act. Here the employer cannot deduct from wages earned. He must pay them in full, although it is more than he owes the workman. But he can set-off his claim in an action by the workman for wages unpaid. Williams v. North's Navigation Collieries (1889), Limited (22 The Times L.R., 372; [1906] A.C., 136), was a case of this class. The employers had a claim for money due from the workman under a judgment. It was held illegal to deduct it from the wages earned, but it was admitted that the workman's action for the unpaid balance of wages earned must fail, because the set-off was good.

If the view I have taken of the contract of employment is correct, the Truck Act, 1831, has no application. Section 3 requires that the entire amount of the wages earned by and payable to the plaintiff shall be paid to her in coin. The amount of wages payable may, in some cases, be less than the amount of wages earned—it can never be more. Here the amount of wages earned by and payable to the plaintiff was, in one view, 7s. 11½d., in another view, 8s. 5½d. The employers did not deduct anything, and had no right to deduct anything, from the wages earned by the respondent. They made a deduction (or subtraction or abatement) from the standard list; they made no deduction from the wages earned.

I think the matter can be tested by considering what the position would have been if this had been a case of the second instead of being a case of the third class which the contract provides for—if the work of the respondent had been good and the material provided by the employers had been bad. The respondent would have been entitled to a sum in excess of the standard list. Supposing a sum of 2s. had been found in the case as being a proper addition, I do not think it could be denied that the sum of 10s. 11½d. would have been the amount of the wages earned by and payable to the respondent. If the wages arrived at by an addition to the standard list are the wages earned by the workman, it seems to me to follow that the wages arrived at by an agreed deduction from the standard list are also the wages earned by and payable to the workman. I agree with the direction which Mr. Justice Avory has indicated.

The appeal was accordingly allowed.

Motor-cars — Brakes — Requirement of two independent brakes—Separate brakes acting on same drum—Whether independent—Motor Cars (Use and Construction) Order, 1904, art. II. (4).

Where a motor vehicle has two separate brakes operating separate brake blocks, the mere fact that both brakes apply their brake blocks to one and the same brake drum does not prevent the brakes from being independent brakes within art. II. (4) of the Motor Cars (Use and Construction) Order, 1904, provided that the vehicle is so constructed that the brake drum is really part of the wheel and not of the brakes.

This case, stated by the Cardiff stipendiary, raised the question whether a B.S.A. motor-bicycle, fitted with a hand brake and a foot brake applying separate brake blocks to the same brake drum, had "two independent brakes" within the meaning of article II. (4) of the Motor Cars (Use and Construction) Order, 1904. The appellant was convicted by the stipendiary of not having two independent brakes.

Mr. Doughty, K.C., and Mr. Jenkin Jones appeared for the appellant; Mr. Wightman Powers for the respondent.

Mr. Doughty contended that "brake" meant that part of the mechanism which extended from the handle or pedal to the brake shoe, and that the brake drum was a part of the wheel designed to receive the impact of the brake. If not, practically every modern motor-car broke the law; for all, or nearly all, adopted that principle, including taxicabs licensed by Scotland Yard.

The Lord Chief Justice.—But is not the brake drum a part of the braking mechanism in the sense that, if it were broken off, neither brake could act, and yet the wheel might go on? The object of the order is to provide alternative means of safety. Is that attained when both brakes operate on the same brake drum?

Mr. Justice Salter.—But there must be a point at which the brake is applied to the bicycle. Where is it, if not where the brake shoes press on the brake drum?

Mr. Powers cited dictionary definitions of a "brake" as a contrivance for retarding the motion of vehicles by means of friction. He submitted that the brake drum was part of the braking apparatus, and that the wheel was perfect and complete without it.

* Reported by J. W. Hall, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

MR. JUSTICE AVORY.—The efficiency of a brake must depend on the existence of something on which it acts. Of course, if the brake drum were taken away the brakes would not be effective.

Mr. POWERS.—The wheel, qua wheel, is perfectly complete without the brake drum; the brake is perfectly useless without it.

MR. JUSTICE AVORY.—Every brake is useless without a wheel.

The following considered judgments were delivered:—

The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE.—This is a case stated by the learned stipendiary magistrate for the city of Cardiff. The matter arises in the following way. An information was preferred against the appellant for unlawfully driving a motor-cycle upon a highway, "without having two independent brakes in good working order and of such efficiency that the application of either to the motor-cycle would cause one of the wheels to be so held as to be effectually prevented from revolving or would have the same effect in stopping the motor-cycle as if such wheel were so held." After hearing the evidence, the learned stipendiary convicted the appellant for not having two independent brakes upon the motor-cycle as required by law.

The question for this Court is whether in coming to that determination the learned magistrate was right in law; in other words, whether there was evidence before him to permit the conclusion to which he came. The provisions of the Motor Cars (Use and Construction) Order, 1904, relevant to the matter are to be found in article II., paragraph (4): "The motor-car shall have two independent brakes in good working order and of such efficiency that the application of either to the motor-car shall cause two of its wheels on the same axle to be so held that the wheels shall be effectually prevented from revolving, or shall have the same effect in stopping the motor-car, as if such wheels were so held. Provided that in the case of a motor-car having less than four wheels this condition shall apply as if instead of two wheels on the same axle one wheel was therein referred to." The interpretation of that order was considered by this Court in the case of Cannon v. Jefford (31 The Times L.R., 489; [1915] 3 K.B., 477), where the question raised was to some extent similar to the question raised here—namely, whether in the actual mechanism employed there were between the two brakes common factors of such a kind as to deprive the brakes of the character of being independent of each other.

What is found in this case with reference to the brakes may be shortly stated. The motor-cycle was fitted with two levers; one of the levers was controlled by hand and the other by the foot. The hand lever communicated with a brake block called the hand-brake block; the foot lever communicated with another brake block called the foot-brake block; and there was fixed to the spokes of the back wheel of the motor-cycle a brake drum. The hand lever, when it was used, caused the hand-brake block to press upon that brake drum; the foot lever, when it was used, caused the foot-brake block to press upon the same drum; and the case finds that the hand lever and the foot lever could be used separately or together. Neither the hand-brake block nor the foot-brake block could work efficiently or at all except by pressure upon the brake drum. More than that, the case finds that any flaw or defect in or accident to the brake drum which interfered with the efficient working of one brake block would also interfere in a similar manner with the efficient working of the other brake block; that is to say, both brake blocks were dependent upon the efficient condition of one brake drum.

In those circumstances the learned magistrate was of the opinion that the intention in framing the order was that if one of the brakes failed the other independent brake could be used in its stead, and he was further of the opinion that the hand lever and brake block and the foot lever and brake block had a certain factor common to each—namely, the brake drum, and that the breakage of the brake drum would put both brake blocks out of action. He therefore came to the conclusion that the motor-cycle had not two independent brakes.

In the course of the argument I was much impressed by what was urged on the part of the respondent to the effect that the object of this provision was, so far as possible at any rate, to secure two completely independent brakes, that the business of the brakes is to stop the revolution of the wheel, and that a brake is of little account if for any reason, when it is used or sought to be used, it fails, and the wheel nevertheless revolves. We were pressed by the argument that this brake drum is not really a part of the wheel but a part of the brake; and that if anything went wrong with it—if, for example, it was severed from the wheel, or if it became partially severed so as to be loose—neither the one brake nor the other, however operated, would produce any effect upon the revolution of the wheel; and it was conceded that, as there is one brake drum, so also there might mechanically be two, one being acted upon by the hand lever and the other being acted upon by the foot lever. But, looking at the facts as a whole, I have, not without reluctance, come to the conclusion that the true view is that this brake drum is not really a part of the brake; it is not a factor common to the two brakes; it is rather to be regarded, as Mr. Doughty contended, as a part of the wheel; and if that view of the facts is correct, as upon consideration I have come to the conclusion it is, then there were no materials to justify this conviction, because the conviction is based upon the view that a part of the wheel itself is a factor common to the two brakes.

For those reasons, and not without diffidence and reluctance, I have come to the conclusion that this appeal succeeds.

MR. JUSTICE AVORY.—I have arrived at the same conclusion. The grounds of the learned magistrate's decision are to be found in the case. They are to this effect: "Any flaw or defect in or accident to the said brake drum which interfered with the efficient working of one brake block would also interfere in a similar manner with the efficient working of the other brake block, i.e., both brake blocks depended upon the efficient condition of the said brake drum"; and the learned magistrate further says: "I was of opinion that the intention in framing this order was that if one of the brakes failed the other independent brake should be used in its stead. I was also of opinion that the hand-lever brake block and the foot-lever brake block had a certain factor common to each—namely, the said brake drum, and that the breakage of the said brake drum would put both brake blocks out of action." I do not think it is correct to say that the brake drum in this case was a factor common to each of the brakes. In my view the brake drum was no part of the brake, but was a part of the wheel upon which the brake acted when it came in contact with it. The brake ended at the brake block, and although it is true to say that the efficient working of each of the brakes depended upon the efficient condition of the brake drum and that the breakage of the brake drum would put the brakes out of action, the same might be said of any part of the wheel or of the machine with which the brake block is intended to be brought into contact with a view to arresting the revolution of the wheel. I do not think that the brakes in this case can be said not to be independent or not to be efficient because a part of the machine upon which the brake is intended to act may break or become damaged, whether it be part of the wheel itself or any other part of the machine.

In my opinion, therefore, the learned magistrate misdirected himself and there was no evidence upon which he could properly hold that there had been an infringement of the Motor Cars (Use and Construction) Order, 1904, in this case; and the appeal should therefore be allowed.

MR. JUSTICE SALTER.—I agree. The question is whether this brake drum is part of the mechanism which applies the retarding force, or part of the vehicle to which the retarding force is applied. With pneumatic tires it is not possible to apply this form of brake in the old-fashioned way to the rim of the wheel, and therefore the wheel is fitted with what is in effect an alternative rim in order that the brake may be applied to it. I think it is part of the vehicle and not part of the brake, and I agree with the judgment of my brethren.

KINGSBURY v. DIRECTOR OF PUBLIC PROSECUTIONS.*

Dangerous Drugs—Supply—Register of persons supplied—Obligation to keep—Exception—Administration by or under direct personal supervision of medical man — Dangerous Drugs Regulations, 1921, regs. 4, 9.

By reg. 4 of the Dangerous Drugs Regulations, 1921, "Except when the drugs are lawfully dispensed in pursuance of a prescription given by a duly qualified medical practitioner . . . or are supplied by a duly qualified medical practitioner or registered veterinary surgeon who dispenses his own medicines, in accordance with the conditions hereinafter specified, no person shall supply or procure or offer to supply or procure any of the drugs to or for any person in the United Kingdom who is not licensed or otherwise authorized to be in possession of the drug. . . . Provided that administration of the drugs by or under the direct personal supervision of a duly qualified medical practitioner . . . shall not be deemed to be supplying the drug within the meaning of this and the following regulations."

By reg. 9, "Every person who supplies any of the drugs shall comply with the following provisions:—(a) He shall enter or cause to be entered in a register kept for the sole purpose all supplies of the drug purchased or otherwise obtained by him and all dealings in the drug effected by him . . . in the form and containing the particulars shown in Schedule 1 to these regulations. . . ."

Held, that the word "administration" in the proviso to reg. 4 as to administration by a medical man is not confined to administration in an emergency as contrasted with a general supply, and that the words "personal supervision" are not limited to cases where the medical man is personally present when the dose is taken.

This was a case stated by Sir William Pryke, the late Lord Mayor of London. On March 1, 1926, an information was preferred by Inspector Pay, of the City Police, against the appellant, Dr. George Chadwick Kingsbury, who was both a barrister and a registered medical practitioner. The information stated that the appellant, between August 20, 1925, and February 2, 1926, unlawfully failed to comply with the provisions of regulation 9 of the regulations dated May 20, 1921, made by the Secretary of State under section 7 of the Dangerous Drugs Act, 1920, in that, having supplied quantities of a certain dangerous drug, to wit, morphine, to a person unknown, he did not enter or cause to be entered in a register kept for the purpose, in the form and containing the particulars shown in Schedule 1 to the regulations, all dealings in the drug effected by him; that was to say, that he did not enter the name or address of the person to whom the drug was supplied, and did not record in a day book the name and address of the patient to whom it was supplied, contrary to section 13 (1) of the Dangerous Drugs Act, 1920, as amended by the Dangerous Drugs and Poisons (Amendment) Act, 1923.

The appellant pleaded "Not Guilty," but consented to be dealt with summarily. The late Lord Mayor convicted him, and ordered him to pay a fine of £25, and £10 10s. costs.

On the hearing before the Lord Mayor, the following facts were proved or admitted:—The appellant was a Doctor of Medicine, and his name duly appeared in the Medical Register for 1925. In 1902 he was called to the Bar, and had practised regularly as a barrister since that date. Old patients of his, and barrister friends in the Temple, had occasionally asked his advice, but he had never accepted any fee from any patient since his call to the bar. Subsequently to the passing of the Dangerous Drugs Act, 1920, the appellant undertook, at the earnest solicitation of two of his old patients, to try to cure them of their having to take certain daily quantities of morphine. In both cases the morphine had been administered by doctors, originally during prolonged illnesses of the patients, and was taken on the average in four doses per diem. Towards the carrying out of his promise the appellant made purchases of morphine in quarter-grain tabloids to the average amount of 17 to 20 grains weekly. He paid for the morphine himself at a cost of about £25, and made no charge to the patients for it. He took no fee for his treatment of the patients, the first of whom was cured before the end of 1924.

During the period covered by the summons, August 20, 1925, to February 2, 1926, the appellant was treating the remaining patient, a worker in the City, and was adopting the gradual reduction treatment. Before the hearing he had succeeded in reducing the drug taken to one-fiftieth of the daily dose taken at the beginning of the treatment. He had seen this patient every other day, even during his own holidays, and, on the days of his visits, had left with the patient the necessary supply of morphine for the proper doses for that day and the succeeding day, with instructions as to the time and method of taking it. On no occasion did the appellant ever depart from that method of treatment, and he had never entrusted the drug to any person other than the patient, save on one occasion (before the period covered by the summons) to the patient's wife. He did not actually see the patient take the drug, but stated that he would have known if the patient had been getting morphine from other doctors.

Dr. Dill Russell, a regional medical officer, visited the appellant on three occasions during December, 1924; gave him the Home Secretary's memorandum of the duties of doctors under the Dangerous Drugs Acts; and stated that he would have to keep the register as explained therein. The appellant gave all the information asked for by Dr. Dill Russell. He further expressed his desire to cooperate in every way with the Home Office, but made it clear that he did not consider that the regulations about keeping a register applied to him. He also objected to giving the names and addresses of his patients, as he thought that subjecting them to police supervision would militate against their recovery. Dr. Dill Russell had never at any interview pressed for those names and addresses, but he told the appellant that he was not sent by the Home Office in any inquisitorial or hostile spirit.

Dr. Roche visited the appellant on October 15, 1925, to inquire about the two aforesaid patients. The appellant told him that the first, a woman, had been cured for a year, and that he was very hopeful of the man, his only remaining case. He showed Dr. Roche his notebook, which did not give the name or address of his patient, and those he declined to disclose. He did not record the name and address of the patient in any book.

Mr. Anderson, a Home Office inspector, called on two occasions to inspect the appellant's notebook, to see whether it complied with the Home Office demand that it should contain the name and address of the patient. The appellant said that, while he had no desire to do anything contrary to the wishes of the Home Secretary, he had not seen his way to disclose the name and address.

The appellant contended (a) that regulation 9 of the regulations of May 20, 1921, was ultra vires, as not being authorized by section 7 of the Dangerous Drugs Act, 1920, under which it purported to be made; (b) that in any case it did not apply to him, as he was not a dispensing doctor; and (c) that the proviso to regulation 4 completely exempted him from regulation 9 and the schedule as to records, as the administration of the drug by or under the personal supervision of a duly qualified medical practitioner was not deemed to be a supplying of the drug within the meaning of the regulations, and that he came within one or both the branches of the proviso.

The respondent contended (a) that regulation 9 was intra vires, and that the appellant was bound to keep the record, including the name and address of the patient; (b) that in regulation 4 the words "administration of the drug by a duly qualified medical practitioner" meant that the doctor must administer every dose by his own hand; and (c) that the words "administration under the direct personal supervision of a duly qualified practitioner" meant that the doctor must be present and either see the patient administer each and every dose to himself or see the nurse or other person administer such dose to the patient.

The late Lord Mayor was of opinion that regulation 9 was a valid regulation, and that in the circumstances the proviso to regulation 4 was not applicable to the appellant. He accordingly found the appellant guilty, and fined him, as above stated.

The following are the material extracts from the regulations of May 20, 1921:—

"Regulation 4.—Except when the drugs are lawfully dispensed in pursuance of a prescription given by a duly qualified medical practitioner . . . or are supplied by a duly qualified medical practitioner or registered veterinary surgeon who dispenses his own medicines, in accordance with the conditions hereinafter specified, no person shall supply or procure or offer to supply or procure any of the drugs to or for any person in the United Kingdom who is not licensed or otherwise authorized to be in possession of the drug. . . . Provided that administration of the drugs by or under the direct personal supervision of a duly qualified medical practitioner . . . shall not be deemed to be supplying the drug within the meaning of this and the following regulations.

"Regulation 9.—Every person who supplies any of the drugs shall comply with the following provisions:—(a) He shall enter or cause to be entered in a register kept for the sole purpose all supplies of the drug purchased or otherwise obtained by him and all dealings in the drug effected by him . . . in the form and containing the particulars shown in Schedule 1 to these regulations. . . . [The form in the schedule contained columns for 'Name and address of person, body, or firm to whom sold or supplied.']

"A duly qualified medical practitioner who records in a day book particulars of any of the drugs supplied by him to any patient, together with the name and address of the patient and date of the supply, may, in lieu of keeping the register . . . enter . . . in a book to be kept for the purpose references under the appropriate dates to the records in the day book. . . ."

By section 13 (1) of the Dangerous Drugs Act, 1920, as amended by section 2 of the Dangerous Drugs and Poisons (Amendment) Act, 1923:—

"Any person who acts in contravention of, or fails to comply with, any regulation made under this Act; . . . shall be guilty of an offence against this Act."

Mr. Norman Birkett, K.C., and Mr. Arthur H. Davis appeared for the appellant; Mr. H. D. Roome for the respondent.

Mr. Birkett, in opening the case for the appellant, said that their Lordships would be glad to hear that at the proceedings before the Lord Mayor it was said by Mr. Roome, and reiterated by the Lord Mayor in registering the conviction, that a technical offence had been committed, but that there was no reflection whatever upon the character of Dr. Kingsbury. In a sentence, what was said was: "You have not kept the record required," to which he answered : " I have done all that the law requires of me."

The appellant's two arguments below had been (a) that regulation 9 was not within the powers conferred by section 7 of the Dangerous Drugs Act, 1920 ; and (b) that, in any case, regulation 4 relieved him of the duty of complying with that regulation. The Act of 1920 was designed to deal with the improper trafficking in drugs and not to interfere with the normal use of them by doctors and with the confidential relations between doctors and their patients. The only specific references to medical practitioners in section 7 related to prescriptions and dispensing, which were not within the general words relating to manufacture, sale, distribution, and possession of drugs.

When one came to section 10, which gave to constables the power to enter and inspect books, it could not be supposed that a constable was intended to be able to enter a doctor's surgery and demand to see the books and the names and addresses of the patients. Under section 14 he could arrest without warrant a patient whom he suspected of committing an offence.

With regard to administration " by or under the direct personal supervision of " the medical practitioner, " administer " was a word not unknown to the criminal law. He referred to Rex v. Harley (4 C. and P., 369). Neither " by " nor " under the direct personal supervision of " implied physical presence, Reg. v. Michael (9 C. and P., 356).

" Direct personal supervision " in no way implied the physical presence of the practitioner. If that were intended it would have been easy to say so in a regulation involving such serious penalties for breach of it. There was no authority upon these words, but there was a case in which a man in Greece was held to be in " actual personal occupancy " of premises in Scotland (Whitelaw v. M'Gowan, 43 Sc.L.R., 346).

The Lord Chief Justice.—If you begin to discuss the meaning of " occupancy " you launch upon a sea which has a very remote shore.

Mr. Birkett, in conclusion, submitted that the course which Dr. Kingsbury followed of making regular visits at short intervals, and of giving to the patient only enough morphine to last him, in accordance with the treatment, till the next visit, was the normal ordinary practice which the highest people in the medical profession had recommended in their report on Drug Addiction for the guidance of the Ministry of Health. Suppose that a doctor required the patient to take minute doses of the drug at frequent intervals, it would need a millionaire to undergo treatment if the doctor had always to be personally present. He submitted that there was no evidence to justify the finding that the administration of this drug had not been under the direct personal supervision of Dr. Kingsbury. The matter, from Dr. Kingsbury's point of view, was now academic, as the patient was now completely cured.

Mr. Roome, at the request of the Court, dealt first with the proviso to regulation 4, and submitted that " direct personal supervision " was the strongest phrase that could be used. Here what was done was to supply the patient with a quantity of the drug which was intended to last two days, but which the patient might have taken within a few hours.

The Lord Chief Justice.—Suppose a doctor personally administers a dose of medicine to a patient at 11 a.m., and says : " If his temperature rises a degree give another dose to-night ; otherwise wait till I see him again at 11 a.m. to-morrow." Would that be " direct personal supervision " ?

Mr. Roome.—I think it would ; it would be too oppressive to hold otherwise.

Mr. Justice Avory.—May not the matter be tested in this way: If another doctor were called in in consultation, would he not say to Dr. Kingsbury, " What have you been administering ? " and would not Dr. Kingsbury say, " I have administered such and such doses of morphine." The other doctor would ask, " Did you personally supervise the administration ? " He would receive the reply, " Yes, I saw the patient every other day, and specified precisely how much he was to take, and watched the effect." Could you say that that would be inaccurate ?

Mr. Roome.—I think it would be too high a description of what was done. Counsel contended that the onus was on the appellant to prove that he fell within the proviso. The regulations were for the protection from themselves of those addicted to drugs, and to prevent double supply by more than one doctor. It was no great hardship that a name and address should be divulged.

The Lord Chief Justice, in giving judgment allowing the appeal, said that in the course of an extremely interesting argument some matters had been stirred with which it was not necessary to deal. At the close of the argument the question which really emerged was a simple question, and one capable of brief statement. It was this : Upon the true construction of the proviso to regulation 4 was that which was here complained of " administration " of morphine " by or under the direct personal supervision of a duly qualified medical practitioner " ?

When the special case was examined, no doubt was left as to the contention made by the prosecution in the Court below ; he would read its ipsissima verba : " That in regulation 4 the words 'administration of the drug by a duly qualified medical practitioner' meant that the doctor must administer every dose by his own hand ; and that administration 'under the direct personal supervision of a duly qualified medical practitioner' meant that the doctor must be present, and either see the patient administer each and every dose to himself, or see the nurse or other person administer such dose to the patient." Whatever else might be said of that contention it was wholly free from ambiguity, and that contention was held to be right by the late Lord Mayor.

After reading the facts set out in the case, his Lordship continued :—Mr. Roome, with his usual frankness, now no longer contended that, subject to proper provisions and precautions, the actual personal presence of the doctor was necessary. But it was contended that when the terms of the proviso were contrasted with the body of regulation 4 the word " administration " was confined to a particular emergency as contrasted with regular supply. It was said that if that were not so great mischief might arise to the patient himself, because he might consume a quantity of the drug without a record being made, and have the opportunity of obtaining further supplies. But the Court had to construe what the regulations said, not what they might have said.

On the same page of the regulations were the words, in regulation 5, " in case of emergency." It would have been easy to put those words in regulation 4. The question of amending the regulations was not for the Court, but for the Department concerned. It seemed to him as impossible to limit the words of the proviso to cases of emergency as it was to limit personal supervision to cases where the doctor was personally present. Looking at the words of the regulation as part of a much larger whole, he did not think that it was restricted to the limited meaning contended for, and, when once that had gone, on the facts of this case he thought that there was direct personal supervision. He expressed no opinion as to amendment of the regulations, but the decision of the Court below could not be supported, and the appeal must be allowed, with costs.

MR. JUSTICE AVORY and MR. JUSTICE SALTER concurred.

NORTH SHIPPING CO., LIMITED v. JOSEPH RANK, LIMITED.*

Ship—Bill of lading—Short delivery—Claim by indorsees of bills of lading.

In an action for freight by shipowners against indorsees of bills of lading the defendants counterclaimed for short delivery. The shipowners denied short delivery, and contended that in any event the indorsees of bills of lading had no right to sue.

Held, on the facts, that the defendants had failed to prove the alleged short delivery, and the counterclaim must therefore fail. Consideration of the question whether the indorsees of bills of lading could sue in respect of missing cargo was thus rendered unnecessary, and the question was left undecided.

The plaintiffs in this case claimed a sum for balance of freight.

Sir Robert Aske appeared for the plaintiffs ; Mr. Dickinson for the defendants.

The claim was admitted, but the defendants counterclaimed for short delivery ; and the action therefore resolved itself into a claim by the defendants for the value of the missing goods.

By a charterparty dated June 22, 1923, the steamer North Anglia, belonging to the North Shipping Company, was chartered to go to Karachi and there load a full and complete cargo of wheat and/or maize in bags and bring it to one safe port in the United Kingdom or one of certain other specified ports at the option of the charterers.

The charterparty provided, inter alia, that "The number of packages signed for in bills of lading to be binding on steamer and owners unless errors or frauds be proved, and all cargo on board to be delivered, and any shortage to be paid for at spot market value on day of arrival of vessel."

The steamer went to Karachi and loaded a cargo which in the bills of lading was stated to be 57,230 bags, each weighing 224lb. The defendants were indorsees of the bills of lading, and the steamer was ordered to discharge in the Victoria Dock, London. By the bills of lading the contract was subject to the conditions and exceptions contained in the charterparty. When the discharge was completed it was found that only 57,094 bags were forthcoming. Two of these were lost in the process of lightering, and were not material to this case, and the defendants now counterclaimed for a shortage of 136 bags.

Evidence was given by the defendants that 57,230 bags had been shipped at Karachi, and that the weight stated to have been shipped was the correct weight for that number of bags.

Evidence was given by the plaintiffs, the shipowners, that every bag which had been shipped at Karachi had been discharged in London. The steamer on the way home called only at Port Said and Gibraltar, and it was impossible that any of the bags could have been taken out before arrival in London.

SIR ROBERT ASKE submitted that the onus was on the ship to show that the intake tally was wrong, and the onus was on the defendants to show that bags actually shipped had not been delivered. He submitted that the evidence showed that the tally had been very carelessly kept at Karachi, and that the number of bags said to have been shipped must be wrong. [He referred to Sanday v. Strath Steamship Company, Limited (37 The Times L.R., 665 ; 26 Com. Cas., 277) ; Smith v. Bedouin Steam Navigation Company, Limited (12 The Times L.R., 65 ; [1896] A.C., 70).] And the bags when discharged were left lying in barges for some weeks before being weighed ; and there was no evidence that any watch was kept during that time, when theft would have been possible. So far as weight was concerned, the difference alleged to exist between the weight shipped and that delivered could be accounted for by ordinary shrinkage on the voyage without any theft at all.

MR. DICKINSON referred to The Pauline (4 Ll.L., 221); Hain Steamship Company v. Herdman (11 Ll.L., 58) ; Royal Commission on Wheat Supplies v. Ocean Steamship Company (11 Ll.L., 123) ; North Steamship Company v. Barnett (12 Ll.L., 65) ; and to Carver on Carriage by Sea, sections 63 (a) and 65. By the terms of the condition the shipowners must be liable unless they had satisfied the Court that there had been error or fraud in fixing the number of bags loaded.

MR. JUSTICE ROCHE in the course of his judgment said that the case raised two points. First, it was said that the defendants were not the proper party to sue or, at most, could recover only nominal damages ; and second, that the counterclaim in itself was ill founded and disclosed no ground of action. As to the first point, which appeared to be based on certain observations made by Mr. Justice Bray in Steamship Den of Airlie Company, Limited v. Mitsui and Company, Limited (17 Com. Cas., at pp. 122, 123), he would express no opinion, because in the view which he took of the facts it was unnecessary to deal with that point. Whether in such a case as this the bill of lading holder or the charterer was the proper party to sue was an important question which might some day have to be determined, but he would merely note that the point had been taken, and it would be open to the plaintiffs if the case went to a higher Court. On the second point, the first feature to be remarked was that the amount of cargo short delivered was a very small proportion of the whole, some 13 tons out of 6,000 tons. He was satisfied that no part whatever of the wheat which was put on board was lost before delivery. The bills of lading were signed "weight unknown," and the decision in New Chinese Antimony Company v. Ocean Steamship Company ([1917] 2 K.B., 664) showed that such a provision did not raise even a prima facie case against the ship, and he was satisfied that all the grain that was shipped was delivered except such small quantity as might disappear by natural shrinkage on the voyage.

His Lordship discussed the evidence in detail, and held that the defendants had failed to prove accurately either the weight loaded or the weight discharged; and he concluded that the quantity alleged to have been lost, if it was in fact lost, was no more than could be accounted for by natural shrinkage.

Judgment was therefore given for the plaintiffs on the claim and on the counterclaim, and a stay was granted on the usual terms.

Court of Appeal. (Bankes, Scrutton, and Atkin, L.JJ.) 1926. Nov. 9.

SHUTTLEWORTH v. COX BROTHERS AND COMPANY (MAIDENHEAD), LIMITED, AND OTHERS.*

Company — Articles of association — Alteration of article—Power of shareholders—Bona fide for benefit of the company—Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908 (8 Edw. VII., c. 69), s. 13 (1).

By s. 13 (1) of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908: "Subject to the provisions of this Act and to the conditions contained in its memorandum, a company may by special resolution alter or add to its articles. . . ."

The power to alter or add to the articles under this section must be exercised, not only in the manner required by law, but also bona fide for the benefit of the company as a whole, and the question whether a given alteration of or addition to the articles is for the benefit of the company is a question for the shareholders, acting bona fide, and not for the Court, and the Court will not interfere with the action of the shareholders except on grounds on which it would interfere with a verdict of a jury.

Dicta of Peterson, J., in Dafen Tinplate Company, Limited v. Llanelly Steel Company (1907), Limited (36 The Times L.R., 428; [1920] 2 Ch., 124) disapproved.

This was an appeal and cross-appeal from the judgment of Mr. Justice Avory after trial of an action with a jury at Reading Assizes.

The action was brought by the plaintiff claiming (1) damages for wrongful dismissal from his position as a manager of the defendant company, and (2) a declaration that he was still a director of the company, and an injunction to restrain the company from altering the articles of association.

Mr. Justice Avory gave judgment for the plaintiff on the claim for wrongful dismissal. Against that order the defendants appealed. But on the claim for a declaration the learned Judge gave judgment for the defendants, and the plaintiff cross-appealed against that judgment.

* Reported by T. W. Morgan, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

This report concerns the cross-appeal only, which raised a question with regard to the validity of an alteration in or addition to one of the articles of association of the defendant company.

The facts are stated in the judgment.

Mr. S. Lowry Porter, K.C., and Mr. H. McKenna appeared for the plaintiff; and Mr. Vachell, K.C., and Dr. Earengey for the defendants.

Lord Justice Bankes.—This is a cross-appeal brought by the plaintiff in an action commenced by him in which he sought to challenge the validity of a resolution of shareholders in a company, the effect of which was to deprive him of his position as a permanent director of the company.

The short facts to which it is necessary to refer are these. The company in question was a company which was incorporated in May of 1921 to take over a timber and builders' merchants business which had been carried on at Maidenhead by three persons, the plaintiff being one of them, and a Mr. Beare and a Mr. Ernest Burton Norris being the other two. These three had carried on business in partnership, and this company was incorporated for the purpose of taking over as a going concern, and carrying on, that business. By Article 17 of the articles of association it was provided that the number of directors should not be less than three nor more than seven. Article 18 provided that "The following persons shall be the first directors of the company"—Beare, Ernest Burton Norris, Shuttleworth (the plaintiff), Thomas Norris, who was the father of Ernest Burton Norris, and a gentleman of the name of Fritche. The article went on to provide that they should be permanent directors of the company, "and each of them shall be entitled to hold such office so long as he shall live unless he shall become disqualified from any of the causes specified in Article 22." It is not necessary to refer to Article 22 except to say that none of the causes there referred to occurred, and that there was no ground under Article 22 which entitled the shareholders, or any one, to remove this gentleman, Mr. Shuttleworth, from the position to which he became entitled under Article 18. Mr. Shuttleworth, in fact, was appointed the works manager, in addition to being a director; he was appointed works manager at a salary, and so he remained, without any question or complaint, for some considerable time. Then in 1924 and 1925 trouble arose, and there were irregularities in reference to the receipt of and accounting for cash by this gentleman. As a result of inquiry into that matter he was summarily dismissed. He brought an action claiming damages for this alleged wrongful dismissal, and the defendants then set up that the circumstances justified his dismissal. They did not allege that these circumstances amounted to dishonesty on his part, but they alleged that these circumstances amounted to incompetence on his part. After a full hearing the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff. That verdict was challenged in this Court, and on November 5 we decided that there was ground upon which the jury were justified in coming to their conclusion.

But at the trial the jury were also asked to deal with the plaintiff's complaint that he had been wrongfully deprived of his position as a permanent director, and his complaint was that there had been an alteration of the articles of association which was invalid. The alteration was one which added to Article 22, as an additional ground, the words "If he"—that is, a director—"be requested by all the other directors to resign his office." That alteration was passed after due notice in November of 1924, but no action was taken against the plaintiff under the amended article until some considerable time afterwards. The plaintiff's complaint in his statement of claim was that the amendment of the article was a breach of the contract to be implied from the articles of association, and "that the said proposed article is not bona fide for the benefit of the company as a whole." He was therefore challenging the validity of the alteration.

The power to alter articles is conferred by section 13 (1) of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, which provides: "Subject to the provisions of this Act and to the conditions contained in its memorandum, a company may by special resolution alter or add to its articles. . . ." It is not suggested here that there is anything expressly contained in the memorandum which controls the power conferred by that section of altering or adding to the articles, but it is said that it is well established that, although the section in the widest terms gives that authority to a company, the Courts will exercise a supervision over the exercise by the company of that power, and will test the question whether the exercise of the power by the company has or has not been a valid one. It is said, and truly said, that the test which has been applied by the Court is the one which was laid down by the Master of the Rolls, Lord Lindley, in Allen v. Gold Reefs of West Africa, Limited (16 The Times L.R., 213; [1900] 1 Ch., 656). I will refer to the test at once. What he says at page 671 is this: "The power thus conferred on companies to alter the regulations contained in their articles is limited only by the provisions contained in the statute and the conditions contained in the company's memorandum of association. Wide, however, as the language of section 50 is, the power conferred by it must, like all other powers, be exercised subject to those general principles of law and equity which are applicable to all powers conferred on majorities and enabling them to bind minorities. It must be exercised, not only in the manner required by law, but also bona fide for the benefit of the company as a whole, and it must not be exceeded." There is no question here as to the manner required by law. What is said is that this resolution was invalid because, applying Lord Lindley's test, it was not bona fide for the benefit of the company as a whole. What happened after the passing of the resolution was, that for some time no action was taken, but after the lapse of some months a resolution was passed by which all the directors decided or resolved that the plaintiff should resign his position as director. That is referred to for the purpose of showing or proving that the original action of the shareholders, who were also directors, in passing the original resolution altering the articles was not bona fide, that it was a personal act of vindictiveness on the part of these gentlemen, and that, whatever the meaning of the test taken as a whole may be, there was evidence here upon which the jury were entitled to arrive at the conclusion that these gentlemen were actuated by a wrong motive, and therefore could not be said to have acted bona fide. The jury were asked one question, which they divided into two, on this point. They were first asked whether the action of these gentlemen was bona fide. They answered "No," and upon that, of course, a question arises at once whether there was evidence entitling them to come to the conclusion that the action of these gentlemen, which is challenged, was not bona fide, because if there was, there is an end of the matter. Mr. Justice Avory, who tried the case, said, in summing up to the jury, that he was strongly of opinion that there was no evidence upon which they could find want of good faith; but he left it to the jury, in case there might be any appeal in reference to his decision, if he decided that there was no such evidence. As I have said, the jury negatived good faith. Subsequently, Mr. Justice Avory was asked to rule, and did rule, that there was no evidence to support that finding, and he therefore entered judgment for the defendants. It is that judgment which is challenged.

The first matter that we have to consider is whether Mr. Justice Avory was right in coming to the conclusion to which he did come in reference to there being no evidence to support that finding. After the full discussion which has taken place, and every matter that could possibly bear upon the question has been called to our attention by Mr. Porter, we are all unanimously of opinion that Mr. Justice Avory was right. It seems to me, upon the evidence, that these gentlemen were anxious throughout to take a charitable view of the plaintiff's conduct. There is not a trace of any vindictiveness or wrong motive. The fact that they thought that in the interests of the company he ought to be got rid of is, in my opinion, in circumstances such as these, no evidence of want of good faith, and speaking for myself, I think that the evidence throughout, in this case, directly negatives the idea or suggestion of want of good faith. In these circumstances, one has to consider what is the true interpretation of the test which Lord Lindley says must be applied in such a case as this. I have read his language.

The jury were asked to give their opinion, not only on the question of good faith, but on the question whether the action of these gentlemen was for the benefit of the company. Having negatived good faith, they went on to say that the action was, incidentally, for the benefit of the company. What exactly they meant by that I do not know. Of course, if it amounts to a verdict that what was done was done in the interests of the company, that verdict could only be set aside on the ground upon which verdicts of a jury can be set aside, namely, that there was no evidence which would justify twelve reasonable men in arriving at such a conclusion. In my opinion, there are certainly no grounds for setting aside that verdict, if it amounts to a verdict that the action that was complained of was for the benefit of the company. But I do not stop there, because I find a difficulty in being sure of what it was that the jury exactly meant by that verdict. Therefore I have assumed, for this purpose, that there is no direct finding upon that point, and that the Court is asked to deal with the matter as though it came before them in the same way in which it has come before Chancery Judges when they have had to decide whether, without the intervention of the verdict of a jury, they should interfere with the action of shareholders in altering the articles of association.

Assume, for the moment, that that is a correct position. The first thing one has to decide is this, in reference to Lord Lindley's decision: Is he there dealing with two quite separate things, firstly, bona fides—that is to say, the state of mind of the persons whose act is complained of—and, secondly, apart altogether from their state of mind, the question as to whether, in the opinion of the Court, apart altogether from the opinion or action of the shareholders, what the shareholders have done is for the benefit of the company—two quite separate considerations. I think that that view of the test has been negatived in this Court in Sidebottom v. Kershaw, Leese and Co.,

Limited (36 The Times L.R., 45 ; [1920] 1 Ch., 154). I think that there all the members of the Court, Lord Sterndale, Lord Justice Warrington, and Mr. Justice Eve, negatived that suggestion as to the meaning of Lord Lindley's words. One has therefore to deal with the test formulated by Lord Lindley in this way. Starting from the point of view that it is the shareholders to whom the statute has entrusted the power, have these shareholders acted bona fide in the interests of the company as a whole ? You may consider the question of bona fides from the point of view of whether they were actuated by an improper motive, or malice, and so forth ; and you may come to a conclusion which governs the whole case upon the question of their good faith or want of good faith. But assuming good faith in the sense of no wrong motive, then what is to be the test that the Court, sitting, as it were, as a Court of Appeal from the action of the shareholders, is to apply in reference to that part of the test which deals with the action being, in the opinion of the shareholders, for the benefit of the company ? It may be that the action is so outrageous that it throws a light upon the bona fides of the persons who were responsible for it, but, short of being outrageous, it seems to me that it may be so unreasonable that no reasonable men could arrive at such a conclusion, and the Court is entitled, I think, to apply the same test to the action of the shareholders as it does to a verdict of a jury, and say that the Court will not allow a decision of shareholders to stand which is so unreasonable that no reasonable people could possibly arrive at that conclusion. Of course, the case may be still stronger, and one may be able to apply another common law test, and that is, whether or not, upon the facts, the action of the shareholders is capable of being treated as for the benefit of the company. I think these are both tests which the Court may properly apply to the action of the shareholders, and I think that Sidebottom v. Kershaw, Leese and Co., Limited (supra) indicates that that is the line which the Court ought to take. I respectfully disagree with the view which seems to me to be the view of Mr. Justice Peterson in Dafen Tinplate Company, Limited v. Llanelly Steel Company (1907), Limited (36 The Times L.R., 428 ; [1920] 2 Ch., 124), that it is for the Court to treat the matter as though they were the sole judges in the matter, apart altogether from the action of the shareholders which the Court is called upon to deal with.

In this case it seems to me, applying the test which I have endeavoured to indicate, that it is quite impossible to say that, given good faith, which I think is abundantly proved here, the action of these gentlemen could be said to be either incapable of being for the benefit of the company or so unreasonable that no reasonable men could consider that it was for the benefit of the company, and it is quite insufficient to say that it is action which works extremely hardly upon the minority, the plaintiff, or that it is action which was specially directed against him, because the more outrageous the conduct of a plaintiff the more certain it is that the action of the shareholders, acting entirely bona fide and for the benefit of the company, will be directed against that person, and directed against that person because of his outrageous conduct and because, therefore, it is necessary to protect the company against that conduct.

In these circumstances, I think that this appeal fails, and that the plaintiff has failed to show either want of good faith or that the action of these gentlemen was not for the benefit of the company.

Lord Justice Scrutton.—In the view that I take of the facts and law this appeal completely fails, and I only add anything to the judgment which has just been delivered because, in my view, the argument addressed to us by Mr. Porter, coupled with some language of Mr. Justice Peterson's in Dafen Tinplate Company, Limited v. Llanelly Steel Company (1907), Limited (36 The Times L.R., 428 ; [1920] 2 Ch., 124), by which it is supported, if accepted would have the most disastrous results on company business in England and on the relations of the Courts to the companies.

The plaintiff, Mr. Shuttleworth, at the time when this action started was in the position of being, first of all, a permanent director of a company into which a firm had been changed, holding office so long as he should live unless he became disqualified under certain six named disqualifications contained in Article 22 of the articles. He was also manager of the company at a salary, and in 1924 it came to the knowledge of the other directors that in the course of about eleven months he had not accounted to them on twenty-two occasions for cash which he had received. The other directors took the view that that justified their immediately dismissing him from the position of manager. He objected to that decision, not unnaturally. They also, having consulted first their solicitors and then counsel as to their powers under the articles, came to the conclusion that, unless they could convict him of an indictable offence, they had no power to get rid of his position as permanent director, and they were advised, or came to the conclusion, that the way to alter that position was to hold an extraordinary general meeting to alter the articles by including in the grounds of dismissal, in Article 22, "if he shall be requested in writing by all the other directors to resign his office." The intention to propose that alteration coming to the notice of the plaintiff, he then issued a writ, first, claiming damages for wrongful dismissal without notice from his post as manager, and, secondly, claiming a declaration that he was a permanent director (which in fact he was at the time when the writ was issued) and an injunction to restrain the company from altering the articles of association. In consequence of that writ and of an application for an injunction, the extraordinary meeting at first proposed was not held, but, the Judge in Chambers and the Court of Appeal having declined to grant the plaintiff an injunction stopping the alteration, the alteration was made in the articles some few months later, though nothing was done on it for some nine or ten months. But nine or ten months afterwards, the additional fact being that a son of the plaintiff was engaged in a competing firm canvassing the customers of the defendant company, the four directors did come to a resolution in writing requesting the plaintiff to resign. The action for wrongful dismissal coming before a jury, the jury found that the twenty-two items of failure to account for money were not a ground for immediate dismissal without notice. The Judge disagreed with that verdict, but as it was not for the Judge but for the jury to determine, so long as there were grounds on which the jury could come to that conclusion, it did not matter that the Judge would have come to a different conclusion or that any member of the Court of Appeal would have come to a different conclusion. We therefore, on an application by the defendants to set aside that verdict, dismissed the appeal. Then came the second half of the case, which we are now considering, that dealing with the application for a declaration that the plaintiff was still a permanent director and for an injunction restraining the alteration which had been made in the articles. On that the learned Judge, having had read to him the authority which used the phrase that the alteration must be "bona fide in the interests of the company" (Lord Lindley, Master of the Rolls, in Allen v. Gold Reefs of West Africa, Limited (16 The Times L.R., 213; [1900] 1 Ch., 656)), left the question to the jury whether the alteration was proposed and made bona fide in the interests of the company. The jury answered, splitting up their answer, (1) It was not bona fide; (2) Incidentally it was in the interests of the company. On these findings Mr. Justice Avory, holding that there was no evidence of lack of good faith, entered judgment for the company, and the plaintiff appeals.

First of all, was Mr. Justice Avory right in holding that there was no evidence of lack of good faith in the directors who proposed this resolution? I have come to the conclusion that he was and that there was no evidence on which a reasonable jury could find that the directors acted otherwise than in good faith. I am quite unable to take the view that this failure to account for these twenty-two items continuing up to date of the writ, and for some very considerable time after the writ, the items being ultimately all admitted, was other than a very serious matter in the management of the company. It appears to me that the action of the directors in considering this alteration was taken under careful advice, with no precipitation, and with a genuine desire to provide a remedy for an evil which was forced upon them—namely, that the man whom they admittedly could have dismissed by notice from the position of manager was still sitting with them as a director in spite of his serious laxity in the management of the business entrusted to him. I can see no evidence whatever on which the jury were justified in finding that the determination was taken maliciously or with a desire to spite the plaintiff, or from any other motive than the motive of doing what the directors thought best in the interests of the company. If there was no evidence of lack of good faith, the other finding of the jury appears to me to stop the appeal. They find that the alteration was for the benefit of the company. It is true they say it was "incidentally" for the benefit of the company, but I suppose that must mean that the primary motive was lack of good faith or malice, and that maliciously they were doing a thing which was for the benefit of the company; and there being no evidence of malice it still remains that they did the thing for the benefit of the company. But for the argument which Mr. Porter then suggests (and this is the only reason why I am giving a separate judgment) there would apparently be an end of the case. The point taken was, as I understand, that these Articles of Association amount to a contract with Mr. Shuttleworth that he shall be a permanent director for life except in the named conditions in Article 22, and a contract cannot be varied without the consent of both parties, and Mr. Shuttleworth never consented to the variation which was made in Article 22. That position is quite sound if you can show a contract outside the articles. If you can show a contract outside the articles, it is useless to alter the articles, because you cannot alter the contract outside the articles. The best instance of that is Nelson v. James Nelson and Sons, Limited (30 The Times L.R., 368; [1914] 2 K.B., 770), where there was an article that the directors might appoint a managing director with power to revoke his appointment, and they did appoint, by a separate document in writing, a managing director for the named term. Then during the named term they tried to use the article to revoke his appointment, although the term named in the agreement was still continuing. There the Court held—I was the Judge of first instance—"Here there is an outside contract: you cannot alter that without the consent of both parties: it is useless to say that you have in the articles a power to revoke it when you have made an independent contract which appoints the man manager for a named term." But, unless you can get an outside contract, the appointment in the article is subject to the power of varying the articles given by section 13 of the Act of 1908, and consequently, your contract is not a contract to be a permanent director, but a contract to be a permanent director subject to the power of terminating the appointment given in the articles, or any modification of the articles, which may thereafter be made, under the powers of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908. Therefore, so far, on those three points, it appears to me that the appeal hopelessly fails.

But if I understood the argument which was put forward by Mr. Porter, based upon an expression of Mr. Justice Peterson's in the case of Dafen Tinplate Company, Limited v. Llanelly Steel Company (1907), Limited (supra), it was this. It does not matter whether the directors thought that this alteration was for the benefit of the company: the question is whether the Court thinks it was for the benefit of the company. I suppose he must further say that it does not matter that the jury say it was for the benefit of the company; that the question is whether the Court thinks it was genuinely for the benefit of the company; and that the Court, on the materials before it, ought to think that it was not genuinely for the benefit of the company and therefore reject both the honest opinion of the directors and the equally honest opinion of the jury, and say that the alteration was invalid. To adopt any view of that sort would be to make the Court manager of the affairs of innumerable companies instead of the directors to whom the shareholders have entrusted that right of management. I think, with respect to Mr. Justice Peterson and Mr. Porter, that that view is based on a misunderstanding of the expression used by Lord Lindley in Allen v. Gold Reefs of West Africa, Limited (supra) and by Lord Sterndale in Sidebottom v. Kershaw, Leese and Company, Limited (36 The Times L.R., 45; [1920] 1 Ch., 154). Lord Lindley, in Allen's case, (supra) says (at page 671) that the power of alteration "must be exercised, not only in the manner required by law, but also bona fide for the benefit of the company as a whole." The material language there is, "exercised . . . bona fide for the benefit of the company." I do not read that as two separate ingredients, that (1) you must find it to be bona fide, and (2) whether bona fide or not, you must find that it is in fact in your, the Court's, opinion for the benefit of the company. I read it as being this, that the directors must act honestly having regard to, and endeavouring to effect, the benefit of the company as a whole. I think some light is thrown upon that by the way in which Lord Sterndale treats it in Sidebottom's case (supra). He repeats the language, in effect, of Lord Lindley at page 165: "Did they do it bona fide for the benefit of the company"; and then he goes on to say (at page 167), commenting on the decision of Mr. Justice Astbury in Brown v. British Abrasive Wheel Company, Limited (35 The Times L.R., 268; [1919] 1 Ch., 290): "He"—the learned Judge—"found as a fact that the majority shareholders . . . were not doing this for the benefit of the company or in the interests of the company at large, but entirely for their own benefit, and in their own interests. If that finding be right, and as to that I say nothing, it was not bona fide ; it was not done for the benefit of the company, but for the benefit of themselves." As I understand, the learned Judge there is contrasting the acts of people who, acting honestly, consider the things that they ought to consider—namely, the benefit of the company as a whole, and endeavour to decide what will be for the benefit of the company as a whole, and the acts of those who approach the matter, not from that point of view, but from the point of view of considering what will be for the benefit of the majority of the company or themselves as distinguished from the people against whom they are legislating. From that point of view, provided that there are grounds on which reasonable people could come to a decision, considering the matters I have indicated only, it does not seem to me to matter at all whether the Court would not have come to the same conclusion. It is not the Court which manages the affairs of the company ; it is the shareholders through the directors whom they appoint ; and so long as those directors act honestly and endeavour to consider only the matters which they should legitimately consider—namely, the interests of the company as a whole and such action as will promote those interests, it seems to me quite immaterial that the Court would come to a different conclusion. The absence of any ground for a reasonable decision that a certain action is conducive to the benefit of the company may be, first of all, a ground for finding lack of good faith, because it may be said that there were no grounds on which honest people could have come to this decision and you may infer bad faith ; but secondly, given honesty, the fact that they have come to a decision for which there are no reasonable grounds may show that they have not considered the matters that they ought to have considered. On both those grounds you may set a decision aside, but in my view if they act honestly, and if the decision is such as honest and reasonable people might come to, the fact that the Court would have come to a different decision is no ground whatever for the Court to interfere. I should be very sorry if the Court took upon itself to manage matters which the directors usually understand far better than the Court does. I find, in the case to which Mr. Porter referred, Dafen Tinplate Company, Limited v. Llanelly Steel Company (1907), Limited (supra), Mr. Justice Peterson saying (at page 140) : "It has been suggested that the only question in such a case as this is whether the shareholders bona fide or honestly believed that the alteration was for the benefit of the company. But this is not, in my view, the true meaning of the words of Lord Lindley, Master of the Rolls, [in Allen v. Gold Reefs of West Africa, Limited (supra)], or of the judgment in Sidebottom's case (supra). The question is whether in fact the alteration is genuinely for the benefit of the company." If he means that, whatever the honest decision of the directors is, it is what the Court thinks, and not what the directors think, which is to be the governing matter, I respectfully disagree with the interpretation put upon Lord Lindley's words. If he merely means that the Court will interfere if the decision of the directors, though honest, is such that no reasonable people could have come to it upon proper materials, then I do not object to the explanation, and I should be prepared to act in a case like that ; but in the way in which the judgment is reported I think that the test is erroneous, for the reasons which I have given.

As I say, I have only added a separate judgment of my own because I think the point I have last dealt with is of considerable importance in the treatment of companies by the Court. For these reasons I think the appeal fails and must be dismissed, with the usual consequences.

Lord Justice Atkin.—Mr. Shuttleworth, the plaintiff in this case, was a director of the defendant company from May, 1921, when the company was incorporated, until 1926. Until 1924 he was a director on the terms of one of the original articles, Article 18, which provided that certain persons (of whom he was one) should be the first directors of the company, that they should be permanent directors, and each of them should be entitled to hold such office so long as he should live unless he should become disqualified from any of the causes specified in Article 22. Article 22 at that time provided for the vacation of the office of a director if he became bankrupt, or of unsound mind, or was convicted of an indictable offence, or ceased to hold the necessary share qualification or absented himself without leave of absence for a period of six months from the meetings of directors, or gave six calendar months' notice that he resigned his office. In 1924 the company passed an altered article by a special resolution in pursuance of section 13 of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, adding to the grounds mentioned in Article 22 a seventh : "If he shall be requested in writing by all the other directors to resign his office." Some ten or eleven months after that article was altered the plaintiff was in fact requested in writing to resign his office, and he now in this action claims that that addition to the article is invalid and that he still remains a director.

It appears to me that the first question to be determined is as to the contention raised on his behalf that there was a contract contained in the articles making him a permanent director, which is inconsistent with this additional article, and the additional article would be, therefore, in breach of contract and therefore would not be permitted by the Court, but would be invalid. That depends upon whether or not there was such a contract with the company that it would be a breach of the contract to pass this altered article. That depends upon the constitution of the contract between the plaintiff and the defendants. The principle to be invoked is the principle laid down by Lord Lindley, M.R., in Allen v. Gold Reefs of West Africa, Limited (16 The Times L.R., 213 ; [1900] 1 Ch., 656), which has been cited on another part of the case. Lord Lindley says, at page 673 : "But, although the regulations contained in a company's articles of association are revocable by special resolution, a special contract may be made with the company in the terms of or embodying one or more of the articles, and the question will then arise whether an alteration of the articles so embodied is consistent or inconsistent with the real bargain between the parties. A company cannot break its contracts by altering its articles, but, when dealing with contracts referring to revocable articles, and especially with contracts between a member of the company and the company respecting his shares, care must be taken not to assume that the contract involves as one of its terms an article which is not to be altered."

In order to determine that question I think it is not immaterial to remember that this company was formed to take over the business of a firm, the partners in which appear to have been three directors —Mr. Beare, Mr. Ernest Burton Norris, and Mr. Shuttleworth. The memorandum recites that the company is formed for the purpose of acquiring their business on the terms of an agreement which is mentioned, which has not been put in evidence before us, but which we are assured contains no terms as to the appointment of the partners as permanent directors. It is to be noticed, therefore, that the contract (and it is a contract) that they should be permanent directors at a salary is contained in the articles only, and it is to be noted also that the contract is a contract which is made not only with the three former members of the firm, but is made with two additional directors, who apparently had no particular interest in the business before—namely, Mr. Thomas Norris (who, I understand, is the father of the other Mr. Norris) and Mr. Harry Fritche. The article making them in terms permanent directors also in terms says that they are to hold office unless they shall become disqualified for any of the causes specified in Article 22. It appears to me that the true inference in these circumstances is that there was a contract that the plaintiff should be a permanent director, but a contract contained in articles which themselves could be altered with the consent of the company in accordance with the provisions of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908; and it appears to me that, inasmuch as the contract contemplated that the permanent office might be vacated in one of six contingencies, it was not inconsistent with the contract that was made that the article should be altered so as to add a seventh contingency to the six contingencies to which the original contract was admittedly subject. In other words, this is a contract made upon the terms of alterable articles, and therefore the contracting party cannot complain if in fact an article was altered, for the original contract contemplated that the terms might be altered in the manner provided by the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908. Therefore I cannot find that there was any breach of contract in making this alteration in the articles.

If that is so, then the only other question which arises is whether, apart from that, this article is upon general principles objectionable as being not honestly made within the powers of the company. For that purpose one has to consider what limits there are upon the powers of a company to alter their articles. Some limits there are, and the limits are laid down in several cases, but notably in the judgment of the Master of the Rolls in the case that I have read from, Allen v. Gold Reefs of West Africa, Limited (supra). There is a reasoned and very lucid judgment by the Master of the Rolls in which he uses the phrase about exercise of the powers "bona fide for the benefit of the company." But it appears to me to be a great misfortune that this Court, or any Court, should consider itself so fettered by a formula that it should not depart from that phrase and study what its real meaning is. It is not a statutory phrase which we have to construe, but we have to regard the principles which were laid down by the Master of the Rolls in the course of which he used this phrase. For my part I feel satisfied that the construction put upon that phrase and the statement of the true principles is that which is contained in the judgments which have just been delivered. The question, and the only question to my mind, is whether, not the directors, but the shareholders, in coming to a conclusion as to whether they shall alter the articles, do honestly intend to exercise their powers for the benefit of the company, and if they do, then, subject to one or two reservations which have already been explained, it appears to me that the altered article must stand. It appears to me impossible that the true view is that it is a matter of law for the Judge as to whether or not the alteration, whether made in good faith or not, is in fact—I am using the word "fact" wrongly—is in law for the benefit of the company.

It is said that it is the mark of a good Judge to amplify his jurisdiction, but I cannot contemplate the goodness of a Judge who assumes to himself the duty of reviewing the decision of every company and every industrial concern in this country on the question whether a particular alteration in the articles is or is not eventually for the benefit of the company. It is perfectly obvious that the true judges of the interests of the company in these cases are the shareholders acting in good faith. They are not only much better judges, but in a great many cases they are the only competent judges as to what is in the interests of the company and what is not. I should venture to say that, even if the question were a question to be determined by anybody else than the shareholders. The question must be a question of fact. How it ever could come to be a question of law it is difficult to imagine, and in this case there appears to me to be a finding of fact by the jury that it was for the benefit of the company. But I do not decide the case at all on that ground. It appears to me that, in the first instance, the question is solely one for the shareholders acting in good faith. It may very well be that the circumstances are such that the only inference that can be drawn is that the majority of the company are acting so oppressively that they are not acting in good faith, or another way of putting it (which I think is the way approved by Lord Sterndale) is that the decision must be one which is capable of being arrived at by persons acting in good faith and attending to the interests of the company. But that is quite a different set of circumstances to be investigated from the bare question: Aye or no, in the light of the events that have happened, does this tribunal or that tribunal think now that the alteration was or was not for the benefit of the company? With great respect to a very learned Judge, I disagree with the judgment to the contrary by the late Mr. Justice Peterson in Dafen Tinplate Company, Limited v. Llanelly Steel Company (1907), Limited (36 The Times L.R., 428; [1920] 2 Ch., 124) upon that point. It appears to me that the judgment of Lord Sterndale in Sidebottom v. Kershaw, Leese and Co., Limited (36 The Times L.R., 45; [1920] 1 Ch., 154), in the passage of the judgment which has been cited, makes it quite clear that his view was that the ultimate decision was to be the decision of the majority of the shareholders.

I should like further to add this. The jury in this case found that the company did not act in good faith. I am quite satisfied that there is no evidence at all upon which they could come to that conclusion. It is obvious that the facts were such as struck the directors at once on their discovery that here was a matter which concerned the interests of the company: they took steps at once to put themselves into a position in which, if it were desirable, they might cause the permanent office of director to be vacated, and the company eventually passed these resolutions. The resolutions do not take the power simply in reference to one director—they expose all the directors to the exercise of this particular power. They eventually exercised the power, not as it appears to me at all by reason of the events which had given rise to the passing of the resolution, but because of another set of circumstances which happened independently some eighteen months after the first occurrences and some eleven months after they had got the powers. I think there was no evidence upon which the jury could come to the conclusion that the shareholders acted in bad faith in coming to this resolution.

I think, therefore, that the appeal brought by the plaintiff in this respect fails and should be dismissed, with costs.

WYCOMBE GUARDIANS v. BARTON-UPON-IRWELL GUARDIANS.*

Poor Law—Settlement—Illegitimate child—Child under 16 years of age—Marriage of mother—Residence of child in parish for 11 years—Removability—Settlement — Divided Parishes and Poor Law Amendment Act, 1876 (39 and 40 Vict., c. 61), ss. 34, 35.

The mother of an illegitimate child married, and she and her husband subsequently acquired a settlement in a parish in the Wycombe Union. At the time of the marriage the child, then aged 3½ years, went to live in a parish in the Barton-upon-Irwell Union, and lived there for 11 years. She then lived for four years at various places, and at the end of that period she became chargeable to the Wycombe Union.

Held, that up to the time of the mother's marriage the child had the settlement of her mother ; that the mother's marriage made no difference ; that the child was never at any time irremovable from the aforesaid parish in the Barton-upon-Irwell Union ; and that, therefore, the child had never acquired a settlement in that parish by residence plus irremovability. The third paragraph of section 35 of the Divided Parishes and Poor Law Amendment Act, 1876, dealing with derivative settlements, does not apply to a child under 16 years of age, whether the child is legitimate or illegitimate.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (42 The Times L.R., 349 ; [1926] 2 K.B., 3) affirmed.

This was an appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal (42 The Times L.R., 349 ; [1926] 2 K.B., 3), reversing an order of the Divisional Court (42 The Times L.R., 127 ; [1926] 1 K.B., 212).

The question raised by the appeal was whether an illegitimate female child, aged 19 years, who resided without interruption from the age of 3½ years to the age of 15 years in a parish of the respondents' Union, and who had not since acquired a legal settlement elsewhere, had by reason of section 34 of the Divided Parishes and Poor Law Amendment Act, 1876, a settlement of her own, or whether such child took the settlement derived by her mother on the mother's marriage to a man not the child's father.

In the year 1924 Louise Madge Brant, the illegitimate female child in question, went to reside in the parish of Chipping Wycombe, in the Wycombe Union, and gave birth to a child.

By an order of two justices for the county of Buckingham, dated December 5, 1924, it was adjudged that the place of the last legal settlement of the said Louise Madge Brant, aged 19 years, a single woman, and her infant child, then chargeable to the guardians of the Wycombe Union (the present appellants), was the parish of Worsley, in the Barton-upon-Irwell Union, in the county of Lancaster ; and it was ordered that the guardians of the Wycombe Union should remove Louise Madge Brant and her infant to the Barton-upon-Irwell Union and that the Guardians of the Poor of the Barton-upon-Irwell Union should receive and provide for the pauper according to law.

On an appeal by the guardians of the Barton-upon-Irwell Union (the present respondents) to the Court of Quarter Sessions for the county of Buckingham, that Court quashed the order of removal, subject to the opinion of the High Court.

Louise Madge Brant, born on September 25, 1905, at Clapham Maternity Hospital, Lambeth, was the illegitimate child of one Margaret Baxter (formerly Brant), who was a spinster when the child was born. Apart from place of birth Louise Madge Brant had no other place of settlement than that of her mother before March, 1909. On March 17, 1909, Margaret Brant married one Ernest Edward Baxter, a native of England, with whom she resided at various places until December, 1913. From December, 1913, until the date of the order of the justices (December 5, 1924), Ernest Edward Baxter and Margaret Baxter resided continuously in the parish of Chipping Wycombe, in the Wycombe Union, in such manner and under such circumstances as to acquire a settlement in the said parish.

About the month of February, 1909, Louise Madge Brant went to reside at Walkden, in the parish of Worsley, in the Barton-upon-Irwell Union, with one George Pennington and his wife, and she thereafter resided without interruption in that parish until about the month of June, 1920, i.e., from the age of 3½ years to the age of 15 years.

Neither Ernest Edward Baxter nor Margaret Baxter had ever resided in the parish of Worsley. From June, 1920, until October 22, 1924, Louise Madge Brant resided in various places without acquiring a settlement in any of them, and on the latter date she and her infant became chargeable to the guardians of the Wycombe Union.

The question raised in the special case for the opinion of the Court was whether, upon the facts above stated, the Court of Quarter Sessions was right in deciding that Louise Madge Brant did not acquire a settlement in the parish of Worsley in the Barton-upon-Irwell Union by reason of her above-stated residence in the said parish from 1909 to 1920.

A Divisional Court—the Lord Chief Justice, Mr. Justice Avory, and Mr. Justice Sankey—held that Louise Madge Brant on her mother's marriage in March, 1909, did not take the settlement her mother derived from her husband, and was thereupon relegated to her birth settlement and became capable of acquiring, and did in fact acquire, a settlement by her subsequent residence in the parish of Worsley in accordance with the provisions of section 34 of the Divided Parishes and Poor Law Amendment Act, 1876.

The Court of Appeal—Lord Justice Bankes, Lord Justice Warrington, and Lord Justice Atkin—held that, as Louise Madge Brant was under 16 years of age during the whole of her residence from 1909 to

* Reported by H. B. Hemming, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

1920 in the parish of Worsley, she took and followed the settlement of her mother's husband, Ernest Edward Baxter, and was, in law, incapable of acquiring a settlement by residence in the parish of Worsley.

Mr. Montgomery, K.C., and Mr. Herbert Davey appeared for the appellants ; Mr. Macmorran, K.C., and Mr. Humphrey Paul for the respondents.

Viscount Cave, L.C.—My Lords : In my opinion, the result of this appeal must depend upon the answer to be given to the question whether the third paragraph of section 35 of the Divided Parishes and Poor Law Amendment Act, 1876, beginning "If any child in this section mentioned," and so on, applies to an illegitimate child under the age of 16. If it does so apply, it may well be that the appellants are entitled to succeed in this appeal ; if not, then the appeal must fail.

Upon this question there is authority. In the case of Reigate Union v. Croydon Union (5 The Times L.R., 716 ; 14 App. Cas., 465), decided in this House in the year 1889, Lord Watson, in the course of a careful analysis of the section, said this : "The provisions of the clause"—that is, the third paragraph of section 35—"have, in my opinion, no application to children under the age of 16, and do not qualify the preceding enactment of section 35 to the effect that a legitimate, or that of 4 and 5 Will. IV., to the effect that an illegitimate, child shall continue to retain its parentage settlement until it has reached that age." It has been said with truth that on the facts of that case this particular point did not arise, but nevertheless the opinion of Lord Watson carries great weight, not only as expressing the view of that very learned lawyer, but as a link in the chain of argument upon which that case was decided. The opinion so expressed by Lord Watson was followed and acted upon by the Court of Appeal in the same year in the case of West Derby Union v. Atcham Union (6 The Times L.R., 5 ; 24 Q.B.D., 117), and in that case Lord Justice Lindley, as he then was, said this : "It would be wrong, in my opinion, not to carry into effect that interpretation so put by the House of Lords upon the statute, and I do not think in future it will be thought to be of any use to fall back upon the earlier decisions, many of which are extremely difficult to reconcile with each other." Lord Watson's opinion was subsequently referred to in more than one case in this House, for instance, in the case of Fulham Union v. Woolwich Union (23 The Times L.R., 583 ; [1907] A.C., 255), and it has not hitherto been questioned here ; nor, in my view, is there anything in the decisions of the House of Lords in 1905, in 1907, and in 1912, which have been cited to the House, which is inconsistent with the passage which I have quoted from Lord Watson's speech in the Reigate case (supra).

Further, on consideration of the terms of the section, I respectfully agree with Lord Watson's view. It had already been enacted by section 71 of the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1834, that a bastard child should have and follow the settlement of the mother of such child until such child should attain the age of 16 or should acquire a settlement in its own right ; and accordingly the provision in the second paragraph of section 35 of the Act of 1876 that an illegitimate child shall "retain" the settlement of its mother until such child acquires another settlement must, I think, refer, not to an illegitimate child under the age of 16, for whom provision had already been made by the earlier Act, but to an illegitimate child who has attained that age. If the second paragraph of the section be so construed, then the expression in the third paragraph "any child in this section mentioned" does not upon its true construction include a bastard child under 16 years of age. Whether this was the reasoning on which Lord Watson proceeded I am not sure, but in any event it has led me to the same conclusion.

For these reasons I am of opinion that the third paragraph of section 35 of the Act of 1876, on which the appellants rely, has no application to this case.

In saying that this is the only point involved in the appeal, I have not overlooked the suggestion that the proviso in the Act of 1848 does not apply to an illegitimate child ; but I think that that contention was settled the other way in the West Ham case (10 The Times L.R., 375 ; [1894] A.C., 230), and also by the opinion of Lord Macnaghten in the Fulham case (supra).

For these reasons I am of opinion that this appeal fails, and I move your Lordships that it be dismissed, with costs.

Lord Atkinson.—My Lords, I agree.

Lord Shaw of Dunfermline.—My Lords : In agreeing I desire to say that I assent to, and respectfully adopt, Lord Justice Warrington's judgment delivered in the Court of Appeal, which not only states accurately the principles to be applied but also gives a résumé of the authorities, which, in my opinion, is of great value.

The second observation which I wish to make is this : The Reigate decision of this House (5 The Times L.R., 716 ; 14 App. Cas., 465) was given in 1889 and was arrived at in full view of the cases decided between the year 1876 (the year of the Act of Parliament in question) and the year 1888. Those cases were four in number, they did not harmonize with each other, and it was plain that a judgment of this House was demanded as in a sense regulative of the construction to be placed upon sections 34 and 35 of the statute. Such a judgment was accordingly pronounced. But these preceding cases have been cited in this House all over again and powerfully commented upon.

My Lords, I look upon such citation as really going beyond the scope of what can be considered effective argument. My particular reason is this : The judgment of Lord Watson, agreed to by Lord Fitzgerald, was made the express subject of attention in the succeeding case of the West Derby Union (6 The Times L.R., 5 ; 24 Q.B.D., 117) and was accepted in the general and regulative sense to which I have referred. The judgment of Lord Justice Lindley, in particular, prescribes it as a general rule to be accepted and adopted in parochial settlements in England. It has been so adopted and accepted throughout the country and by the profession and the administrative bodies concerned for over a generation. Notwithstanding this, we have had this able and prolonged argument. I do not, my Lords, venture to go farther than humbly to say that the attack made upon the construction and exposition of section 35 of the Act of 1876 by Lord Watson fails. So far as I would be entitled to propone any judgment upon the subject to the House, it would be one to the effect that Lord Watson's judgment upon that topic was unquestionably sound.

Lord Sumner.—My Lords : I agree that the appeal fails for the reasons which have been given by the Lord Chancellor.

There are only two considerations I should like to add. The first is that from 1888 until Tendring Union v. Braintree Union (36 The Times L.R., 512 ; [1920] 2 K.B., 647) and Lexden and Winstree Union v. Windsor Union (37 The Times L.R., 321 ; [1921] 2 K.B., 143), that is to say, for 30 years and upwards, it is evident that the settlement of liabilities between Poor Law Unions must have been regularly made upon the footing that the law as laid down by Lord Watson and as followed afterwards by the Court of Appeal is correctly stated, and I think it would be very undesirable to upset a course of settlements of that kind. The second observation is that, as was pointed out by Lord Justice Atkin, the construction now contended for would tend to increase the number of cases in which a child might be separated from its parents and removed to another parish, merely because of the conflict between two Poor Law Unions equally reluctant to bear the expense of its maintenance, a result to which I could only bring myself under the constraint of the clearest possible authority.

Lord Carson.—My Lords : I concur with the motion which has been moved from the Woolsack.

BUSBY v. AVGHERINO.*

Tithes — City of London — Rate prescribed by statute — Exemption from prescribed rate — Premises for which less paid before Act — Onus of proof—37 Hy. VIII., c. 12.

By the Act 37 Henry VIII., c. 12, and a decree made pursuant to it and having the force of a statute, the lessees of houses and all other hereditaments (with certain immaterial exceptions), situated in the City of London, are liable to pay a tithe of 2s. 9d. for every rent of 20s. by the year, "and so above the rent of 20s. by the year . . . by the rate aforesaid." The decree contained a proviso that in the case of premises in respect of which less sums had been accustomed to be paid for tithes before 1545, the date of the Act, the premises should be exempted from the prescribed rate.

In an action by the owners of tithes against the occupiers of premises in the City for tithe at the rate prescribed by the statute, Held, that the onus was on the defendants to prove that the tithe paid before 1545 in respect of the premises was less than the sum prescribed by the statute.

The plaintiffs were the executors of the will of Mary Busby, who died on December 7, 1918, and, as such, they were the owners of all the rectorial or freehold tithes issuing out of or payable for or in respect of such parts of No. 15, Great St. Helen's, in the City of London, as were situated in the parish of St. Helen's, Bishopsgate.

The defendants had for various periods since March 25, 1921, held and occupied portions of No. 15, Great St. Helen's, all of which were situated in the parish of St. Helen's, Bishopsgate.

The above-mentioned tithes were payable under and by virtue of the statute 37 Henry VIII., c. 12, "An Act for Tithes in London," and a decree made thereunder. By that decree the tithes were to be computed at the rate of 2s. 9d. upon every 20s., and at 1s. 4½d. upon every 10s. of the rent of the premises in respect of which the tithes were payable, but by clause 18 of the decree it was stated that where less sums had been accustomed to be paid for tithes, those tithes should only be paid at the accustomed rate.

The plaintiffs claimed to recover as from March 25, 1921, tithes at the rate of 2s. 9d. for every 20s., or 1s. 4½d. for every 10s. of rent. The defendants alleged that the sum of 4s. 9d. a quarter, or 19s. per annum, was accustomed to be paid for tithes in respect of No. 15, Great St. Helen's at and before the date of the decree, and they admitted liability to that extent only and paid into Court the sum of £3 6s. 6d. to answer the tithes at that rate from March 25, 1921, to the commencement of the action.

Mr. G. B. Hurst, K.C., and Mr. C. A. Collingwood appeared for the plaintiffs ; Mr. Preston, K.C., and Mr. Lionel L. Cohen for the defendants.

His Lordship delivered a considered judgment in favour of the plaintiffs and gave them the costs of the action, the costs of an account which he directed being reserved.

Mr. Justice Tomlin, in the course of his judgment, said that the plaintiffs, as owners of the rectorial tithe payable in respect of premises known as No. 15, Great St. Helen's, in the City of London, whose title to the tithe was admitted, asked against the defendants, who were the occupiers of the premises, for an account of what was due to them for such tithe from March 25, 1921, and for payment of the amount certified to be due. The substantial question was whether the tithe payable in respect of the premises was a fixed annual sum of 19s. or an annual sum equal to 2s. 9d. in the £ on the annual rental of the property.

In the reign of Henry VIII. disputes had arisen between the owners and payers of tithe in the City of London and the liberties thereof, and to appease those disputes an Act, 37 Henry VIII., c. 12, was passed, the effect of which, taken with a decree made pursuant to it and having the force of a statute, was to render the lessees of houses and all other hereditaments, with certain exceptions not material to this case, situated in the City liable to a tithe of 1s. 4½d. for every rent of 10s. by the year and of 2s. 9d. for every rent of 20s. by the year, "and so above the rent of 20s. by the year ascending from 10s. to 20s. by the rate aforesaid."

The decree, however, contained in clause 18 a proviso that where less sums had been accustomed to be paid for tithes, those tithes should only be paid at the accustomed rate. That proviso exempted from the prescribed rate premises in respect of which a certain less sum had been accustomed to be paid for tithes in and before 1545, the date of the statute. That was the construction placed upon the proviso by Lord Eldon in Warden and Minor Canons of St. Paul's v. Kettle (2 V. and B., 1).

As the result of the charter granted by Queen Elizabeth in 1599 the tithes in question got into lay hands and in 1658 became vested in Sir John Langham, who found it necessary to resort to the Courts to assert his rights under the statute. His

The first question was whether, as urged by the plaintiffs, the defendants were liable for the 2s. 9d. rate unless they proved what was necessary to bring them within clause 18 of the decree, or whether, as the defendants contended, the plaintiffs were bound to prove substantially that the defendants' premises did not in 1545 pay a certain less sum. He (his Lordship) had no doubt that the plaintiffs were in the right and that the onus of proving payment of a certain less sum was on the defendants. In any case, he should hold himself precluded from giving effect to any other view having regard to the decisions on the statute in Bramston v. Heron (Gwillim, 1314); Warden and Minor Canons of St. Paul's v. Kettle (supra); and Foster v. Worshipful Company of Plumbers, decided in 1900, but only reported on a subsidiary point in 44 Sol. J., 211. He had, however, been furnished with a shorthand note of the judgment of Mr. Justice Buckley in the last-mentioned case, and that Judge had there treated the point as already determined in the sense indicated.

He (his Lordship) had therefore to determine whether the defendants had proved that in respect of the premises in question there was accustomed to be paid in and before 1545 a certain sum of less than 2s. 9d. in the £. It was not surprising that no evidence of the sum paid for tithe in or before 1545 was forthcoming, but evidence of payments made at a later date was admissible and might bring conviction to the mind of the Court that a certain sum less than 2s. 9d. in the £ was accustomed to be paid in and before that year. On such evidence the plaintiff succeeded in Foster v. Worshipful Company of Plumbers (supra).

The defendants' case was, first, that there were in Great St. Helen's in 1545 five houses each of which paid a certain sum for tithe of less than 2s. 9d. in the £, the total amount payable on the five houses being £1 0s. 6d. per quarter; secondly, that between the years 1654 and 1705 the five houses were converted into six houses, between which the £1 0s. 6d. per quarter was distributed in such manner that 4s. 9d. per quarter, or 19s. per annum, became payable in respect of one of them—namely, that now represented by No. 15, Great St. Helen's; and thirdly, that thereafter 19s. per annum was paid in respect of No. 15, except that during certain periods in circumstances which deprived the payments of significance larger sums were paid. If those matters were established by their evidence the defendants said that the decision should be in their favour.

His Lordship then proceeded to consider the documentary evidence put in to support this case, beginning with the decree dated February 9, 1662, in Sir John Langham's suit, and a book produced from the archives of the Vestry of Great St. Helen's referring to the decree.

Continuing, his Lordship said that the proper inferences to be drawn from the material seemed to him to be (1) that the extent of the liability to tithe of the property had been a matter of doubt over a long period; and (2) that the tithe owner and the tithe payer had from time to time accommodated their differences by temporary arrangements. In the face of what was actually proved and of the above inferences, it was not possible to infer that during periods when there was no evidence of payment 19s. per annum was paid rather than some other sums, and still less possible to infer that the 19s. represented some sums, or apportioned parts of other sums aggregating 19s., which were themselves certain sums of less than 2s. 9d. in the £ accustomed to be paid in 1545.

The result was that this action succeeded. The judgment would be prefaced by a declaration that the defendants were liable to pay tithe in respect of No. 15, Great St. Helen's, at the rate of 2s. 9d. in the £ and an account on the footing of this declaration.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. HORNSEY BOROUGH COUNCIL.*

Highways—Bridges—Highway repairable by inhabitants at large passing over bridge—Liability to repair bridge—"Street"—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 and 39 Vict., c. 55), ss. 4, 149, 152.

In 1882 seven streets were, in the course of the development of an estate, carried across a river on iron girder bridges. These streets subsequently became highways repairable by the inhabitants at large. An action was commenced by the Attorney-General against the local authority for a declaration that they were liable to repair and keep in repair these seven bridges.

Held, that, having regard to the fact that the word "street," as defined by s. 4 of the Public Health Act, 1875, includes (if this is not inconsistent with the context) any bridge (not being a county bridge), the plaintiff was entitled to the declaration.

This was an action by the Attorney-General, who sued on the relation of the British Land Company, Limited, claiming a declaration that the defendants, the Hornsey Borough Council, were liable to repair and to keep in repair seven bridges over the New River at Umfreville, Burgoyne, Cavendish, Duckett, Mattison, Pemberton, and Warham Roads, in the parish of Hornsey, in the county of Middlesex.

Mr. Maugham, K.C., and Mr. C. P. Sanger appeared for the plaintiff; Mr. Macmorran, K.C., and Mr. Ronald Walker for the defendants.

Mr. Justice Romer delivered the following considered judgment:—In this case His Majesty's Attorney-General, on the relation of the British Land Company, Limited, asks for a declaration that the defendants, as the urban authority of Hornsey, are liable to repair and keep in repair seven bridges within the defendants' district.

The facts, which are not in dispute, are as follow:—In the year 1882 the relators were the owners of the Harringay Park Estate, which they proposed to develop by making roads and erecting houses thereon. The estate was intersected by the New River. The relators accordingly entered into an arrangement with the New River Company for the construction by that company of seven iron girder bridges over the river and for the grant to the relators and those claiming under them of rights of way for all purposes over and across the river by means of the seven bridges so to be constructed. In due course the seven bridges were erected by the New River Company, and the relators carried one of their new roads over each bridge. In this way there were constituted within the defendants' district seven streets, not being highways repairable by the inhabitants at large within the meaning of section 152 of the Public Health Act, 1875. But these streets, having been sewered, levelled, paved, flagged, channelled, and made good, and provided with proper means of lighting, to the satisfaction of the defendants as such urban authority, were from time to time duly declared by the defendants to be highways under the provisions of that section, and thereupon became highways repairable by the inhabitants at large. From that time, the provisions of section 149 of the Act became applicable, and, by virtue of that section, the streets and the pavements, stones, and other materials thereof, and all buildings, implements, and other things provided for the purposes thereof, vested in and came under the control of the defendants; and the defendants became liable to cause such streets to be repaired from time to time as occasion might require. Now, by section 4 of the Act, the word "street," if this is not inconsistent with the context, includes any public bridge not being a county bridge. In these circumstances, all seven bridges being in a state of disrepair, the plaintiff asserts that the defendants are liable to repair them. The defendants, however, repudiate any such liability.

The bridges in question are admittedly public bridges, not being county bridges. The defendants are admittedly liable to repair the seven streets; and the Act says that the streets include the bridges, there being no context that I can see inconsistent with their inclusion. At first sight, therefore, the plaintiff's claim would appear to be justified by the language of the statute. It would also at first sight appear to be justified by common sense. For if the bridges, owing to want of repair, become incapable of supporting the road surface above them, that surface will collapse, and will cease to exist as a highway, and the defendants, having no right to compel any other body or person to repair the bridges, will, unless they repair the bridges themselves, be unable to perform the duty which they concede is imposed upon them of keeping the surface in repair.

The defendants, however, contend that the matter is by no means so simple as all this, and that, in face of various authorities on which they rely, I am constrained to come to a different conclusion. And, even apart from authority, they say that the Act cannot bear the construction that the plaintiff seeks to put upon it, inasmuch as the Legislature cannot have intended to place upon urban authorities so heavy a liability as that construction involves. But the authority was not, at any rate before 1925 it was not, under any compulsion to declare a street crossing a bridge to be a highway under section 152, and if they did not wish to become liable to repair the bridge they could refrain from exercising the powers of that section. Having regard to section 82 of the Public Health Act, 1925, the authority may now no doubt in certain circumstances be compelled to declare a street a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large. But that is only when the street is sewered, levelled, paved, flagged, metalled, channelled, and made good to the satisfaction of the authority. If, therefore, "street" includes the bridge, the authority need not make the declaration and incur the liability to repair until, amongst other things, the bridge is made good to their satisfaction. I can see no reason for coming to the conclusion that in 1875 the Legislature could not have intended urban authorities to incur the liability of repairing a bridge.

I must now turn to the authorities upon which the defendants rely. They say, in the first place, that in numerous cases the Courts have considered and explained the true effect and extent of the vesting provision of section 149, and that the idea that the fabric of a bridge can become vested in an urban authority under the section is altogether inconsistent with the decisions in those cases. Mr. Macmorran, however, did not refer me to more than one of those authorities. He very properly contented himself with citing a passage from the speech of Lord Herschell in the case of Tunbridge Wells Corporation v. Baird (12 The Times L.R., 372; [1896] A.C., at p. 442), as summing up the law upon the subject. Lord Herschell there said: "It seems to me that the vesting of the street vests in the urban authority such property and such property only as is necessary for the control, protection, and maintenance of the street as a highway for public use." Lord Halsbury expressed himself in much the same way on p. 437: "It is intelligible enough," he said, "that Parliament should have vested the street qua street, and, indeed, so much of the actual soil of the street as might be necessary for the purpose of preserving and maintaining and using it as a street."

Applying this criterion, it would seem that where a roadway runs across a bridge spanning a river, and the urban authority, as here, have no means of compelling any other party to keep the bridge in repair, the bridge must vest in the authority to such an extent as is necessary to enable them to keep the bridge in repair, and so maintain the street as a highway for public use.

In this connexion reference may usefully be made to the case of Reg. v. Inhabitants of Lordsmere (2 The Times L.R., 623). In that case the defendants had been indicted for the non-repair of a wall alleged to form part of a highway. The wall was in fact a retaining wall supporting the highway, which at that point ran along the side of a steep hill, and which would have slipped away without the retaining wall or some such support. It was contended for the defendants that even if they were liable to repair the highway, they were not liable to repair the wall. The jury at Quarter Sessions were directed to consider (1) whether the wall formed part of the highway, (2) whether the wall was out of repair, and (3) whether such wall was repairable by the defendants. The jury found the defendants guilty, and upon a case stated for the consideration of the Court for Crown Cases Reserved, it was held that the question whether the wall was part of the highway was not a question of law but purely a question of fact which was very properly left to the jury, and that the jury could properly answer the question in the affirmative. As I understand this case, it is an authority for the proposition that where there is, as there is here, a liability to keep in repair a highway, the question what constitutes the highway for that purpose is a question of fact. If that be so, then, apart altogether from the definition in section 4, I should arrive at the conclusion that in the circumstances of the present case the bridges form part of the highways that the defendants are admittedly liable to keep in repair. This conclusion seems to be in accordance with the statement in Halsbury's Laws of England, Vol. 16, para. 342, that a bridge in a highway, if it be not a county bridge, is repairable as part of the highway by the persons, if any, liable to repair the highway. But, however that may be, I have in the present case the express provision that the word "street" includes any public bridge not being a county bridge. Now, if the contention of the defendants be correct, the reference to bridges in this section is not easy to understand unless the object be to make it clear that a street is a street even where it passes over a bridge. But if that were the object, it is very difficult to see why an exception should have been made in the case of county bridges, which are bridges that the county is liable to repair. Before the passing of Lord Ellenborough's Act (the County Bridges Act, 1803), the county was liable to repair every bridge (by which I mean a bridge carrying a highway super flumen seu cursum aquæ) unless such liability attached to some other person or corporation ratione tenuræ or otherwise. And this liability extended to the highway for a distance of 300 feet from each end of the bridge. It was, however, provided by Lord Ellenborough's Act that a bridge thereafter erected could only become a county bridge when erected under the direction and to the satisfaction of the county surveyor. If any bridge were made otherwise than under the direction and to the satisfaction of the surveyor, the liability to repair it would seem to have been in the persons liable to repair the highway that crossed it. For even before Lord Ellenborough's Act there were instances of structures that carried highways over a stream which were held not to be county bridges, and these structures appear to have been treated as part of the highway and repairable as such.

In Rex v. Inhabitants of Whitney (3 Ad. and El., 69) Lord Chief Justice Denman said that the mere fact of an arch passing over a stream did not necessarily make it a bridge. In that case the parishioners of Whitney were indicted for non-repair of a public horse and carriage way 374 yards in length. The defendants contended that a deduction must at all events be made in respect of a bridge and 300 feet at each end of it which lay within the termini specified in the indictment. The so-called bridge was a stone arch 9 feet wide, and without parapets, carrying the highway across a mill stream. At the trial Mr. Justice Park expressed the view that it was a culvert and merely left to the jury the question whether or not the road was out of repair. The Crown obtained a verdict, and a motion for a new trial was refused by the Court of King's Bench. It was suggested that Mr. Justice Park had laid it down that the structure was not a bridge in that it wanted parapets. As to this, Mr. Justice Littledale said: "The learned Judge did not lay down any proposition of law as to the want of parapets . . .; what he said was merely that . . . there was fair ground for saying that the place in question was part of the highway."

In Reg. v. Inhabitants of County of Southampton (18 Q.B., 841) it was held that a bridge carrying a public footpath over a stream and consisting of three planks 9 feet long and a handrail was not such a bridge as the county was bound to repair. In the course of the argument, and when it was stated that the bridge had been repaired by certain commissioners, Lord Chief Justice Campbell said: "The fact of its having been repaired by the commissioners would rather raise a presumption that it is part of the highway." I have referred to these two authorities in some detail because it seems to me that they are authorities for the statement in Halsbury's Laws of England, Vol. 16, paragraph 342, to which I have already referred. No one can doubt that in both cases the structure was a bridge, though not a county bridge, and in both cases it was regarded as being a part of the highway, and repairable as such.

Reverting once more to the question of county bridges, it is to be noted that by virtue of section 21 of the Highway Act, 1835, as construed by the Courts, in the case of all county bridges built after the passing of the Act, the liability to repair the highways leading to, passing over, and next adjoining the bridge does not rest upon the county, but is thrown upon those who would have been liable to repair the said highways, assuming that they did not cross the bridge. If, then, the object of section 4 of the Public Health Act, 1875, was to make it clear that a street for the purposes of the Act was none the less a street because it passes over a bridge, one seems driven to the conclusion that a street passing over a county bridge is not a street for the purposes of the Act. In the case, therefore, of county bridges erected after 1835 the position would be extraordinary. For the urban authority would be under no obligation and would have no power to keep in repair the highway crossing over it. If, however, the true view of the definition clause be that the structure of a bridge is to be deemed a part of the street, the exclusion of county bridges is intelligible enough. For the county is responsible for the repair of the structure of those bridges, and there was no reason, therefore, for vesting the structure in the urban authority, or imposing upon them the liability to repair such structure.

It remains, however, to consider the case of Great Eastern Railway Company v. Hackney District Board of Works (8 App. Cas., 687), inasmuch as Mr. Macmorran contends that I am precluded by that authority from coming to the conclusion that the defendants are liable to repair the seven bridges. In that case the railway line ran in a deep cutting much below the level of the highway, which was carried over the railway by a bridge built by the railway company under statutory powers, and in pursuance of sections 46 to 51 of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845. The District Board of Works, having paved the highway, which was admitted to be a new street within section 105 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, maintained that the railway company were liable to contribute to the expenses of that operation as being owners of land bounding or abutting on both sides of the roadway of the bridge. One of the points taken by the railway company in opposition to such claim was that the fabric of the bridge was vested in the Board of Works by virtue of section 96 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855. That clause provides that all streets being highways shall vest in and be under the management and control of the vestry or district board, the word "street" being declared by the interpretation clause of the Act to apply to and include any bridge not being a county bridge. Lord Watson, in repelling this argument on the part of the railway company, said this: "It was assumed, no doubt rightly, by the counsel on both sides of the bar, that the rights and liabilities of the appellants, with reference to this bridge, were regulated by the Railways Clauses Act, 1845." He then proceeded to examine the relevant sections of that Act, pointing out, amongst other things, that the Act appeared to distinguish the road itself from the bridge carrying it over the line, and continued as follows: "The real import of these enactments is that the substitute road shall be supported by means of a bridge provided by the railway company, the land upon which the old highway rested having been taken and used for railway purposes. In my opinion the right of the public, or of the highway authority, is not thereby enlarged. Their right is, in the first place, in and to the road, and may extend to the materials of which it is composed; and in the second place, to have subjacent support to the road from a properly constructed bridge. They are also entitled, in terms of the statute, to have the road maintained, and to have the bridge kept properly fenced by the railway company; but these provisions do not appear to me to imply that they are to have any greater interest in the bridge and its fences, as distinguished from the road proper, than they had in the strata upon which the original road rested. These remained the property of the landowner, although burdened with a public right of way in perpetuity. The Metropolis Management Acts do not, in my opinion, confer upon district boards any larger right in the streets and highways placed under their charge than had previously belonged to the public. The statutory functions of the district board are limited exclusively to the surface of the road or street proper. In the case of new streets, what section 105 of the Act of 1855 authorizes the board to do is to 'pave the same, either throughout the whole breadth of the carriageway and footpaths thereof, or any part of such breadth, and from time to time keep such pavement in good and sufficient repair.' Keeping in view, then, that the sole object of vesting streets, and the materials of which they are composed, in district boards is to enable them effectually to perform their statutory duties in relation to the streets, I cannot suppose that the Legislature, in enacting that the word 'street' shall 'apply to and include' any bridge, intended to vest in the board anything more than the street which is carried or supported by the bridge."

Now I cannot read these last words of Lord Watson as intended to be of general application to all bridges. Had that been his intention, I cannot think that he would have examined in such detail, as he did, the provisions of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845. As I understand his judgment, his view was this: that it could not have been the intention of the Legislature, in passing the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, to interfere by its general provisions with the special provisions as to bridges contained in the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, and that, by virtue of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, district boards obtained no larger right in streets and highways placed under their charge than had previously belonged to the public. I do not read his judgment as affirming the proposition that, even though a district board is unable effectually to perform its statutory duties in relation to a street without having vested in it a bridge carrying that street, the structure of the bridge nevertheless does not vest in them, or the proposition that even though the public had previously been under a liability to repair the structure of a bridge such a liability did not pass to the district boards. Such propositions, indeed, seem to be inconsistent with the language that he used.

If I put upon the section of the Public Health Act, 1875, to which I have referred the construction contended for by Mr. Macmorran, the defendants will not be able to discharge properly their duties in respect of the highways that cross over the bridges, and their liability for repair in respect of such highways would, as it seems to me, differ in a material respect from the liability of the public that existed before the passing of the Act in respect of highways carried over bridges that are not county bridges. In these circumstances there is, in my opinion, no reason why I should not give effect to what appears to me to be the natural meaning of the words of the statute. I must accordingly make the declaration that is asked for.

WASSERMAN v. BLACKBURN.*

Insurance (Loss)—Bills of exchange—Loss or deprivation through dishonesty—Assured induced to discount bills by false representations—Dishonour of bills—Liability of assured—Whether loss within the policy.

The plaintiff was insured by two policies, subscribed by the defendant, against loss or deprivation of bills of exchange through theft and any other loss whatsoever through theft or other dishonesty. During the currency of the policies the plaintiff was induced by false representations to discount certain bills of exchange. The bills were dishonoured, and the plaintiff brought an action on the policies on the ground that he had suffered a loss through having dealt in the bills. The defendant contended that the above provision in the policies only covered accidental loss of documents or physical deprivation of the possession of documents.

Held, that the plaintiff's loss was caused by dishonesty within the meaning of the policy, and he was entitled to recover.

The plaintiff in this case claimed against the defendant a sum of £67 6s. 2d., as his share of a sum of over £16,000 alleged to be due from the underwriters, one of whom was the defendant, of two policies of insurance.

Sir W. Schwabe, K.C., and Mr. T. Mathew appeared for the plaintiff; Sir Leslie Scott, K.C., and Mr. J. M. H. Wilson for the defendant. Mr. F. Gahan held a watching brief on behalf of Lloyd's.

The plaintiff, by his statement of claim, said that he was at all material times interested in two "All-in" Lloyd's policies of insurance, each subscribed by the defendant, whereby he was insured against loss in accordance with the following clause:—

"Whereas the assured are desirous of effecting assurance to the extent of say £15,000 or £7,500 against the loss or deprivation as hereinafter mentioned of bonds, debentures, stocks, scrip, shares, transfers, certificates, coupons, warrants or other securities, cash, cheques, bank notes, bills of exchange, promissory notes, title deeds of landed property, or any documents of value (all and each of which are hereinafter included in the words 'such securities as aforesaid')

* Reported by W. B. THOMPSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

"Now it is witnessed that the several persons whose names are hereto set and subscribed each in consideration of a premium . . . the receipt of which they do respectively acknowledge, do severally but not jointly promise and agree with the assured that in case the assured shall at any time during twelve months from this date . . . lose or be deprived of or discover that they have lost or been deprived of, at any time before such discovery, any such securities as aforesaid, whether payable to bearer or otherwise, on or from the premises of the assured, their bank, or the Stock Exchange vaults, or other safe deposits, or elsewhere, by robbery, theft, fire, explosion, embezzlement, burglary, or abstraction, whether with or without violence, and whether from within or without, and whether by officers, clerks or servants . . . of the assured, or by any other person or persons, or by the negligent or fraudulent conduct of the said officers, clerks, or servants or other person or persons, or shall sustain or discover as aforesaid that they have sustained any other loss whatsoever through the theft, fraud, larceny, embezzlement, or other dishonesty of or forgery by any such officer, clerk, servant, person or persons, they the said parties hereto will respectively pay and make good to the assured such proportion of the value of any such securities as aforesaid or of the amount of any such other loss as aforesaid, which the assured have lost or been deprived of or sustained or discovered as the amount of their respective subscriptions bears to the sum assured.

"It is hereby declared that this policy, in addition to the above, indemnifies the assured against loss by reason of their having dealt in forged . . . negotiable or transferable instruments or documents. . . ."

During the existence of the policies the plaintiff was induced to discount certain bills of exchange by false representations made by one Harrison that the bills were genuine bills which had been drawn in respect of instalments of the purchase price of motor-cars payable by the purchasers under hire-purchase agreements, and that the payment of the said bills was effectively guaranteed by policies of insurance. The bills were dishonoured, and the plaintiff said that he suffered a loss of the respective amounts thereof through the fraud or dishonesty of such person, and that the bills were forged negotiable instruments, and that he (the plaintiff) sustained a loss through having dealt in them.

Mr. Wilson submitted that the bills of exchange were not forged documents within the meaning of the policy; that the plaintiff was not induced by fraud to discount the bills; and that in any event the loss was not within the policy at all. The recital showed what the clause was really intended to cover: "loss or deprivation" meant loss which was accidental, such as a document having been accidentally destroyed; and deprivation resulted from something having been taken away by some person. There must be a physical deprivation of possession against the assured's will. The later words "any other loss whatsoever" referred to the amount of the loss by deprivation of the insured thing, and not to the cause of the loss. The word "whatsoever" must be qualified by the ejusdem generis rule. In Larsen v. Sylvester and Co. (24 The Times L.R., 640; [1908] A.C., 295) the expression was stronger, "of what kind soever," and the intention was obviously to exclude the rule.

Mr. Justice Roche referred to Steamship Knutsford, Limited v. Tillmans (24 The Times L.R., 756; [1908] A.C., 406); and Joseph Travers and Sons, Limited v. Cooper (30 The Times L.R., 703; [1915] 1 K.B., 73).

Sir Leslie Scott submitted that the recital indicated the subject-matter of the insurance, and that the subsequent words did not force one to go beyond the recital. At the most the plaintiff could only say that the words were ambiguous, and to clear up the ambiguity one must refer back to the recital. If the plaintiff's construction was right there would have been no need for the clause at the end providing for indemnity where the assured had dealt in forged documents, for that would have been covered by "any other loss whatsoever." Under the policy the measure of the indemnity was stated to be the market price of the document lost, and that showed that loss by fraud was not within the intention of the parties.

Sir W. Schwabe replied.

Mr. Justice Roche, in the course of a long judgment, discussed the complicated series of transactions known as the Harrison frauds and various legal proceedings which had arisen out of them. He then dealt with the construction of the policy in this case. The recital set out the object of the insurance, which was to cover the loss or deprivation of, amongst other things, bills of exchange and cash. The first part of the witnessing clause provided an insurance against the loss or deprivation, by a number of perils, of the things mentioned in the recital, including theft, but not specifically including dishonesty or forgery. The later part of the clause insured against any other loss whatsoever through the . . . dishonesty of any person or persons, and, finally, there was an indemnity against loss by reason of having dealt in forged documents.

So far as regarded the first part of the witnessing clause it was argued that the plaintiff had lost cash and could claim under it, but in his (his Lordship's) view the loss was occasioned by false pretences or fraud and was not within the words of that part of the clause. But he thought that the loss was covered by the later words in the witnessing section, "or shall sustain . . . any other loss whatsoever." Those words provided against any other kind of loss whatsoever in relation to the subject-matter of the insurance through the enumerated causes, which included the dishonesty of any persons. The defendants contended that those words must be limited to the amount or items of loss arising from the causes already specified, but that argument could not be reconciled with the fact that immediately after the words "any other loss whatsoever" a new peril, dishonesty, which had not been previously mentioned, was introduced.

The defendants also contended that the presence of the declaration at the end of the clause, insuring the policyholder, "in addition to the above," in the case of dealings in forged documents, would have been unnecessary if the words "any other loss whatsoever" were not intended to have only a limited meaning. That was a weighty argument, but policies of insurance had grown up over a long period, and those who framed them were not afraid of surplusage and did not hesitate to use express words to cover things which might already be covered by general words. He held that the plaintiff's loss was caused by dishonesty within the meaning of the witnessing clause. There would accordingly be judgment for the plaintiff.

Court of Appeal.
(Lord Hanworth, M.R., Atkin and Sargant, L.JJ.)
1926. Nov. 24.

HAMILTON v. SHELTON IRON, STEEL, AND COAL COMPANY, LIMITED.

LEIGH v. SAME.

TIMMIS v. SAME.*

Master and Servant—Compensation for injury by accident—Partial disablement—Capacity for light work—Opportunity taken away by a strike—Right to compensation—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII., c. 58), s. 1 (1).

The respondents, who were employed by the appellants, a mining company, met with accidents arising out of and in the course of their employment and were paid compensation by the appellants, and afterwards, having partially recovered, were given light work at wages at least equal to what they had been earning before the accidents, but in consequence of the coal strike of 1926 the appellants were obliged to discontinue employing the respondents. On claims by the respondents for compensation the County Court Judge awarded compensation for partial disablement.

Held, that although but for the strike the respondents would have continued to earn substantial sums, yet, as their loss of the opportunity of light work was caused not by their own act but by that of the workmen who went on strike, the Judge's award must be affirmed.

These were three appeals which were heard together as involving similar questions of law and fact. They raised a point of widespread public interest and importance in regard to workmen's compensation.

The facts in the first appeal, which were not in dispute, were as follow :—Hamilton, a collier in the employment of the Shelton Iron, Steel, and Coal Company, Limited, met with an accident on December 21, 1925, and was paid compensation by his employers. He recovered partially from the effects of the accident, but was not well enough to do his former work as a "banksman," and his employers, for whom he had worked for nearly 40 years, found him light work as a signaller, his duties being to signal the departure of the cage in which the workmen were lowered or raised into or from the mine. His wages in that employment were to be £2 12s. 6d. a week, which were substantially equal to, or even better than, the wages which he had been earning before the accident. After he had performed those duties for a week the coal strike broke out, and the employers were obliged to discontinue the employment. Upon a claim being brought in the Hanley and Stoke-upon-Trent County Court for compensation, the County Court Judge held that Hamilton was still entitled to compensation by reason of his partial disablement. The fact that the employers could not keep the pits open by reason of the strike was their misfortune, but it did not alter the facts that Hamilton could only do certain kinds of work by reason of his accident and that he had now lost his employment without his own fault. An award was therefore made for payment to him of 18s. a week.

The employers appealed.

In the first case Mr. Cave, K.C., and Mr. Colin Coley, and in the second case Mr. Cave, K.C., and Mr. Edgar Dale appeared for the appellants ; Mr. R. H. Norris appeared for the respondents.

Mr. Cave, referring to the first case, contended that the workman's partial disablement was not the cause of his being out of work. He was not disabled from earning his full wages by reason of his accident, but by reason of the strike. He relied on Drew v. Staveley Coal and Iron Company (129 L.T., 620) and Williams v. Oakwood Colliery Company (88 L.J., K.B., 878). Those cases showed that, though a strike might not deprive a man of compensation, a right to be compensated could not be given to a man who apart from the strike would not be entitled to it.

Mr. Norris contended that, though a man who went on strike might disentitle himself to compensation because his action in striking and not his injury might be the cause of his failure to earn wages, yet it was not the policy of the Legislature that a man should be deprived of his compensation because of a strike for which he might be in no way responsible. He relied, inter alia, upon Cory Brothers and Co., Limited v. Hughes (27 The Times L.R., 498 ; [1911] 2 K.B., 738) ; Ray v. Vickers, Limited (16 B.W.C.C., 200) ; Warwick Steamship Company v. Callaghan (5 B.W.C.C., 283) ; and Murray v. Portland Colliery Company, Limited ([1923] S.C., 60 ; affirmed in the House of Lords, 39 The Times L.R., 579 ; [1923] A.C., 566).

The facts in the other cases were not dissimilar. In Timmis's case no evidence had been given, as it had been agreed that the decision should follow the result of Hamilton's case.

The Master of the Rolls, in giving judgment, said that in all three cases the workmen suffered personal injuries by accidents arising out of and in the course of their employment, and the employers became liable to pay compensation upon the basis of partial incapacity for work. The facts of each case differed, but the three men had been found light employment and were thus able to secure wages by earning them in some suitable work. That fact was relevant to the amount of compensation payable to them under section 9, subsection 3, of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925. The question of quantum, however, was not for that Court, but for the Judge of the facts, as was said in Ray v. Vickers, Limited (16 B.W.C.C., 200). The County Court Judge had made awards in favour of the workmen, disregarding the wages that they had been earning, and the employers appealed. The employers contended that the employments of the workmen ceased when the strike or lock-out began on May 1, 1926 ; that but for that the men would have continued to earn substantial sums week by week ; and that the compensation awarded by the County Court Judge was excessive, as he had not taken into account what they were earning or could have earned had their employment not ceased on the outbreak of the strike or lock-out.

It was important to consider what sum a workman was entitled to apart from any question of a strike. He was entitled to compensation for the loss of power to earn owing to an accident. (Ball v. William Hunt and Sons, Limited, 28 The Times L.R., 428 ; [1912] A.C., 496 ; Warwick Steamship Company v. Callaghan, 5 B.W.C.C., 283 ; Ling v. De Dion-Bouton, Limited, 35 The Times L.R., 640 ; [1920]

* Reported by G. T. Whitfield-Hayes and H. Langford Lewis, Esqs., Barristers-at-Law.

1 K.B., 88.) That right was not lost by a workman even if another cause supervened and prevented him from accepting alternative or light work (Cory Brothers and Co., Limited v. Hughes, 27 The Times L.R., 498 ; [1911] 2 K.B., 738). Nor could the employers discharge themselves from their liability when they had found the workman light employment which had come to an end owing to the cutting down of their staff (Macdonald v. Wilsons and Clyde Coal Company, 28 The Times L.R., 431 ; [1912] A.C., 513), or from slackness of work (Ray v. Vickers, Limited, supra).

The relief, if any, to the employers to be derived from their giving light alternative employment to a workman depended upon the employers' being able to prove that that opportunity was available to the workman. See the cases collected in Willis on Workmen's Compensation at page 193 of the last edition. After the employers had given evidence on that issue it lay upon the workman to show that he could not do or find any such light work as alleged, but the Judge might take into account his general knowledge of the labour market, so that actual evidence by the workman was not essential, and the Judge might be able to determine the matter without specific evidence (Middleton v. Wharncliffe Woodmoor Colliery Company, Limited (No. 2), 16 B.W.C.C., 125).

In all the present cases, therefore, when it was found that the light work failed, the workmen were entitled to an award of compensation. In none of the cases was a refusal to work proved, as there was in McNamara and Co., Limited v. Burtt (4 B.W.C.C., 151) ; for in Hamilton's case the Judge found that the workman had no wish to give up the work, and in Leigh's case and Timmis's case he found that the men always desired to return to work.

None the less, it was argued that the absence of work was due to the action of the workmen's colleagues and not to any act of volition on the part of the employers. The question therefore arose : Did the fact that it was the strike that caused the alternative work to cease avail the employers ? In Hutchison v. Cadzow Coal Company (17 B.W.C.C., 365) it was held that, where alternative work failed by reason of the employers' colliery not working, the workman was entitled to reopen the question of compensation for partial incapacity which, up to that time, had become not payable owing to his being given employment at an increased wage by his employers. At the same time, Lord Alness was careful to observe that defences were open to the employers. He said, at page 369 :—

"Now, compensation was suspended because employment was offered to the appellant at higher wages than he had earned before the accident. It is therefore clear that the only relevant change of circumstances which the appellant need aver . . . is that the offer in respect of which his compensation was suspended is no longer available to him."

And further on, at page 370 :—

"I will only add that it goes without saying that the defences of the respondents remain entire and unaffected by the decision which I suggest to your Lordships. They may, in the course of the inquiry which I propose we should allow, be able to prove that this was a strike and not a lock-out. They may prove that the offer of employment was not withdrawn but remained open and was rejected by the appellant. If they prove any or all of these things they may win their case. But it does not seem to me to be possible to exclude all defences in the appellant's averments, nor indeed is it, in my opinion, necessary to do so."

And Lord Hunter, at page 373, said :—

"The moment the man averred the works were not going he was prima facie entitled to something because he was then still incapacitated. It may be, however, because of the particular facts of this case he is not entitled to anything."

Lord Alness suggested, apparently, that proof of a strike would afford a defence to the employers, but that would only be if the facts proved that the work was refused. To come now to Murray v. Portland Colliery Company, Limited ([1923] S.C., 60), it seemed that the man in that case was treated as a striker and as refusing to work during the strike, but during the subsequent period, when work was not yet available in consequence of the strike and the pits were flooded, the Court held that incapacity caused by the accident was the dominant consideration. Lord Constable, at page 372, expressed the view that a supervening cause did not eliminate the right of the workman. That case was affirmed in the House of Lords (39 The Times L.R., 579 ; [1923] A.C., 566).

If the workman was a striker and refused work, the cases in which a refusal dominated the position would apply ; but, if not, the right to compensation remained, and the employers had no factor which could afford them relief. In Williams v. Oakwood Colliery Company (88 L.J., K.B., 878) the man lost his work owing to the compulsion exercised upon him by his trade union. That was treated as an act the responsibility for which fell on the workman. It was done contrary to, and in spite of, the willingness of the employers to employ him.

Lastly, to turn to Bromley v. Staveley Coal and Iron Company and Drew v. Same (129 L.T., 620), Lord Sterndale said that it was quite clear that Bromley could have earned the same amount that he had been earning before the strike but for his unwillingness to accept less than the union was standing out for. Bromley said so in his cross-examination quite distinctly, and it seemed to Lord Sterndale that it was a little unjust to the employers that during the time when Bromley might have had those wages the employers should be compelled to pay. The same inference was drawn in Drew's case (supra). Lord Justice Warrington (as he then was) emphasized that the material factor was the incapacity to earn wages occasioned by the injury ; hence he did not go beyond what was said in that case by Lord Sterndale or by Lord Justice Scrutton.

In all cases where it was found that there was a willingness to work, but the work had ceased to be available, the employer's liability was not reduced. The County Court Judge had found that that was so in the present cases. They were not cases of refusal to work, nor was there the entrance of a factor attributable to the workmen. They were cases where the supervening facts had prevented the employers from being able to mitigate the right to compensation given to the workmen by section 1 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906. If in any case it was found, however, that there was unwillingness on the part of the workman to work, then the decision in Bromley v. Staveley Coal and Iron Company (supra) would bind the Court to hold the same as in that case.

The appeals therefore failed, and must be dismissed.

Lord Justice Atkin, after stating the facts, said that, if a man situated as the respondents in the present cases gave up his job on his own account and of his own free will, then he might not be able to demand compensation, but if the job in fact disappeared without his being in any way at fault, as by the insolvency of the employer, by fire, flood, overwhelming disaster, or even by a strike, then the job was at an end, and the County Court Judge must determine whether the workman who had met with the accident was able to get work, and if so at what wages, and the Judge was entitled to take into account that where there was a subsisting injury there must be some incapacity. Here the Judge determined that there was some injury, that there was a loss of earning capacity, that the men were now less able to earn good wages. He also found that the employment had ceased. That being so, there was certainly no evidence that the employment had ceased through any fault of the workmen, because the evidence was that the workmen applied to go on with their work, and were willing to go on with their work, and so the award of so much a week was clearly justifiable. The Judge would not, of course, have been entitled to give compensation if the men had been able to earn full wages and had only been debarred from doing so by the state of the labour market; he should take that fact into account. But the Judge here had come to the conclusion, and it seemed a reasonable one, that the men were not able to earn full wages; they were incapacitated to the extent of a certain sum per week, and they were entitled to be compensated in that sum, unless they had themselves done something to deprive themselves of the work which had been given to them.

It was said that the Court was bound by the decisions in Drew v. Staveley Coal and Iron Company and Bromley v. Staveley Coal and Iron Company (129 L.T., 620), particularly by the former, but that was a case of the man himself giving up the employment; further, there was no evidence that during the strike the man could not earn as much as he had earned before. In Murray v. Portland Colliery Company, Limited ([1923] S.C., 60), which was affirmed in the House of Lords (39 The Times L.R., 579; [1923] A.C., 566), an injured man was working at light work when there came a strike, and the sheriff-substitute found that he was not entitled to compensation, and he deprived him of any compensation during the period of the strike. The Court said that that was wrong, and that the arbitrator could find that, as the man during the strike was partially incapacitated and able to earn less wages, he was entitled to compensation. In Hamilton's case, too, it certainly seemed reasonable that the Judge should take into account that the employment given to the workman had only lasted about a week. The three appeals must therefore be dismissed.

Lord Justice Sargant said that he was of the same opinion. In each of the three cases there was a diminution of earning capacity, and so a right to make a claim. When work which the workman could do was found for him he, for the time being, suffered no loss, or, in the event of the amount earned being less than before the accident, he received compensation to make up the difference. But, when the wages in the new employment ceased, then the loss of earning capacity ceased to be latent and became active, and the workman became again entitled to compensation. The workman in fact had suffered an injuria cum damno; the wages paid by the employers for the light work prevented, for the time, there being any damnum, but the injuria remained, and when the employment failed, then the damnum revived. The appellant had relied upon Bromley v. Staveley Coal and Iron Company and Drew v. Staveley Coal and Iron Company (129 L.T., 620), but it seemed to him (the Lord Justice) that the decisions in those cases had rested upon the particular facts, and in the inferences from those facts found by the Court of Appeal, and a decision founded upon those impressions would not be the standard in every case. He (Lord Justice Sargant) did not think that the Court of Appeal intended to lay down any view of the law different from that which had prevailed in other cases, and that was shown by the fact that the workman was held to be entitled to compensation for the period when he was unemployed after the strike had ended. Lord Sterndale's judgment did not seem to indicate the belief that he was deciding anything in a sense contrary to the decision in Murray v. Portland Colliery Company (39 The Times L.R., 579; [1923] A.C., 566), but, if so, the decision in the latter case in the House of Lords was to be preferred as a decision to the decisions in Drew's and Bromley's cases (supra).

ASTON COAL COMPANY, LIMITED v. STANCIL.*

Master and Servant—Compensation for injury by accident—Appeal—Notice—Judge's notes—Time for filing.

The Court, on this application to extend the time for entering an appeal, laid down an important point of practice in workmen's compensation cases.

Stancil, a workman, was injured while in the employment of the Aston Coal Company, Limited, and received compensation. The employers applied to diminish the sum payable, but the Judge at Rotherham County Court dismissed the application. The solicitor acting for them was instructed to enter an appeal, but he was under the impression that he could not do so without obtaining and filing a copy of the Judge's notes. According to his affidavit, he did not obtain a copy until November 5, 1926. He sent them at once to the printer, but could not get them back until November 11, one day after the time for entering the appeal had expired. The employers applied to the Court of Appeal to extend the time.

Mr. Edgar Dale appeared for the applicants; Mr. Shakespeare for the respondent.

The Master of the Rolls said that the Court had decided to grant the application to extend the time as there seemed to have been a genuine mistake. In future, however, he wished it to be clearly recognized that the appeal must be entered within the time allowed, and it was not necessary to obtain and file a copy of the Judge's notes when entering notice of appeal. These notes must, of course, be obtained and entered, but that was not a condition precedent. The notes should be obtained as soon as possible, but notice of the appeal might be given first.

Lord Justice Atkin and Lord Justice Lawrence gave short judgments to the like effect.

IN RE J. AND J. CHARLESWORTH, LIMITED, AND HENRY BRIGGS, SON, AND CO., LIMITED.*

Mines—Coal—Application for right to work—Rival application — Agreement between the parties for division of area.

Where rival applicants for the right to work coal in a certain area agree to divide the area between themselves, the Court will not make an order in the terms of the agreement unless it is expedient in the national interest so to make it, and the Court may specify matters in regard to which the agreement must be modified.

The Court gave judgment in respect of an agreement between the parties in these applications for rights to work an area of the Silkstone or Middleton main seam of coal, near Hunslet, in the West Riding of Yorkshire.

Mr. T. Terrell, K.C., and Mr. P. Gordon Bamber appeared for Messrs. J. and J. Charlesworth, Limited; Sir Leslie Scott, K.C., and Mr. H. V. Rabagliati for Messrs. Henry Briggs, Son, and Co., Limited.

Mr. Justice Sankey, in giving judgment, said that the applicants, Messrs. J. and J. Charlesworth, Limited, and Messrs. Henry Briggs, Son, and Co., Limited, sought rights to work a certain area of coalfield in Yorkshire and also applied for ancillary rights to facilitate that working. Originally each of the applicants claimed to be the one who should be allowed to work the minerals in the national interest. If the applications had remained rival ones he would have come to the conclusion on the grounds both of economy and expedition in working that Messrs. Henry Briggs, Son, and Co., Limited, had shown a better title to the right to work the coal in question. When the matter came before the Court, however, they were surprised to be told that the parties had entered into an agreement to divide the area between themselves.

That placed the Court in a very embarrassing position, because each of the applicants had alleged, in no measured terms, in their applications that it was quite impossible for the other to work the area properly, and each party had supported their allegations by statements on oath. He wished to remind the parties that statements on oath, whether of fact or of opinion, were to be regarded as true and ought to be made only with very great care. The Court felt that in coming to their agreement the parties had not troubled so much about the national interest as about their own, and he desired to enter a most emphatic protest against any such course of proceeding.

That Court had to consider the national interest, and the position with regard to agreements between parties was different from that which existed in ordinary Courts. An order to work coal would only be granted in any particular form if it were expedient in the national interest so to make it.

The national interest might differ from time to time, but, without giving an exhaustive definition, the Court would in any event pay attention to the following matters :—(1) The safety of the men who would have to work the coal; (2) by what means the largest amount of coal could be obtained; (3) economic, expeditious, and efficient working; (4) the number of men to be employed; and (5) where there was an application to let down surface, the comparative value of the minerals to be gotten and that of the buildings on the surface.

It was not wrong for parties to come to agreements, but the Court must be satisfied that the agreement was not only in the interests of the parties, but also for the benefit of the nation.

His Lordship went on to specify certain matters, regarding which the agreement between the applicants would have to be modified.

Sir E. Tindal Atkinson, K.C., and Sir Lewis Coward, K.C., delivered judgments agreeing with that of his Lordship.

MITCHELL v. B. W. NOBLE, LIMITED.*

Revenue — Income-tax — Profits — Deductions —Business expense—Payment to retiring director.

The Court held that a payment by a company to a director in order to induce him to retire, in circumstances in which the other directors had come to the conclusion that it was essential in the interests of the company that he should retire, was a business expense deductible from the company's profits for purposes of income-tax.

This was an appeal by the Crown from a decision of the Special Commissioners of Income Tax.

Under an agreement of November 25, 1918, made between the respondent company and its directors, it was provided, inter alia, that the directors should be directors for life so long as they continued to hold a qualifying number of shares, subject to dismissal for misconduct as mentioned below. In the event of a director being so dismissed the remaining directors were empowered to require him to sell to them his shares in the company at par.

It was also provided that if any director should, inter alia, neglect his duties or be guilty of such misconduct towards the company or otherwise as would in the absence of any agreement to the contrary entitle a company summarily to dismiss him from his employment, the company should have power to dismiss him forthwith, paying to him such a proportion of his salary only as should then be due.

By a further agreement of April 29, 1920, made between the company, its directors, and Mr. Silver, a new director, the directors covenanted to alter the company's articles to enable the company to issue participating notes, and it was provided that as soon as that was done the company would create 2,000 of those notes and allot them to the directors in certain proportions. The notes were to confer certain rights to profits. It was provided that no persons other than a director, officer, servant, or employee of the company should be entitled to hold or acquire participating notes. It was also provided that when a noteholder ceased to be a director, officer, servant, or employee of the company he should forthwith surrender his notes to the company to be cancelled. The necessary alterations in the articles were made and the notes were allotted as provided by the agreement.

During 1920 and 1921 considerable friction of a personal nature arose between one director of the company and his co-directors, and there was evidence before the Special Commissioners of conduct on the part of that director improper in a director of the company. The other directors desired to get rid of him and considered it necessary for the sake of the good name of the company to do so. It was admitted that the company might possibly have been justified by law in exercising its power of dismissal, in which case the dismissed director would have been entitled to no compensation. But the other directors were anxious that the matter should not become public, and they entered into negotiations with the director concerned for his retirement. He at first demanded £50,000, but a compromise was eventually arrived at, and on December 30, 1921. an agreement was entered into between the company, the remaining directors, and the retiring director, whereby the retiring director agreed (1) to retire from the company ; (2) to transfer his shares, which at that time were 300 £1 shares, at their face value of £1 per share, to the remaining directors ; and (3) to surrender his participating notes. The company agreed to pay him £19,200, and the directors to pay him £300, making together the sum of £19,500. He agreed to accept that sum in full and complete satisfaction of all claims which he had or might have against the company or the directors. (The £300 paid by the directors was expressed to be the consideration for his shares.)

The sum of £19,500 was payable in five annual instalments. The first instalment (which was duly paid) amounted to £5,500, and consisted of (a) the £300 payable by the directors for the retiring director's shares, and (b) £5,200 being part of the £19,200 payable by the company.

It was contended on behalf of the company that the sum of £19,200 was money wholly and exclusively laid out for the purposes of the business ; and that the instalments were admissible deductions from profits as and when they fell due.

It was contended on behalf of the Crown, inter alia :—

(1) That assuming (though it was denied) that the £19,200 or any part thereof represented commutation or compensation for loss of salary to which the retiring director would have continued to be entitled had he remained a director, and which would have continued to be an admissible deduction year by year in arriving at the company's profits for assessment, it was a capital sum and was not an expense proper to be set against the receipts of the company on revenue account for the purpose of computing the balance of its profits.

(2) That assuming (though it was denied) that the £19,200 or any part thereof represented compensation for loss of salary, it was a voluntary payment, inasmuch as in the circumstances the company was entitled to dismiss the retiring director without compensation of any kind, and was not under any obligation to continue to retain him in its service and pay him a salary. It was not therefore a commutation of any yearly sum which the company continued to be liable to pay.

(3) That the agreement to pay the £19,200 was a compromise of a claim for £50,000, and, if any part of the sum represented compensation for loss of salary (though this was denied), it was not only compensation for such loss but also, generally, compensation for loss of anticipated dividends as a shareholder and of surplus profits as a noteholder, neither of which matters could in any circumstances be the subject of deduction in arriving at the company's profits for assessment. The agreement of December 30, 1921, did not attempt to apportion the £19,200 as between compensation for loss of anticipated dividends and surplus profits, on the one hand, and loss of salary, on the other hand ; and there was no evidence upon which the Special Commissioners could find that any particular sum was in fact payable or paid as compensation for loss of salary or by way of commutation of any payment which, had it continued to be made year by year, would have been an admissible deduction in arriving at the company's profits for assessment.

(4) That, in essence, the £19,200 was domestic expenditure incurred for the purpose of buying out a director and shareholder for purely personal reasons and was not expenditure incurred for the purpose of earning profits of the company.

(5) That neither the £19,200 nor the instalment of £5,200, nor any other instalment thereof, was money wholly and exclusively laid out or expended for the purposes of the company's business, nor admissible as a deduction in computing the profits of the company for assessment to income-tax.

The Special Commissioners held that the instalment of £5,200 paid to the retiring director should be allowed as a business expense, and they reduced the assessments.

The Attorney-General (Sir Douglas Hogg, K.C.) and Mr. R. P. Hills appeared for the Crown ; Mr. Konstam, K.C., Mr. Le Quesne, K.C., and Mr. Merlin for the respondents.

Mr. Justice Rowlatt, in giving judgment, said that the question was whether there could be deduction from profits, or in arriving at profits there could be a deduction, as an expense incurred in carrying on the trade, of an instalment of a very large sum to be paid to the retiring director under the agreement under which he left.

It had often been said, but perhaps the clearest and most authoritative statement was in British Insulated and Helsby Cables, Limited v. Atherton (42 The Times L.R., 187 ; [1926] A.C., 205), that

"A sum of money expended, not of necessity and with a view to a direct and immediate benefit to the trade, but voluntarily and on the grounds of commercial expediency, and in order indirectly to facilitate the carrying on of the business, may yet be expended wholly and exclusively for the purposes of the trade."

It was on that basis that it was said that the payment in the present case was wholly and exclusively for the purpose of the trade. The question of deductibility had been glanced at in Royal Insurance Company v. Watson (13 The Times L.R., 37; [1897] A.C., 1), where it was suggested that wages paid to a dismissed servant, presumably to get rid of a claim for damages, were deductible.

He thought that in an ordinary case a payment to get rid of a particular servant for the interests of the trade was a deductible expense. (He left out the question of a payment to get rid of a servant because of some purely personal quarrel.) But a person must employ an efficient staff and one which got on with the firm's customers, and must cease from employing an inefficient staff or one which did not get on with the customers. He saw no reason why expense incurred in doing that should not be a deductible expense, just as a payment on a servant's retirement at an age when his retirement was commercially expedient, might be. He thought that such a payment was distinguishable from that in Strong and Co., of Romsey, Limited v. Woodifield (22 The Times L.R., 754; [1906] A.C., 448), where the expense was collateral to the trade.

If this had been a case of monthly wages he would not have had much difficulty, but there were very special facts and very big figures. In ordinary circumstances the retiring director's damages would have been his salary, less something for the prospect of obtaining other employment. But in this case the director had to sell extraordinarily valuable shares and surrender profit-sharing notes. The company had to pay a much larger sum, and they paid it because, as the case found, it was essential for the good name of the company to get rid of him. They paid only to get rid of him, and these other sums in respect of the shares and notes came in only as enhancing the sum to be paid, though it was true that the agreement provided for the transfer of the shares and the surrender of the notes. But that clause was inserted to ensure that the retiring director should do his part, and, having been paid on the basis of giving up those things, that he should give them up. He thought, therefore, that the expense was a business one.

Was it capital expense? The cases of payment of a capital sum to get rid of a recurring business expense had in his view nothing to do with the present case. It was not a case of saying, "By an expenditure of capital we will get rid of this director and have his room instead of his company." He thought, in spite of the size of the figures, that this was a deductible business expense, and the appeal failed.

B. W. NOBLE, LIMITED v. MITCHELL.*

Revenue — Income-tax—Company resident in England—Business carried on abroad—No foreign profits remitted to England—Power of control in England—Income Tax Act, 1918 (8 and 9 Geo. V., c. 40), Sched. D, Case I.

The appellants, who were insurance and reinsurance brokers and agents in London, had an office in Paris for the purpose of direct insurance on behalf of companies for which it acted as agents, and the appellants in some cases represented the same companies in London and in Paris. A resident director of the appellants had the sole conduct of the Paris business under a power of attorney. The results of the Paris business were incorporated in the appellants' balance-sheets, but no part of the French profits was remitted to London.

Held, that as the power of attorney did not, except as against third parties, divest the directors in London of their power of control over the French business, the appellants were assessable to income-tax under Case I. of Schedule D on the whole of their profits, including those of the Paris office.

This was a case stated by the Special Commissioners of Income Tax. The question was whether the Paris office of the appellants was controlled from England by the directors in London so as to make the company assessable under Case I of Schedule D of the Income Tax Act, 1918, in respect of the whole of its profits, including those of the Paris office. The Special Commissioners found that the control remained in London, and that the company was assessable under Case I.

The company was a private company incorporated in 1916 to carry on the business of an insurance and reinsurance broker and agent previously carried on by Major Noble in London; and to act as insurance or reinsurance brokers and agents for, and as the London managers of, the business of any British, Colonial, or foreign insurance or reinsurance company, and any other trade or business whatsoever which could, in the opinion of the board, be advantageously carried on by the company in connexion with or as ancillary to its business.

Since its incorporation the company had carried on business as insurance brokers and agents, the business being both a brokerage business and a reinsurance business for a limited number of companies.

Major Noble's business was begun about 1913, and in 1915 or 1916 he first obtained business from Paris, carrying out the work at his London office. It was entirely a brokerage business arising through French brokers sending risks to be placed in London. To extend that business M. Gabus, who had an important connexion in England and France, was made a director in April, 1919, and shortly afterwards a Paris office was opened with the intention of continuing there the French brokerage business hitherto carried on from London. But it was found that the conditions under which fire insurance was conducted in France did not permit of brokerage and direct insurance being conducted there by the same person, and during the material years the company's business in Paris was confined to direct insurance on behalf of the companies for which it acted as agents. During those years the company represented some of the same companies both in London and Paris.

The arrangements at first made for carrying on business in Paris through a manager proved unsatisfactory, and in January, 1920, M. Gabus went to reside permanently in Paris, where, since that date, he had the sole conduct of the Paris business under a power of attorney. He was appointed resident director in France and was relieved of attendance at board meetings in London. He had on a few occasions attended directors' meetings in London, and reports were received from him by the directors and occasionally he received their concurrence with his proposals.

From time to time, apart from the occasions when he attended directors' meetings in London, M. Gabus came over and interviewed representatives of the principal British companies for which the company acted as agents in Paris. From time to time Major Noble went over to Paris to see a French company for which the firm acted in London. On these occasions he called to see M. Gabus at the Paris office, but did not interfere with the work of that office. M. Gabus had special knowledge of insurance business in France, and the other directors were not competent to interfere with his conduct of the Paris business, and did not do so. The Paris accounts were kept separately in Paris, but the results were incorporated in the company's balance-sheets. No part of the French profits was remitted to London.

* Reported by J. W. Hall, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Mr. E. M. Konstam, K.C., Mr. C. T. Le Quesne, K.C., and Mr. S. P. J. Merlin appeared for the appellants; the Attorney-General (Sir Douglas Hogg, K.C.) and Mr. R. P. Hills for the Crown.

Mr. Justice Rowlatt, in giving judgment, said that the case raised a question as to the application of the principle laid down in Egyptian Hotels Company, Limited v. Mitchell (31 The Times L.R., 546; [1915] A.C., 1,022) to the present company. Two things might be stated to get them out of the way—(1) The division of profits was not part of the carrying on of the business (see the Egyptian Hotels case (supra), and particularly the judgment of Mr. Justice Channell in the Court of Appeal) (30 The Times L.R., 457; [1914] 3 K.B., 118.) (2) If it were a question what acts of control were done the acts to be relevant must be acts in the tax year concerned. There was a broad distinction between this case and the Egyptian Hotels case (supra), where the board was governed by the articles by which the board in London was divested of its powers which were given to the board in Egypt.

Mr. Konstam had said, and perhaps truly, that in that case the point was not so much the alteration of the articles as the form which they took. Whether that was so or not, the form of the altered articles was the element on which the case turned. At the material time there was an article overriding Article 71 of Table A, or its equivalent, and constituting a local board. The board in London had financial powers which might have interfered with the board in Egypt by undermining them, but the board in Egypt had full and exclusive powers.

In the present case there was a totally different position. Article 71 of Table A was in force subject to powers of delegation by a special article, number 15. But that did not overrule Article 71. The board retained full authority, and under them was M. Gabus, acting in Paris on a power of attorney from them. The fact that he made reports to the board in London showed that that was the position. His power of attorney did not divest the board in London of its powers, nor did it make him a plenipotentiary till the power of attorney was revoked. Except as against third parties the board retained the right to say: "Though your power of attorney authorizes you to do so and so we have decided that you should not do it."

There was also to be considered the element of the "head and brain" of the business. Mr. Konstam said that that did not necessarily mean the ultimate control, and this might be true, but neither did it merely mean a clever manager.

Another very important case was Ogilvie v. Kitton (5 Tax Cas., 338), where it was held that a Toronto business was carried on in Scotland, though the person with the right of control had never exercised it, and it was said by Lord Stormonth-Darling that it was a question of the right of control, not of actual control. At first sight Lord Parker's judgment in the Egyptian Hotels case (supra) seemed inconsistent with that view, but he never expressed disapproval of Ogilvie v. Kitton (supra), and he was dealing only with financial powers, and not with powers of trading, which the board in that case had not got.

The appeal failed, and must be dismissed.

MANCOMUNIDAD DEL VAPOR FRUMIZ v. ROYAL EXCHANGE ASSURANCE.*

Insurance (Marine) — Policy — Construction — "Collision with an object" — Stranding — Bumping on rocks — Whether within the policy.

A policy of marine insurance on the hull and machinery of a steamer covered the ordinary perils of the sea and contained the following clause: "Subject to the Institute 'Free of Particular Average absolutely' time clauses as annexed, but this insurance to include damage received by collision with any object (ice included) other than water." The ship, having stranded, bumped on the rocks and damaged her bottom plates. In an action on the policy to recover the damage caused by the bumping, Held, that the contact with the rocks was a "collision with an object" within the meaning of the policy, and the plaintiffs were entitled to recover.

The plaintiffs in this case claimed £106 1s. 8d. from the defendants as their proportion of a sum alleged to be due under a policy of marine insurance.

Mr. Dunlop, K.C., and Mr. Stranger appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. Raeburn, K.C., and Mr. McNair for the defendants.

The plaintiffs, as owners, were interested to the full amount in a policy of marine insurance on hull and machinery of a steamer, the Frumiz, which, on September 22, 1924, stranded in Cuan Sound off the west coast of Scotland. The Frumiz remained on the rocks for some time, and while there she bumped and damaged her bottom plates. For the damage done by such bumping the plaintiffs now claimed under the policy.

The policy covered the ordinary perils of the sea, and contained, inter alia, a clause as follows:—

"Subject to the Institute 'Free of Particular Average absolutely' time clauses as annexed, but this insurance to include damage received by collision with any object (ice included) other than water."

Mr. Dunlop, in opening the case, submitted that on a true construction of the above clause the policy was one providing for total loss only, except that damage by collision was covered. The word "collision" meant an "accidental coming into contact with any object external to the ship." The clause excluded damage caused by a heavy sea striking the ship, but a blow from anything which was not water would be covered. The word "collision" had a wide signification and was not limited to a contact with something navigable. If a ship bumped on a wreck, a pile, or an anchor lying on the bottom of the sea, it would be a collision; and here the bumping on the rocks after the ship had stranded was also a collision. If the defendants had wished to exclude such a contingency they should have inserted in the policy some clause excluding stranding damage.

He referred to Arnould on Marine Insurance, Section 826; Union Marine Insurance Company v. Borwick (11 The Times L.R., 465; [1895] 2 Q.B.,

* Reported by W. B. Thompson, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

279); The Munroe [1893] P., 248; Chandler v. Blogg (14 The Times L.R., 66; [1898] 1 Q.B., 32); and a case of Richardson v. Burrows referred to in Note 1 to The Normandy (20 The Times L.R., 239; [1904] P., at p. 198).

Mr. Raeburn, for the defendants, submitted that the damage was particular average damage which, by the terms of the policy, was intended to be excluded. It was not damage caused by a collision with an object within the meaning of the word "collision" in marine insurance. To understand the warranty, free from particular average, it was necessary to remember its historical development. Gow on Marine Insurance (fourth edition), at page 183, traced its history from 1749. The word "collision" originally was confined to a meeting with something navigable, but it was then extended to cover various obstructions, as in The Munroe (supra) and Union Marine Insurance Company v. Borwick (supra). In the present case the use of the words "free of particular average absolutely" was intended to exclude the particular peril of stranding, and the subsequent provision for collision with any object was meant to provide for collision with any of the various objects which had been gradually added to those covered by the collision clause.

What happened here was clearly a stranding (M'Dougle v. Royal Exchange Assurance, 4 Campbell, 283). It would be ridiculous to say that the steamer had been in collision with the west coast of Scotland; that would be an unreasonable straining of language. He referred to Reischer v. Borwick (10 The Times L.R., 568; [1894] 2 Q.B., 548); Hough and Co. v. Head (5 Asp. M. C., 447); and an American case of Lehigh and Wilkes-Barre Coal Company v. Globe and Rutgars Fire Insurance Company (6 Fed. Rep., 2nd Series, 736), reprinted in 26 Ll. L., 82. Striking against something which was merely a natural feature of the bottom of the sea had never been held to be a collision.

Mr. Stranger replied for the plaintiffs. The effect of the clause was that the onus was shifted from the shipowner, who did not need to show what had been struck, to the underwriter, who had to show that the damage was done by water.

Mr. Justice Roche, in giving judgment, said that the case was a very difficult one, and depended on the construction of the policy. The ship was damaged during the currency of the policy owing to contact with rocky ground, and the question was whether that contact amounted to a "collision with an object" within the meaning of the policy. It was not enough to say that it amounted to a collision; it must be a "collision with an object" such as was contemplated.

By reason of the original coming into contact with the rocks the vessel suffered some damage. While she was lying stranded the weather became worse and she began to bump and suffered much more damage. The defendants contended that the case was one of particular average, which was excluded from the policy. They said that no collision within the meaning of the clause had occurred. It was admitted that if the original striking was within the clause the subsequent damage would also be within it, on the principle of Reischer v. Borwick (10 The Times L.R., 568; [1894] 2 Q.B., 548), and in his view the subsequent bumping did not constitute a fresh collision.

For many purposes the word "collision" was used in a sense too narrow to allow it to include a casualty of that nature in its ambit. The whole matter had been reviewed in the American case of Lehigh and Wilkes-Barre Coal Company (6 Fed. Rep., 2nd Series, 736), but the context in which a word was used might make all the difference. Here he could not limit the force and effect of the including words in the clause by reference to the supposed intention of the parties to exclude matters due to stranding or sinking. The ultimate question to be decided was whether contact with a natural feature—namely, rocks on the ground—was a collision with an object such as the policy contemplated. In his view it was. The words of the clause were very general, and he thought that the words "any object" meant "anything," and were not confined in the manner suggested by the defendants. That appeared from the last words dealing with collision with water; for a collision with water was not a collision with a natural object in its natural position.

There would be judgment for the plaintiffs.

J. GORDON ALISON AND CO., LIMITED v. WALLSEND SLIPWAY AND ENGINEERING COMPANY, LIMITED.*

Contract—Sale of goods—Defect—Cylinder for ship's engines—Supply to ship repairers—Subject to "our usual" guarantee clause—Damages for detention of ship—Uncertainty as to clause indicated.

The plaintiffs, a ship-repairing company, requiring a new intermediate pressure cylinder for the engines of a steamer which they had contracted to repair, obtained a quotation from the defendants, who were marine engineers. At the head of the defendants' letter was a printed notice, "All offers are subject to our usual strike and guarantee clauses, accidents, &c." The plaintiffs ordered the cylinder, but after it had been delivered and fitted it was found to be defective. A new cylinder was subsequently supplied by the defendants, but owing to the delay the plaintiffs were not able to complete the repairs in accordance with their contract with the shipowners and had to pay them damages. In an action to recover the amount of the damages the defendants alleged that the contract for the supply of the cylinder was made subject to "our usual" guarantee clause and that their guarantee clause provided (inter alia) that "the contractors shall not in any case be liable for any detention of the vessel or other consequential damages howsoever arising."

Held, that as it was not clear what guarantee clause was incorporated, since the clause suggested by the defendants was the clause in their usual engine agreement which was drawn to meet the case of engines being supplied to a shipowner and not to meet such a case as the present, and as it was not proved that the defendants had made it clear that they intended to limit their liability, the plaintiffs were entitled to recover.

The plaintiffs in this case, a ship repairing company at Birkenhead, claimed damages from the defendants, marine engineers on the Tyne, in respect of a defective cylinder.

Mr. Miller, K.C., and Mr. Probyn Jones appeared for the plaintiffs ; and Mr. Clement Davies, K.C., and Mr. Lilley appeared for the defendants.

Early in 1925 the plaintiffs were engaged in repairing a steamer, the Beechwood, and in the course of executing the repairs had to fit a new intermediate pressure cylinder in the steamer's engines. They ordered the cylinder and fittings from the defendants at a cost of £622, and the cylinder was delivered and fitted on board in due course. When tested under steam pressure it was found to be cracked and useless, and the plaintiffs returned it to the defendants. A new cylinder was subsequently supplied by the defendants, but owing to the delay the plaintiffs were not able to complete the repairs of the Beechwood in accordance with their contract, and they became liable to her owners in respect of the extra time involved. The plaintiffs compromised the claim of the owners by a payment of £4,000, and they now claimed from the defendants that sum together with a further sum of £281 in respect of expenses and other matters.

The defendants put in a general denial, and said that they only contracted to supply a cylinder which would satisfy the test of Lloyd's surveyor, and the cylinder now in question had passed the test. They also said that their contract with the plaintiffs was made subject to "our usual" strike and guarantee clauses, and that their guarantee clause, which was customary in the trade, was in the following words:—

"The contractors guarantee the machinery against all defects of material or workmanship that may be discovered within a period of six calendar months after completion of the machinery. The contractors will . . . supply and fit at their works new articles and/or materials to replace or make good such defective part or parts of the machinery arising within such period and due to such causes as aforesaid. . . . The contractors shall not be liable to the purchasers in respect of defects whether in original or substituted work or material except to the extent provided for in the last preceding clause, and the contractors shall not in any case be liable for any detention of the vessel or other consequential damages howsoever arising."

While the contract between the plaintiffs and the defendants was under negotiation the defendants wrote on April 25, 1925, quoting their price and specifying the time required for delivery and other matters, and at the head of that letter was a printed notice, "All offers are subject to our usual strike and guarantee clauses, accidents, &c." On April 29, 1925, the plaintiffs wrote to the defendants accepting their tender, but making no reference to the guarantee clause.

Mr. Miller submitted that there were two questions. (1) Did the notice printed on the defendants' notepaper constitute a sufficient notice that the contract was subject to the defendants' guarantee clause ? (2) If it did, what was the actual effect of that clause ? The notice, though in red ink, was in very small print and inconspicuous. And the guarantee clause relied on by the defendants as their usual clause was one which was taken from their common form of contract with a shipowner for the building of triple expansion engines, and was not applicable to the particular contract in this case. The clause really relied on by the defendants was the sentence at the end excluding liability for detention or consequential damages, which was a clause for the limitation of liability and could not be described as a "guarantee" clause at all.

Mr. Clement Davies submitted that the onus was on the plaintiffs to prove that the defect was due to bad material or workmanship at the defendants' works. Up to the time of the delivery of the cylinder at Birkenhead there was nothing whatever to show that it was defective. He submitted that the evidence suggested that the damage was done by the unskilful handling of the plaintiffs themselves.

The notice was sufficient. It was a notice calling attention to something that was familiar to all engaged in engineering. The guarantee and the limitation of liability were both part of the same provision and could not be separated. If the plaintiffs had had any doubt about what the notice covered they should have asked the defendants. As a matter of business the defendants would not be likely to accept a liability for over £4,000 on a contract for only £622.

Mr. Justice Roche, in giving judgment, said that the defendants had supplied the original engines of the Beechwood and the plaintiffs gave them the order for the new cylinder. When the new cylinder was tested cracks were discovered and the cylinder had to be condemned unreservedly. The Beechwood was kept waiting until another cylinder could be supplied, and the plaintiffs were obliged to pay damages for her detention. The main question in the case was whether the cylinder was defective when delivered. On the evidence, he had come to the conclusion that when delivered the cylinder was defective and unfit for the purpose for which it was supplied, although there was no foundation whatever for any suggestion of negligence or improper workmanship or want of skill on the part of the defendants. The reputation of the defendants as engine builders was very high, and, he had no doubt, was deservedly so. But on the evidence it appeared clear that the crack developed during cooling of the casting at the defendants' works. The defendants were urged to make the cylinder as quickly as possible, and the cooling appeared to have been too rapid and to have caused contraction cracks.

With regard to the defence of the guarantee clause, he held that the notice in red type at the top of the defendants' offer was a sufficient notice that guarantee and strike clauses were to be incorporated in the contract. But then the question arose what clauses were in fact incorporated. It was by no means clear. The guarantee clause suggested by the defendants was the clause in their usual engine agreement ; but that agreement was evidently drawn to meet the case of engines being supplied to a shipowner and did not seem applicable here. As to the suggested limitation of liability, he was by no means satisfied that the defendants made it clear to the plaintiffs that they intended to limit their liability, and he thought that the plaintiffs never accepted any such limitation of liability. At the least the notice was ambiguous, and an ambiguous document was no defence. (Elderslie Steamship Company v. Borthwick, 21 The Times L.R., 277 ; [1905] A.C., 93.)

There would be judgment for the plaintiffs for the sum claimed, less the price of the cylinder finally supplied.

A stay of execution was granted on terms.

HUTTON AND OTHERS v. SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR.*

Crown—Official of Crown—Wrong—Purported exercise of statutory authority—Immunity from action.

An action will not lie against a Crown official, as such, for a wrong done in purported exercise of a statutory authority.

This motion was brought by the trustees and tenant for life of an estate near Richmond, Yorkshire, to restrain the Secretary of State for War, until trial of the action or further order, from taking or continuing any proceedings before an official arbitrator under the Acquisition of Land (Assessment of Compensation) Act, 1919, for the assessment of the compensation or purchase money to be paid for the compulsory acquisition by the defendant of some 2,460 acres of moorland belonging to the said estate, and also to restrain the defendant, his subordinates, servants, or agents from trespassing upon and damaging the said lands.

Mr. Schiller, K.C., and Mr. H. G. Robertson appeared for the plaintiffs; and the Attorney-General (Sir Douglas Hogg, K.C.) and Mr. Dighton Pollock for the defendant.

Mr. Schiller, for the plaintiffs, said that the War Office had purported to acquire the lands in question under the Defence Act, 1842 (5 and 6 Vict., c. 94). Sections 9 and 16 of that Act gave power to the Ordnance officers to acquire land by agreement. Section 19 made provision for the case where the owners refused to treat or failed to agree terms. It provided for the Ordnance officers giving notice to treat, and, if within 14 days the owner refused to treat or to accept the purchase price offered, the Ordnance officers could obtain summary possession of the land from the Deputy Lieutenants or Justices of the Peace, and then might summon a jury to assess the purchase price.

There was, however, a condition precedent contained in section 23 that a certificate should be obtained from the tribunal therein mentioned. The powers of the Ordnance officers had been vested in the Secretary of State for War by section 1 of the Ordnance Board Transfer Act of 1855 (18 and 19 Vict., c. 117), and lastly, a new tribunal for assessing compensation was set up by the Acquisition of Land (Assessment of Compensation) Act, 1919.

The facts in this case were that notice to treat had been given in October, 1925, and there had been a failure to agree. But it was not till March, 1926, that the plaintiffs became aware that in August, 1925, a certificate had been obtained under section 23 of the Act of 1842. Their case was that the tribunal mentioned in section 23 had a quasi-judicial function, and that, the section having been inserted for the protection of the landowners, they were entitled to be heard before a certificate was granted, whereas the certificate had been obtained without their being informed. Since then military formations, accompanied by Airedale dogs, had trespassed on the moors and had done much to destroy their value as grouse moors. In the action the plaintiffs claimed a declaration that the certificate was null and void and that the declaration giving possession of the land was also null and void. But the interim relief sought was to prevent the defendant from proceeding with an arbitration under the Act of 1919, and to prevent trespass.

The Attorney-General said that he desired to take the preliminary point that an action against the Secretary of State for War, as such, would not lie. The only remedy was by petition of right unless the existing Secretary of State had acted wrongfully, and then he could be sued personally, but not as Secretary of State.

The Act of 1842 had given the Ordnance officers, and therefore the Secretary of State, power to sue but not to be sued. The Crown could not be made a party to an action, The Mogileff (No. 2) (38 The Times L.R., 279; [1922] P., 122), and no action would lie against servants of the Crown in their official capacity. So far as a tort was concerned, that point was decided by Raleigh v. Goschen (14 The Times L.R., 36; [1898] 1 Ch., 73). See also Robertson's Civil Proceedings by and against the Crown, p. 30 et seq. The only case at all inconsistent with that doctrine was Kirk v. The Queen (L.R., 14 Eq., 558), but there the statement adverse to the contention now being advanced was a mere dictum. Nireaha Tamaki v. Baker (17 The Times L.R., 496; [1901] A.C., 561, at p. 576) really supported the Crown's contention here; for in that case the New Zealand Commissioner of Crown Lands was sued personally and not in his official capacity.

Mr. Justice Tomlin said that he would hear the plaintiffs on this point.

Mr. Schiller submitted that the authorities cited had no bearing on this case, except as regarded the claim to prevent trespass. The plaintiffs contended that the Secretary of State for War had exceeded his statutory power, although purporting to act as Secretary of State. That being so, the action would lie.

Mr. Justice Tomlin suggested that in such a case the remedy would be against the existing Secretary of State in his personal capacity.

Mr. Schiller contended that the action would lie against the Secretary of State as such, and he referred to Nireaha Tamaki v. Baker (supra), where Lord Davey, in delivering the judgment of the Privy Council, said:—

"Their Lordships hold that an aggrieved person may sue an officer of the Crown to restrain a threatened act purporting to be done in supposed pursuance of an Act of Parliament, but really outside the statutory authority."

Mr. Justice Tomlin said that this was a motion for certain injunctions in an action in which the plaintiffs were the tenants for life and trustees of certain estates in Yorkshire and the defendant was his Majesty's Secretary of State for the War Department, sued as such.

His Lordship then stated the facts, and, continuing, said that, in order to give interim relief of the kind asked for, it would be necessary for the Court to be satisfied that the plaintiffs had made out a prima facie case. But, apart altogether from the merits of the case, he had to consider the preliminary point raised by the Attorney-General, and only if he was satisfied that the preliminary point was not well founded should he be justified in granting any relief on this application; for the preliminary point, if well founded, struck at the whole basis of the action.

The preliminary objection was that there was no right at all to sue the Secretary of State in his official capacity. First, it was said by the Attorney-General, and, indeed, not disputed by Mr. Schiller, that an action against the Crown would not lie. There were methods by which relief might be obtained against the Crown but not by action. Secondly, it was said by the Attorney-General that an officer of the Crown could not be sued as such, and, in support of that, reference had been made to Raleigh v. Goschen (14 The Times L.R., 36; [1898] 1 Ch., 73). The judgment in that case seemed to make it perfectly clear that an officer of the Crown could not be sued as such, although he might be sued as an individual for any wrongful act proved to have been done or authorized by him. In the latter case, it was no answer to say that the act was done by virtue of his authority as a Crown official, if, in fact, the act was wrongful.

Mr. Schiller had, however, sought to draw a distinction based on a passage in the judgment in Nireaha Tamaki v. Baker (17 The Times L.R., 496; [1901] A.C., 561, at p. 576). The plaintiffs' contention really received no support from the passage referred to when it was read in its context. What Lord Davey was really saying was that in a case where an official was sued as an individual for a wrongful act it was no defence to say that the wrongful act was done by him as an officer of the Crown. The argument that an action would lie against a Crown official, as such, when a wrong had been done which purported to be an exercise of a statutory authority, entirely failed. It was sufficient for the present purposes for him to say that, prima facie, this action would not lie, and, that being so, the application must be refused.

Court of Appeal. (Bankes, Scrutton, and Sargant, L.JJ.) 1926. Dec. 6.

MERCHANTS' MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY, LIMITED v. NORTH OF ENGLAND PROTECTING AND INDEMNITY ASSOCIATION.*

Ship—Definition—Pontoon with crane—Adaptability for navigation.

The Court held that a pontoon with a crane fixed on it was not a "ship or vessel" within the rules of an indemnity association, on the ground that the quality of adaptability for navigation was not sufficiently present to bring it within the meaning of these words in the rules.

Decision of Roche, J. (42 The Times L.R., 724) affirmed.

This was an appeal by the defendants from a decision of Mr. Justice Roche (42 The Times L.R., 724).

The question was whether the defendant association was liable to pay the damages caused by a collision with a floating crane, on the footing that such floating crane was a "ship or vessel" within the meaning of the association's rules.

The Llewellyn Steamship Company, the owners of a steamer, the Fernhill, were at all material times members of the defendant association. On March 13, 1924, the Fernhill, while proceeding through the harbour of Rochefort in charge of a pilot, came into collision with a pontoon crane belonging to the French Admiralty. As the result of the collision the pontoon heeled over. On the pontoon was a large crane, built to lift 100 tons, and also a quantity of stores belonging to the French Admiralty.

The French Ministry of Marine took proceedings in the French Courts against the owners of the Fernhill, and in the result it was held that the collision was due to the negligence of the pilot in charge of the Fernhill. The owners under French law were liable for the negligence of their pilot, and the owners and their underwriters accepted the position.

The question then arose whether the defendant association was liable to indemnify the owners of the Fernhill for the whole amount of the damages recovered by the French Admiralty, or whether the owners' claim fell within the running-down clause of a Lloyd's policy, in which case the liability of the defendants would be restricted to one-fourth of the damages. In the latter event the owners' marine underwriters, the present plaintiffs, would have to bear the remaining three-fourths under the running-down clause of the policy, three-fourths being the total liability of the underwriters under that clause.

The owners of the Fernhill assigned to the present plaintiffs all moneys which should be found due from the defendant association in respect of the collision, and under that assignment the plaintiffs brought the action.

The case turned on the construction of certain rules of the association.

It was stated that the crane in question was situated at Rochefort, in France. It was placed on a pontoon, which had no rudder and no engine except the engine which worked the crane, and was permanently fastened by chains to a staging and to some old warships. Communication with the pontoon was obtained by a gangway from the shore staging, the gangway allowing the pontoon to rise and fall with the tide. The pontoon with the crane on it had been in its present position for years and could only have been moved away by the employment of four tugs, two fore and two aft.

At the time of the collision damage was done not only to the pontoon but also to the staging behind it. So far as concerned the staging, the defendants had admitted liability in full, and no question as to the staging arose in the action.

The material rules were as follow:—

"2. A member or owner shall be protected against any of the following liabilities incurred by him in respect of a steamship entered in this class when the same have been incurred without actual fault or privity of the member or owner. . . .

"(b) The damages which a member may in consequence of collision become liable to pay and shall pay in respect of loss or damage caused by a steamship entered by him to any other ship or vessel, or to the freight thereof, or to any goods, merchandise, or other things whatsoever on board such other ship or vessel to the extent of one-fourth part of such loss or damage, and of the costs, charges, and expenses incidental thereto, such damage not being covered by the ordinary form of policy with collision clause attached. . . .

"(e) The damages which the member or owner may become liable to pay and shall pay in respect of damage done by the steamship . . . to any harbour, dock, or pier, or quays, or works connected therewith, or to jetties, erections, or any fixed or movable things other than ships or vessels."

* Reported by E. J. M. Chaplin, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Mr. Justice Roche held that the pontoon with a crane fixed on it was not a "ship or vessel" within the rules of the defendant association, on the ground that the quality or adaptability for navigation was not sufficiently present to bring it within the meaning of these words in the rules, and he entered judgment for the plaintiffs.

The defendants appealed.

Mr. A. T. Miller, K.C., and Mr. Pritt appeared for the appellants; and Mr. Porter, K.C., and Mr. C. P. Miller for the respondents.

Lord Justice Bankes, in giving judgment, said that in his opinion the appeal failed, and practically for the same reasons as those given by the Judge in the Court below. The Court of Appeal had been referred to the authorities decided under the Merchant Shipping Acts as to whether a particular object was a "ship or vessel" within the meaning of those Acts. He thought that it was easier to decide that question under the Merchant Shipping Acts than under the rules of the defendant association, because section 742 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, defined a vessel as something used in navigation. Rule 2 (e) of the rules of the association defined the damages which the member or owner might become liable to pay as being in respect of "damage to any harbour, dock, or pier, or quays, or works connected therewith, or to jetties, erections, or any fixed or movable things other than ships or vessels." Thus it excluded ships or vessels from the things, some of which were specifically described, others being included under "fixed or movable things," in respect of which an owner might become liable to pay damages. The question here was whether a floating crane came within the rule. He thought that the pontoon might be most accurately described as a platform for a crane constructed to be able to float. To decide whether it was a ship or vessel it was material to consider not only its structure, but also the purposes for which it was capable of being, and had, in fact, been, used, and then to come to a conclusion upon an inference drawn from the facts.

The plans and photographs showed that it was constructed in the shape of a vessel to float on the water and to provide a platform for a crane to be used on the water. It was also necessary to construct it so that it might be moved, for it was not intended to be permanently moored. The pontoon, on the platform of which a crane was built, had no motive power of its own, no rudder (that was only an incident, but he thought that it was rather an important one), and, though it was capable of being moved, it was so unseaworthy that it could only go a short distance, and that only in fair weather. It was also most unwieldy. From the information given, it had only been moved very occasionally since 1914. The conclusion to be arrived at was that the object was more accurately described as a floating platform than as a ship or vessel. He thought that it was impossible to frame an exhaustive definition, or to lay down an exhaustive test as to what constituted a ship or vessel, but in his judgment the appeal failed.

Lord Justice Scrutton said that the question was whether the pontoon was a movable thing other than a ship or vessel. He would like to have given a definition of the words "ship or vessel," because they were very usual ones in policies of that kind, but the discussion which had taken place had convinced him that it was of no use to attempt to do so, and that the matter resolved itself into a question of fact. All that he would say was that he was not convinced that the Judge in the Court below was wrong and that the judgments in this case had no effect upon any other case that had been decided. He agreed that the appeal must be dismissed.

Lord Justice Sargant said that he agreed, and for the same reasons as those stated by the learned Judge in the Court below. He thought that the structure must be regarded as an integer composed of two parts welded together. Having regard to the purpose for which it was constructed and the use to which it was put, he was satisfied that this was a fixed or movable thing other than a ship or vessel.

OCEAN COAL COMPANY, LIMITED v. DAVIES.*

Master and Servant — Compensation for injury by accident—Complete recovery of workman—Weekly payments—Continuance till arbitration—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1923 (13 and 14 Geo. V., c. 42), s. 14.

By s. 14 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1923, "An employer shall not be entitled otherwise than in pursuance of an agreement or arbitration to end or diminish a weekly payment under the principal Act except" in certain cases.

Held (Viscount Dunedin dissenting), that an employer is not liable de jure to pay compensation after the termination of incapacity, and, though he must continue weekly payments de facto until it has been determined in an arbitration that the incapacity has ceased, he is entitled on such determination to recover back the payments made during incapacity.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal affirming an award of the County Court Judge of Glamorgan made under the Workmen's Compensation Acts, 1906 to 1923.

The question raised by the appeal was whether on the true construction of section 14 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1923, an employer, who was paying compensation to a workman under the Act of 1906, was liable to pay compensation up to the date of an award releasing him, notwithstanding that the workman had completely recovered at an earlier date.

The respondent was a coalminer in the employment of the appellants, and during the course of his employment he contracted the disease of nystagmus. The appellants admitted liability, and paid him full compensation from October 17, 1923, until November 26, 1924, when the compensation was reduced by oral agreement to £1 per week. From September 3, 1925, the appellants stopped the weekly payment, and on September 21 served on the respondent an application for arbitration on the footing that he had completely recovered.

The respondent, by his answer, contended that he was still incapacitated, but, on October 24, before the arbitration came on for hearing, his solicitors wrote to the appellants' solicitors :—"You may take this letter as an admission that our client is no longer suffering from nystagmus." It was admitted before the County Court Judge that the respondent had recovered on September 3, 1925.

By section 14 of the Act of 1923—

"An employer shall not be entitled otherwise than in pursuance of an agreement or arbitration to end or diminish a weekly payment under the principal Act except in the following cases. . . ."

Stated shortly, those cases were (a) where the workman had actually returned to work ; (b) where his weekly earnings had actually been increased ; and (c) where a medical man had certified recovery. It was admitted that the respondent did not come within those exceptions.

The County Court Judge held, following Davies v. Glyncorrwg Colliery Company ([1925] 2 K.B., 339), that the respondent was entitled to compensation up to the date of the award, and the Court of Appeal—Lord Justice Bankes, Lord Justice Scrutton, and Lord Justice Atkin—affirmed his award.

Mr. E. W. Cave, K.C., and Mr. William Shakespeare appeared for the appellants ; and Mr. Montgomery, K.C., and Mr. Lincoln Reed for the respondent.

Viscount Dunedin.—My Lords : I have found it more than ordinarily difficult to come to a determination in this case, and I frankly confess I have not had the assistance from the Courts below to which I think I was entitled. Two of the learned Lords Justices considered that the case was ruled for them by the case of Davies v. Glyncorrwg Colliery Company ([1925] 2 K.B., 339), decided by another division of the Court of Appeal. One of them thinks a distinction can be drawn between that case and this, but forbears to draw it. The other learned Judges speak in distrustful terms of the decision, but absolutely refuse to state what is their own opinion, and all three concur in saying that the case must come to your Lordships' House and they will not let your Lordships' minds be darkened by any counsel they can give.

The case raises an exceedingly difficult question on section 14 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1923. The only redeeming feature is that the facts disclose with what I may term a brutal frankness the extent of the workman's demand and what it may lead to in other cases.

The facts are these. The workman contracted the disease known as miner's nystagmus, while in the service of the employers. The result was total incapacity, and accordingly, on and after October 17, 1923, he was paid full compensation at the rate of £1 15s. per week. This was done by voluntary agreement. There was no recorded memorandum and no arbitration. On November 26, 1924, the compensation was reduced, again by agreement, to £1 a week. On September 3, 1925, the employers ceased to pay, alleging that the workman had completely recovered. The workman denied the allegation. Upon this the employers commenced arbitration proceedings by way of review. The workman filed his answer on October 13, 1925, denying capacity. On October 24, 1925, on the eve of the case being heard by the arbitrator, the workman's solicitors wrote to this effect :—

"Ocean Coal Co. v. Daniel Davies.

"We are prepared to admit that our client has recovered from nystagmus. We intend, however, to argue that under the new Act you are not entitled to stop his compensation until an order of the Court is actually obtained. No medical evidence is necessary and you may take this letter as an admission that our client is no longer suffering from nystagmus."

On October 27 the arbitrator pronounced the following award :—

"1. I order that the applicants, the Ocean Coal Company, Limited, do pay to the respondent, Daniel Davies, the weekly sum of £1 as compensation for personal injury caused to the said Daniel Davies on October 17, 1923, by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment as a workman employed by the said applicants, such weekly payments to commence as from September 3, 1925, and to continue until October 27, 1925.

"2. And I order that the said weekly payment be and the same is hereby ended as from October 27, 1925," and he at the same time made available the following very clear note :—

"Note.—The only point in this case was whether the respondent was entitled to compensation from September 3, 1925 (when it was admitted he had recovered), up to the date of the award, or if not up to that date, up to the date of the filing of the application for arbitration. I came to the conclusion that a weekly payment could not be said to be ended pursuant to an arbitration within the meaning of section 14 of the Act of 1923 till after the award had been given, and that the workman was accordingly entitled to compensation up to the date of the award. I called attention to the judgments in the Court of Appeal in Davies v. Glyncorrwg Colliery Company, Limited (supra)."

An appeal was taken to the Court of Appeal and the order of the arbitrator was affirmed. The way in which the learned Judges dealt with the question I have already mentioned.

I now recall what was the state of the law at the time of the passing of the Act of 1923. The law is all contained and expounded in the case in this House of Gibson and Co. v. Wishart (30 The Times L.R., 540 ; [1915] A.C., 18). That case pointed out how the Scotch Courts had originally decided that the compensation being de facto paid could only be ended in an arbitration as at the date of the decree in the arbitration, and had subsequently, in the case of Donaldson Brothers v. Cowan ([1909] S.C., 1292), taken the view that the proper date was the date of the application for review, while the English Courts had held that the award when made might be retrospective to the date when the employers alleged and the arbitrator found that incapacity had ceased. It then adhered to the view of the English Courts.

It may now be as well to set out the section of the Act of 1923, which is said to alter that law. Section 14 is as follows :—

"Restrictions on Ending or Diminishing Weekly Payments.

"An employer shall not be entitled otherwise than in pursuance of an agreement or arbitration to end or diminish a weekly payment under the principal Act except in the following cases :—

"(a) where a workman in receipt of a weekly payment in respect of total incapacity has actually returned to work ;

"(b) where the weekly earnings of a workman in receipt of a weekly payment in respect of partial incapacity have actually been increased ;

"(c) where the medical practitioner who has examined the workman under paragraph (14) of the first Schedule to the principal Act has certified that the workman has wholly or partially recovered, or that the incapacity is no longer due in whole or in part to the accident, and a copy of the certificate

(which shall set out the grounds of the opinion of the medical practitioner) together with notice of the intention of the employer at the expiration of ten clear days from the date of the service of the notice to end the weekly payment, or to diminish it by such amount as is stated in the notice, has been served by the employer upon the workman.

"Provided that—

"(i) in the last mentioned case, if before the expiration of the said ten clear days the workman sends to the employer the report of a duly qualified medical practitioner (which report shall set out the grounds of his opinion) disagreeing with the certificate so served by the employer, the weekly payment shall not be ended or diminished, except in accordance with such report, or if and so far as the employer disputes such report, except in accordance with the certificate given by a medical referee in pursuance of paragraph (15) of the said Schedule as amended by this Act; and

"(ii) where an application has been made in pursuance of the said paragraph (15) as so amended to refer the dispute to a medical referee it shall be lawful for the employer pending the settlement of the dispute to pay into Court—

"(a) where the notice was a notice to end the weekly payment, the whole of each weekly payment becoming payable in the meantime;

"(b) where the notice was a notice to diminish the weekly payment, so much of each weekly payment so payable as is in dispute;

"and the sums so paid into Court shall, on the settlement of the dispute, be paid to the employer or to the workman according to the effect of the certificate of the medical referee, or, if the effect of that certificate is disputed, as in default of agreement may be determined by the Registrar or on appeal the Judge;

"(iii) nothing in this section shall be construed as authorizing an employer to end or diminish a weekly payment in any case in which, or to an extent to which, apart from this section, he would not be entitled to do so."

Before I turn to the section itself let me say a word as to the Glyncorrwg case (supra), though, of course, that case does not bind your Lordships. I do not say that that case actually decided the point, but I agree with those Lords Justices who thought that the judgment involved the point. The distinction between that case and this was that there the employers began proceedings under subsection (c) of section 14. There was then a counter-notice. Then the proceedings stuck, for neither party would move, and then the workman went to arbitration. But when the arbitrator came to pronounce his award he ended compensation as at the date of the actual recovery, which he found to be the date that the employers had alleged, and this was altered by the Court, who held that the workman, notwithstanding his recovery, was entitled to payment up to the date of the award. That seems to me absolutely to involve the point; for, if the argument of the appellants here, the employers, is right, inasmuch as the arbitrator came to the conclusion that there was recovery, he was entitled, as he did, to make his award retrospective.

I now come to the section. When I analyse it, I find that its first and leading provision is to prevent the employer from doing what otherwise he would be entitled to do. He shall not be entitled to end or diminish. Now, it has been sought to say that the words will receive adequate effect if we refer them to a stopping of payment at his own hand; but that would not help the workman. If on proceeding to arbitration to find out whether the stoppage was arbitrary or not the award was entitled to be, as Gibson and Co. v. Wishart (supra) had held it, retrospective, the workman was exactly where he was before the Act. Therefore I come, I must say, clearly to the conclusion that this section was to bestow a new privilege on the workman, and that privilege, I have no shadow of doubt, was meant to be that of keeping payment going until it was ended, either by agreement or award or by the procedure under subsection (c). My difficulty does not arise on what I think is the intendment of the statute. It arises on the consideration of the question whether the words used are adequate to carry out the intention of the statute and, I confess after much hesitation, I have come to be of the opinion that they are.

I have said before that I think that in interpreting a statute a Court must take it that the statute is meant to work, and that it should not allow the statute to be defeated unless the words used are quite inadequate to have the desired effect. Now, I think the scheme of section 14 is this: payment which is being de facto made must be continued until it is ended in any one of five ways:—

(1) Agreement;

(2) Award;

(3) and (4) The circumstances under subsections (a) and (b), and

(5) The procedure under subsection (c).

The whole difficulty, to my view, has been in the words "In pursuance of an arbitration." Why should not that be an arbitration invoked after the dispute has arisen and the compensation de facto stopped, and then under Gibson and Co. v. Wishart (supra) the award may be retrospective? I think the only and in the end to my mind compelling answer is that, if so, the section did nothing for the workman at all. Subsection (c) is a provision for the employer alone, so that if Gibson and Co. v. Wishart (supra) stands the workman gets nothing by the section. But if "in pursuance of an arbitration" only means if the arbitration is a thing of the past, then Gibson and Co. v. Wishart (supra) is displaced; the de facto payment must go on till the award ends it. It is obvious that in some cases the arbitration might be prolonged for a long time, and it is therefore, as I think, as a rider in favour of the employer that subsection (c) comes in.

My Lords, I am not insensitive to the fact that de facto payment for complete recovery is travestied by the word "compensation," which properly means compensation during incapacity, while here there is capacity. I confess that the section is badly framed, but I think its object is clear and that it is not so badly framed that it cannot be carried out.

My Lords, I think that this was clearly the opinion of the Master of the Rolls in the Glyncorrwg case (supra). I wish the matter had been more developed, but the attention of the Court was too much directed to what was to be done, while the proceedings under subsection (c) had been initiated and then allowed to collapse. It is clear that the point was in the mind of the learned Master of the Rolls, for in the report he is said to have asked: "Can there be an award operating retrospectively within the meaning of the commencing paragraph of section 14?" To this the learned counsel made an answer quite beside the point: "I know of no award which has been retrospective." With deference to him, it is not a question of his experience, it is a question of what is permissible under the statute.

While, therefore, I do not conceal that it has been a matter of great difficulty to me, and while it is the fact that no case on the point has been decided which binds your Lordships, I think it is only right to say that this view has the support of a great deal of judicial opinion. There are at least two of the learned Judges in the Glyncorrwg case (supra) ; there are the four Judges in the case of Niddrie and Benhar Coal Company v. Dee, which we are about to dispose of, and I think there must be added those of Lords Skerrington and Cullen in the case of O'Hare v. Bent Colliery Company ([1924] S.C., 807), in which there is a very clear opinion of Lord Sands. I am therefore of the opinion that the appeal should be dismissed.

Lord Atkinson.—My Lords,—The facts of this case are simple. The respective contentions of the parties are clear. The respondent, Daniel Davies, a workman of the appellants, was admittedly rendered totally incapacitated from doing his appointed work for his employers by an attack of miner's nystagmus. By an agreement, not in writing, his employers paid him for a substantial period a certain weekly sum on the footing of that total incapacity. On September 3, 1925, the appellants ceased to make this payment or any payment to the respondent, and an application or request for arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act of 1906 was made to the County Court at Bridgend in Glamorgan for the review, termination, or determination of this weekly payment made in respect of the personal injury which the respondent had suffered, on the ground that since September 3, 1925, his incapacity had wholly ceased. The respondent on October 13, 1925, served a notice in answer, to the effect that since September 3 he had been incapacitated from performing his ordinary work. The learned County Court Judge then, despite the provisions of the first section of the Act of 1906, and of rule 1 of the first Schedule thereto, providing between them, first, that this weekly sum is compensation paid to the workman for the injury caused to him by an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment, and, second, that that compensation must take the shape of a weekly payment during the incapacity, held that the weekly payment should continue to be made up to October 27, 1925, the date of his award, though it was admitted that the respondent had since September 3 completely recovered. The learned Judges give no definition of the character of this weekly payment as paid for nearly seven weeks. It is not compensation for incapacity, for the incapacity has ceased. I thought that Mr. Montgomery almost suggested that it was something like alms which the Legislature designed, out of tenderness for working men, to secure to them at the employers' expense. It would be well to examine how closely the Act of 1906 and the schedule of rules are knit with the Act of 1923 and how vital is the connexion.

Before the arbitration came on for hearing the solicitors for the respondent wrote a letter to the solicitors for the appellants to the following effect :—

"Dear Sirs,

"Ocean Coal Company v. Daniel Davies.

"We are prepared to admit that our client has recovered from nystagmus. We intend, however, to argue that under the new Act you are not entitled to stop his compensation until an order of the Court is actually obtained. No medical evidence is necessary and you may take this letter as an admission that our client is no longer suffering from nystagmus."

In the Workmen's Compensation Act of 1923, the Workmen's Compensation Act of 1906 is referred to as the principal Act. By section 3 of the Act of 1923, paragraph (1) of the first Schedule to the principal Act is modified by the substitution therein of the sum of £200 for £150. By section 4 (1) of the Act of 1923 it is enacted that in paragraph (1) (b) of the first Schedule £1 10s. shall be substituted for £1, as the maximum amount of the weekly payment, and by subsection (2) it is enacted that, where the maximum weekly payment payable under the principal Act (as amended by the foregoing subsection) to a workman who is totally incapacitated is less than £1 5s., the workman shall be entitled during such incapacity to a weekly addition equal to one-half the difference between such maximum weekly payment and the sum of £1 5s., or his average weekly earnings, whichever is the less, and such addition shall, for all the purposes of the principal Act, be treated as if it were part of the weekly payment ; but, notwithstanding that this addition is for the purpose of the principal Act to be so treated, it is expressly provided that the workman is only to be entitled to it during incapacity, and that qualification is thereby introduced into the principal Act.

By the first section of the Act of 1906 it is enacted that if in any employment personal injury by accident arising out of and in the course of the employment is caused to a workman, his employer shall, subject as thereinafter mentioned, be liable to pay compensation in accordance with the first Schedule to the Act. And subhead (b) of rule 1 of that Schedule provides that where total or partial incapacity for work results from the injury sustained by the workman, there shall be a weekly payment during the incapacity not exceeding 50 per cent. of his average weekly earnings during the previous twelve months, if he has been so long employed, but, if not, then for any less period during which he has been in the employment of the same employer, provided that if this incapacity last less than two weeks no compensation shall be payable in respect of the first week, and as respects the weekly payments during total incapacity of a workman who is under 21 years of age at the date of the injury, and whose average weekly earnings are less than £1, 100 per cent. shall be substituted for 50 per cent. of his average weekly earnings, but the weekly payment shall in no case exceed 10s. Now such is the basis, and such are the limits, of the employers' liability fixed by the above-mentioned provisions of the Act of 1906, the principal Act.

The provisions of the Act of 1923 above set out, engrafted as it were upon the principal Act, are comparatively trifling. They are quite consistent with the principle embodied in the earlier statute, and do not substantially divert or limit or alter its operation and effect. If the workman should not be paid by the employers the weekly payment to which he may be entitled while total or partial incapacity continues, he can of course enforce his remedy at law.

But I can find nothing in either statute authorizing a distribution of doles among workmen after their incapacity has ceased, though those doles should be ticketed as weekly payments. If there be found in either of these statutes clear, direct, and unequivocal provisions requiring legal tribunals to decide in favour of a claim which is of this nature, of course the statute must be obeyed ; but if there should be no such express and coercive provisions in them, then I think it is a mischievous and unfortunate practice to award to a workman, after his incapacity has ended, money that he neither by work nor by suffering has earned.

In Gibson and Co. v. Wishart (30 The Times L.R., 540 ; [1915] A.C., 18) it was held that the jurisdiction to award weekly compensation is limited to the existence of the incapacity. That case no doubt came within the Act of 1906.

Now, the coercive legislation which, despite the provisions of the Act of 1906 and its schedule of rules, entitled the arbitrator to make such an award as he has made, is to be found, it is contended, in section 14 of the Act of 1923. That latter section is very ill-drawn. If obscurity was the object sought after, it has been attained. If the repeal of the cardinal provision of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, namely, the payment of the stipulated compensation for injury only while incapacity lasts, was aimed at, one would think that it might have been effected with courage and clearness. That method, however, apparently has had no attraction for the framers of section 14, and accordingly by a somewhat stealthy kind of method, mild and harmless in appearance, there is introduced something which, if interpreted as it has been in this case, is, it appears to me, opposed to the cardinal principles of the statutes dealing with workmen's compensation, and to the principles of common honesty in addition.

Subsection (a) of this section indicates, so far as it goes, that a workman who was totally incapacitated, but who gives the best proof that his incapacity has ended, and has returned to work, is not to get at the same time the weekly payment and the wages which he presumably earns at his work. Proviso (ii) enacts, in effect, that where an issue has been knit between the medical practitioner of the employer and the medical practitioner of the workman, and the matter in dispute between them is referred, as it may be, to a medical referee, the employer may, pending the settlement, pay into Court (where the notice that he served was a notice to end the weekly payment) the whole of each weekly payment becoming payable in the meantime ; and, where the notice was a notice to diminish the weekly payment, so much of each weekly payment as is in dispute, and the sums so paid into Court shall, on the settlement of the dispute, be paid to the employers or the workman according to the effect of the certificate of the medical referee, or, if the effect of that certificate is disputed, as in default of agreement may be determined by the Registrar or, on appeal, by the Judge.

This seems to be a most reasonable provision, protecting both the employers and the workman alike till their dispute is settled, if not by the medical referee, by the Registrar or Judge. The amount to be paid into Court would, where the notice was to end the weekly payment, be the whole of those payments payable in the meantime up to the ending of the dispute.

The main reliance of the respondent was, it appeared to me, on the first four and a half lines of this 14th section. I think it is clear that the object of this provision was to deprive the employer of the power or right, to which he was theretofore entitled, arbitrarily at his own will and pleasure, to end or diminish the weekly payment. Under this section he may still terminate the weekly payment if, in the doing of that, he acts "in pursuance of an agreement or arbitration." If anything is clear I should think it is that the words "pursuance of an agreement or arbitration" mean in this connexion simply the doing of what an agreement or an arbitration authorizes and entitles the employer to do. A tenant pays his rent in pursuance of his lease. If an arbitrator awards that A.B. shall do a certain thing, in the doing of that thing A.B. is acting in pursuance of the arbitration in which the award was made ; so construed, this section would effect the object that it was, I think, really designed to effect—namely, to deprive the employer of the arbitrary right and power at his own unfettered will to end or diminish the workman's weekly payment.

But section 14, so interpreted, leaves the first section of the Act of 1906 and the rules of the first Schedule to it unrepealed and in full force and effect. The workman does not in truth lose his weekly payment by any act of his employer. He loses, and must in justice lose it, by the operation of the statutory enactment on his own admission that his incapacity had terminated. In my view, the learned Judge had no jurisdiction whatever to make the decree that he made, any more than he would, if, in a suit brought by a creditor to recover a debt from a debtor, the creditor before the hearing began served notice on the debtor that he admitted that the debt had been paid before the suit commenced. I think that the decision appealed from was erroneous and should be reversed and this appeal be allowed, with costs here and in the Court of Appeal.

Lord Shaw of Dunfermline.—My Lords : The respondent was a coalminer in the employment of the appellants. During the course of his employment he contracted the disease of nystagmus. The appellant company admitted liability for compensation. Davies was paid for over a year full compensation at the rate of £1 15s. By agreement of parties that was then limited, there having been partial recovery from the disease, to £1 per week. On September 3, 1925, the fact is that Davies had entirely recovered. That is the cardinal fact in the case.

His incapacity ceased. It was admitted that he was then capable of performing his ordinary work at his ordinary rate of wages. On that date, or a week thereafter, namely, on September 10, the appellants stopped payment to him, and on September 21 they made a request for arbitration, stating plainly the reason, namely, the respondent's recovery. The respondent, however, denied this fact ; but before the arbitration came on for hearing before the Judge, namely, on October 24, 1925, the solicitors for the respondent wrote to those for the appellants "we are prepared to admit that our client has recovered from nystagmus. We intend, however, to argue that under the new Act (that is, the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1923) you are not entitled to stop his compensation until an order of the Court is actually obtained. No medical evidence is necessary, and you may take this letter as an admission that our client is no longer suffering from nystagmus." It was further admitted that that recovery had taken place by the date from which the weekly payment was stopped, namely, September 3.

Reduced accordingly to its elements, and apart from all questions of procedure, the proposition is that a workman is entitled to recover from his employer compensation in respect of incapacity for a period after that incapacity has ceased. This is said to be the result of the language employed in the statute of 1923.

My Lords, I am of opinion that, complicated as are the questions which arise in the construction of that statute, it was not intended by it, nor does it provide, that that peculiar result should follow. But in view of various decisions which have been pronounced, the tendency of which, in my humble opinion, has been to obscure and fail to give effect to the fundamental principle and provision of the statute of 1906, it is necessary to begin at the beginning, to see what is the nature and scope of the compensation under the Act named.

The liability is imposed by section 1—a liability "to pay compensation in accordance with the first Schedule." Under that Schedule, by paragraph (1) (b), where "total or partial incapacity for work results from the injury a weekly payment during the incapacity not exceeding 50 per cent. of his average weekly earnings" is to be made to the workman, and in paragraph (3) it is prescribed that in fixing the amount of the weekly payment "regard shall be had to any payment, allowance or benefit which the workman may receive from the employer during the period of his incapacity."

It is really unnecessary to insist on the essentiality of this condition of liability. As has been pointed out in previous cases, it is not the award which creates the liability; an award is merely part of the machinery for determining its amount and for having it enforced. But the liability is imposed by the statute itself, and the statute uses no doubtful language as to the period and purpose of compensation. Where an accident has occurred arising out of and in the course of a workman's employment the statute says that the workman is to receive compensation during the period of the incapacity resultant from that accident. It is most necessary, in view of the numerous questions which have arisen in applying the machinery and procedure prescribed by the Act to effectuate the payment of this compensation, to reaffirm that unless it is impossible to avoid such a result the Act should not be made the instrument of recovering payment for a period during which that incapacity had ceased, which incapacity was the fundamental reason and condition upon which compensation was given.

I refrain from citing at length the decisions upon these points under the Act of 1906. These decisions mark the stages of (1) ending compensation only from the date of an arbitrative award and (2) from the date of beginning the proceedings of the arbitration. These decisions were dealt with in the case of Gibson and Co. v. Wishart (30 The Times L.R., 540; [1915] A.C., 18), and (3) the final stage was reached and it was definitely decided that when incapacity ceased the period of liability in compensation under the statute ceased.

There can be no dubiety as to the pronouncements made in that case. Said Lord Haldane, "I do not see how" (it being an application for review), "this being a judicial review of the state of health subsequent to the previous decision, and the result of that decision having been limited to the period of incapacity, the workman can claim that payments should be made to him after he must be taken to have ceased to be incapable."

Lord Atkinson puts the matter thus: "For myself I may say that I utterly fail to see upon what principle of justice a workman is, under a decision awarding to him weekly payments during his incapacity, entitled to receive a single payment after his incapacity has ceased, or that when proceedings for review have been properly instituted the employer is not entitled to have the weekly payments ended from the time the incapacity is proved to have ended."

And, if I may be allowed to quote my own judgment: "In Scotland the effect of the recording of the award—an effect making it by the Act 'enforceable' as a decree arbitral—appears to some extent to have been emphasized at the expense of the consideration that the weekly payment was to be made during the continuance of the incapacity." I added this further general observation, to which, after all the experience of these years, I still venture to adhere, "I humbly look upon all the provisions as to procedure for review of the award to be provisions to enable Courts and arbitrators to get back to that cardinal point, to prevent compensation during incapacity being turned into compensation during capacity, and so to readjust awards of total or partial incapacity as to square with the facts."

The question in the present appeal is whether the employer—for it is simplified down to that—has been made liable not only for compensation during the workman's incapacity but, in addition, for compensation during a period of capacity. It is admitted in this case that on September 3, 1925, when the compensation was stopped, the nystagmus had gone and the workman's capacity for all his ordinary work had returned. In my opinion, the Legislature in the Act of 1923 did not intend that compensation should be so continued.

What happened in point of procedure has been seen. The payment is stopped, say, on September 10. Eleven days thereafter the application for review is made; and, before it is heard, it is admitted to be the fact that the incapacity had gone when the payment was stopped. The solicitors' letter raises the point for determination: "You are not entitled to stop his compensation until an order of the Court is actually obtained."

This point depends upon the construction of section 14, which provides that "an employer shall not be entitled otherwise than in pursuance of an agreement or arbitration to end . . . a weekly payment," except in three cases which follow; namely, (1) where the workman returns to work; (2) where his weekly earnings have actually increased; and (3) where a medical man has certified recovery. It is provided that in the last case, if there be a conflict between the medical men employed by the parties respectively, a medical referee should be brought in and, pending the settlement of the dispute, the weekly payments unpaid shall be paid into Court.

There is a last proviso, which is not unimportant, to the following effect: "Nothing in this section shall be construed as authorizing an employer to end or diminish a weekly payment in any case in which, or to the extent to which, apart from this section, he would not be entitled to do so." The assumption of that subsection is that there are cases, apart from the section altogether, where the employer would be entitled to end the payments.

The present is not one of the three cases specified in section 14. If it had been a medical reference case, the employer's rights would have been safeguarded, as well as those of the workman, by a payment into Court, and in the result, to use my own language, the payment would have been made to square with the incapacity. The disability of section 14, that an employer shall not be entitled, "otherwise than in pursuance of an agreement or arbitration," to end the payment, seems to me to point clearly to the fact that he is entitled in pursuance of an arbitration to do so. For that reason no doubt, when it was clear that an agreement was not to be come to, a request for an arbitration for review was properly made.

But, says the respondent, he could only be entitled to end payments of compensation "in pursuance of an arbitration," and "in pursuance of an arbitration" means that the arbitration must have been begun, continued, and ended before the compensation could be stopped. Therefore, proceeds the workman, the injustice so clearly pointed out in Gibson and Co. v. Wishart (supra), of compensation being paid for a period of incapacity, must be an injustice now legalized by statute.

My Lords, I cannot acquiesce in this reasoning. I think it involves a strain upon the words "in pursuance." I think those words mean simply that when an arbitration takes place the ending of payment must be in accordance with it and with the arbitrator's determination of the date when incapacity ceased. We shall assume that in the present case the unfounded contention on the facts had been persisted in, and at the end, it may be, of protracted proceedings lasting for months, the arbitrator concluded his review of all the facts by affirming that the man had completely recovered on September 3, 1925. My construction of the words "in pursuance of an arbitration," is that, when once the arbitrator determined that fact, then liability under the principal Act, that of 1906, evaporated.

It is quite manifest also from the illustration just given that if this were not so the workman might be in receipt of compensation during long periods of incapacity, and he would have managed to secure these essentially improper allowances by the simple device of denying patent facts and causing great delay till they were proved. It must be finally noted that, when the arbitration is entered upon, it is open to, and indeed the duty of, the arbitrator to say when the workman's incapacity ceased. After that, the statute fits the compensation to that fact. There is nothing in the Act of 1923 which disables an arbitrator from finding out the truth and stating it on this point, nor do I read the Act, which is said to have been passed in contemplation of Gibson and Co. v. Wishart (supra), as going a single step in the direction of using language from which it would be clear that not until an arbitration came to a close could the anomaly of paying compensation to a completely recovered workman come to an end. If words to that effect had been used it might, of course, be a question whether the proposers of a measure plainly showing that could have secured its passage. With that, however, we have here nothing to to. The case manifestly was one which demanded, if the view taken by the Court below is right, in clear and unambiguous words an extension of compensation to cases where the reason for it had disappeared. I think there are no such words.

Two of the learned Judges held that the decision of Davies v. Glyncorrwg Colliery Company ([1925] 2 K.B., 339) was one to which they must bow as substantially deciding the point. Frankly, I think it did. Lord Justice Scrutton did not think so, but formulated opinions which are in accord with the judgments now delivered in this House. In accordance with these opinions, the case of Davies (supra) and recent Scotch cases in a similar sense must be held to have been wrongly decided. I am humbly of opinion that this appeal must be sustained.

Lord Wrenbury.—My Lords: In this case the workman began to suffer from miner's nystagmus on October 17, 1923. By agreement the appellants made him a weekly payment from October 17, 1923, until September 3, 1925, by way of compensation for the incapacity.

On September 3, 1925, the appellants stopped the weekly payment, and on September 21 served on the respondent an application for arbitration under the Act, asking for termination of the weekly payment as from September 3 on the footing that at that date he had completely recovered. The respondent, by answer on October 13, 1925, contended that he was still incapacitated, but on October 24, before the arbitration came on for hearing, his solicitors wrote to the appellants' solicitors a letter saying, "You may take this letter as an admission that our client is no longer suffering from nystagmus." It was admitted further before the County Court Judge that on September 3 also the respondent had recovered.

The respondent contends that nevertheless the appellants were not entitled to stop his compensation until an order of the Court was actually obtained. The arbitration took place on October 27, 1925. The Judge held that payment was due until October 27, 1925—the date of the order. The Court of Appeal dismissed the employers' appeal.

The question turns upon section 14 of the Act of 1923. It is undoubtedly a very difficult section, but it is much easier to arrive at its true meaning if two points are borne in mind—viz., (1) that the basis of the workman's claim is found in Schedule I. (1) (b) to the Act of 1906, in the words "a weekly payment during the incapacity," and (2) that payment de facto and liability to make payment are distinct things.

As regards the former there is nowhere to be found in the Act of 1906 or the amending Acts anything to control that phrase "a weekly payment during the incapacity." Wherever I find subsequently in the Acts the words "weekly payment" I am entitled to supply the words "during the incapacity" as if they were there repeated. If the matter goes to arbitration, the arbitrator can give no more than a weekly payment during the incapacity. He cannot award a payment to be made after incapacity has ceased. At the moment at which incapacity ceases the weekly payment which he has awarded ipso facto comes to an end. There is no adjudication of any payment due in respect of the next week. The arbitrator has no power to award any payment for that week. He cannot by his award create a debt for a weekly payment to be made after incapacity ceased.

As regards the latter a statutory provision that the employer shall not be entitled to end or diminish a weekly payment is a provision that the employer shall de facto continue to pay but not necessarily that his liability to pay is thereby enlarged. It may be nothing more than an enactment that until the question whether his liability to pay is a continuing liability or not is decided he shall go on paying de facto, and that if it shall be decided that he was not under a continuing liability he shall be left entitled to recover. In my opinion, this is the effect of the section.

I may draw attention in the first instance to an extraordinary result that would ensue in one case mentioned in section 14 if this is not the effect. Assume that the workman has entirely recovered and has "actually returned to work," the employer may stop payment, section 14 (a). Suppose, however, that he does not return to work, but (although he is perfectly capable of work) he ostentatiously announces that he is not going to work, that he prefers to be idle and to draw his weekly payment. It follows, if the respondent's contention is right, that the employer would be compelled to go on paying until an arbitration which might not be completed for weeks or months had resulted in an order, and could not even then recover the payments which de facto he had continued to make.

The opinion which I hold in the case of Niddrie

and Benhar Coal Company v. Dee, about to be delivered, goes a long way towards the decision which must be reached in the present case. It will repay investigation if the alternative of a medical referee under section 14 (c) is further considered upon the lines on which I have discussed it in that case. Assume that the employer has opened the ball by serving on the workman a notice of his intention to end the weekly payment; the first possible event is that the workman takes no action. In that case the employer can stop payment at the end of the ten days. The second possible event is that the workman within the ten days sends to the employer a medical report that he has not recovered or has only partially recovered. In that case the employer can only end or diminish the weekly payment in accordance with the report which the workman has obtained or such modification as the employer can obtain from a medical referee in pursuance of rule (15) of Schedule I. to the Act of 1906. But here again two alternatives arise. The matter may (a) go on as a medical reference, or (b) it may not. The Court may, under section 11 (1) of the Act of 1923, send the matter to arbitration and refuse to allow the medical reference if it finds exceptional difficulty or other sufficient reason for doing so. In case (a) certainly, and, as I think, in case (b) also, the employer may pay into Court instead of paying the workman, but only in case (a) does the Act provide that the money in Court shall be paid out to the winning party. Here, then, are only two possible views. The first is that in case (b) the employer cannot pay into Court but must continue to pay the workman. The second is that, although he can pay into Court, the money in any event must be paid out ultimately to the workman because there is nothing to intercept the veto in the opening words of section 14 of the Act of 1923 about ending or diminishing the weekly payment. My Lords, a construction of the section which leads to that result is, in my opinion, impossible. It cannot be that in one event the employer is and in the other is not entitled to be relieved of liability as from the date when incapacity ceases.

All these difficulties disappear if the two points which I stated at the outset are well founded and are observed. Read section 14 as follows: "An employer shall not be entitled otherwise than in pursuance of an agreement or arbitration to end or diminish de facto a weekly payment during the incapacity under the principal Act except, &c." If that is the meaning it leaves the right de jure unaffected. It decides nothing as to whether the payment "during the incapacity" is due de jure or not. It creates in the employer an obligation to pay de facto whether he is de jure liable or not until the liability de jure is determined. This is, of course, a new enactment in favour of the workman, but is not an enactment that, if on the result of an application to recover it is decided that the incapacity had ceased at the date at which the employer alleged that it had ceased, then the award on the original application which could only be an award of payment during the incapacity is extended to an award of payment in respect of a subsequent week when there was no incapacity.

We heard much during the argument of the words "otherwise than in pursuance of an agreement or arbitration." They do not, to my mind, assist the matter much one way or the other. They only provide that the veto upon the discontinuance of payment may be lifted in pursuance of an agreement or by the action of an arbitration.

In Gibson and Co. v. Wishart (30 The Times L.R., 540; [1915] A.C., 18) this House in 1914 decided that if an employer has de facto ceased to pay at a date which he alleged to be and which was subsequently found to be the date of recovery, the arbitrator can, on an application to review, terminate the weekly payments retrospectively as at the date of recovery. I find nothing in the Act of 1923 which affects that decision.

Section 14 of the Act of 1923 does no more, I think, than provide in favour of the workman that in some cases he shall continue to receive de facto the weekly payment which (if the employer is right) ceased to be payable under the agreement or award when the condition imposed by the words "during the incapacity" was no longer satisfied. It fails to work this out properly in the several events which it mentions. But it remains that it has not granted to the workman a weekly payment after incapacity ceased. When the question at issue—viz., has incapacity ceased or not and when?—has been answered it leaves untouched the rights of the parties to have any payments made de facto readjusted in accordance with the payments which were payable de jure. This is, in my opinion, the true construction of the section.

For these reasons this appeal, in my judgment, succeeds, and the matter must be referred back and an award made terminating the weekly payment as and from September 3, 1925, and ordering repayment of any weekly payments made since that date. The appellants must have their costs in the County Court and in the Court of Appeal and in this House.

Lord Carson.—My Lords: I am conscious of the fact that whatever decision is arrived at can be easily criticized as creating anomalies, but that is due to the difficulties created by the terms of section 14 of the Act of 1923. I think it is worth while to glance at the preliminary proceedings before the County Court Judge in the matter of the arbitration which led to the order appealed against. The request for arbitration is in the usual form with respect to the review and termination of the weekly payment payable to the respondent under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, and on the particulars the grounds on which determination is claimed are stated to be "(i) That the respondent on September 3, 1925, had recovered from his said nystagmus; (ii) that the respondent has not since September 3, 1925, been incapacitated by reason of his said nystagmus from performing his ordinary work at his ordinary rates of wages"; and the answer of the respondent was that the applicants were not entitled to the relief sought, and that the grounds of his contention were that he had not recovered as alleged in the applicants' particulars. The only issue therefore raised to be determined in the arbitration was whether the respondent had or had not recovered as alleged. This was all strictly in accordance with the provision of the Act of 1906 and the rules made thereunder from which alone the County Court Judge derived jurisdiction. By the admission of the respondent, as found by the County Court Judge, the issue was found in favour of the appellants, but the County Court Judge, notwithstanding, by his award dated October 27, 1925, ordered the appellants to pay "the weekly sum of £1 as compensation for personal injury caused to the respondent by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment" from September 3, 1925, up to October 27, 1925, the day on which he gave his award.

The very terms of the award are self-contradictory, as whatever may be the construction of section 14 of the Act of 1923 it is impossible to describe the payments ordered as "compensation for personal injury," where admittedly the respondent had recovered on September 3, 1925. From what statute did the arbitrator derive authority to give such "compensation" under such circumstances? The only Act granting compensation—viz., the Act of 1906—specifically limits the weekly payments to the duration of incapacity and makes no provision for any payments to be made after incapacity has ceased. We are therefore up against the question whether upon the true construction of section 14 of the Act power is conferred upon the arbitrator in such a proceeding as that under review, having determined that upon a certain date incapacity had ceased, to order payment of compensation, not on the ground of "incapacity," but notwithstanding the complete and admitted recovery of the respondent. My Lords, I can find nothing in section 14 of the Act of 1923 enlarging by inference the power of the arbitrator, nor indeed in any wise altering or changing the power of the arbitrator or the object or result of the proceedings in such arbitration. It is said that unless you so construe section 14 of the said Act you give no meaning to it, but on the other hand one can hardly conceive that, if the basis of compensation for incapacity was intended to be altered by the Legislature, so drastic a change would have been carried out by asking the Courts to draw such an inference from the terms of the said section. My Lords, I am of opinion that section 14 has nothing to do with the arbitrator at all. I think it is an enactment that, pending an agreement or an arbitration, an employer is not entitled to end weekly payments under the Act of 1906, and probably if the employer, contrary to the section, did end such payments, the workman would be entitled to put the law in motion to recover such payments, and the Courts would have power to insist upon such payments, either to the workman or, if the interests of justice so required, into Court pending the determination of the arbitration. But I cannot understand how such payments are to be considered as compensation for incapacity, or confer any right upon the workman to retain them when once it has been decided that the payments were made after the incapacity had ceased. Lord Wrenbury has already pointed out some of the extraordinary results that would follow upon any other construction than that which I have indicated. May I also add one other—viz., that if the contention of the respondent was allowed to prevail the liability of the employer would depend, not on the duration of the incapacity, but on the length of time that elapsed in carrying out the necessary proceedings for the determination of the arbitration, a matter which might be considerably protracted through various causes over which the employer would have no control?

My Lords, as I indicated at the outset, I do not for a moment profess that I am entirely satisfied with the conclusion at which I have arrived, but, in the absence of clear statutory enactment, I am unable to find any reasons for enlarging the periods of payment of compensation beyond the date when incapacity has ceased. I am of opinion, therefore, that this appeal succeeds.

MARTIN v. LOWRY.

SAME v. INLAND REVENUE COMMISSIONERS.*

Revenue — Income-tax — Profits of trade—Gigantic deal in linen—Completion of transaction within a year—"Annual" profits—Income Tax Act, 1918 (8 and 9 Geo. V., c. 40), Schedule D, Cases I. and VI.

The appellant, who was an agricultural machinery merchant, bought a gigantic consignment of linen and set to work to make people buy it, and he succeeded in selling it within a year by organizing a vast activity for that purpose. He was assessed to income-tax under Schedule D on his profits on the sale of the linen, and on appeal to the Special Commissioners he contended that he did not carry on any trade in connexion with linen, that the transaction was an isolated one, and that the profit was not an annual profit chargeable to income-tax. The Special Commissioners held that in exercising these activities the appellant was for the time being carrying on a trade the profits of which were chargeable to income-tax.

Held, that there was evidence on which the Special Commissioners could find the transaction to be in the nature of a trade, and that the fact of the profits being the income of a trade and belonging to the year of assessment was enough to make the profits "annual" within Case VI. of Schedule D, and the decision of the Special Commissioners must be affirmed.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (42 The Times L.R., 233; [1926] 1 K.B., 550) affirmed.

These were appeals from a decision of the Court of Appeal (42 The Times L.R., 233; [1926] 1 K.B., 550) affirming a decision of Mr. Justice Rowlatt (41 The Times L.R., 574) on a case stated by the Special Commissioners of Income Tax.

The appellant, who was an agricultural machinery merchant, bought a gigantic consignment of unbleached linen, which had been acquired by the Government for aeroplanes, and he succeeded in selling it within six months from the date of his purchase by organizing a vast activity for that purpose. He was assessed to income-tax under Schedule D, and to excess profits duty in respect of his profits on the sale of the linen.

On appeal to the Special Commissioners he contended that he did not carry on any trade in connexion with linen; that the transaction was an isolated speculation; and that the profits were not annual profits chargeable to income-tax.

The Special Commissioners held that, in exercising those activities, the appellant was for the time being carrying on a trade the profits of which were chargeable to income-tax and to excess profits duty.

Mr. Justice Rowlatt held that there was evidence upon which the Special Commissioners could find the transaction to be in the nature of a trade, and that the fact of the profits being the income of a trade and belonging to the year of assessment was enough to make the profits "annual" within Case VI. of Schedule D. He therefore affirmed the determination of the Special Commissioners.

* Reported by H. B. Hemming, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The Court of Appeal (the Master of the Rolls, Lord Justice Atkin, and Lord Justice Sargant) affirmed the decision of Mr. Justice Rowlatt.

Mr. Latter, K.C., and Mr. R. W. Needham appeared for the appellant; the Attorney-General (Sir Douglas Hogg, K.C.) and Mr. R. P. Hills, for the Crown, were not called upon to argue.

The Lord Chancellor.—My Lords: It is unnecessary to state all the facts of this extraordinary transaction, which are set out in the case stated by the Special Commissioners for the opinion of the High Court. It is enough to read the finding with which the case concludes, and which is in these terms: "Mr. Martin"—that is, the appellant, who is not usually engaged in the purchase or sale of linen—"purchased a large quantity of linen with the sole intention of selling it again at a profit, and he proceeded to sell it piecemeal by an extensive series of transactions spread over a period of seven months, using for the purpose an organization and methods such as are ordinarily adopted by traders in selling the articles in which they deal. We consider that in exercising these activities Mr. Martin was for the time being carrying on a trade, the profits of which are chargeable to income-tax and excess profits duty." By means of the transactions so described the appellant made a profit of something like £1,600.000, and upon that sum he has been held assessable to income-tax and excess profits duty. The question is whether he was rightly so held, and, if not, why not?

Counsel for the appellant have taken two points. First, they say that the appellant did not carry on a trade or business, but only engaged in a single adventure not involving trading operations. My Lords, the Special Commissioners have found as a fact that he did carry on a trade, and they set out in the case ample material upon which they could come to that conclusion. Indeed, having regard to the methods adopted for the resale of the linen, to the number of operations into which the appellant entered, and to the time occupied by the resale, I do not myself see how they could have come to any other conclusion. That disposes of the appeal as to excess profits duty, which therefore fails.

With regard to the claim for income-tax, the appellant takes another point. He says that at all events these profits did not come within the description of "annual profits or gains" arising or accruing in respect of a trade—those words being quoted from the first paragraph under Schedule D to the Income Tax Act, 1918. He says they did not come within those words because they were not recurrent profits or capable of recurrence from year to year. My Lords, there are, no doubt, passages in the Act in which the word "annual" or the word "yearly" has an implication of recurrence; but one must have regard to the context in which the words are found, and, having regard to the context, I do not think that there is any such implication in the words "annual profits or gains" as applying to the profits or gains arising in respect of a trade which are taxable under Schedule D of the Act. It appears to me that in that context the words bear the construction put upon them by Mr. Justice Rowlatt in the case of Ryall v. Hoare (39 The Times L.R., 475; [1923] 2 K.B., 447), where he said that the words meant "profits or gains in any one year or in any year as the succession of years comes round." He pointed out that in fact the tax is imposed for one year only, and, having regard to that fact and to the context which accompanies the particular words which he was called upon to construe, he held that those words meant simply the profits or gains accruing in the year in question. I agree with that interpretation as applied to this case, and accordingly I think that the profits which are now in question come within the words of charge, and that this appeal fails. I move your Lordships that it be dismissed with costs.

Lord Atkinson.—My Lords: I concur.

Lord Shaw of Dunfermline.—My Lords: I agree.

Lord Sumner.—My Lords: I agree that there was abundance of evidence to justify the Special Commissioners in holding that the appellant carried on a trade.

With regard to the argument raised on the word "annual," I would point out that the nature of the trade, as described in the case stated, was such as to show that there was at the outset every possibility of repeated trading operations and a considerable chance of their lasting over a protracted period, and I do not question that the word "annual," in connexion with the profits of that trade, would be satisfied by there being profits falling within the year of charge, upon which the system of the Income Tax Acts is based.

In so far as the judgment of Mr. Justice Rowlatt in Ryall v. Hoare (39 The Times L.R., 475; [1923] 2 K.B., 447) decided a similar point, as I think it did, I concur in his conclusion. In that case it is clear that the profits in question, whatever their other qualities may have been, had the quality of being repeated and of continuing over a considerable period; but I wish to guard myself against appearing to agree with all his instances and observations as reported in 8 Tax Cases, 521. I understand that your Lordships, like the Lords Justices in the Court of Appeal, affirm his decision only in regard to the exact question arising in that case and not in the full breadth of the illustrations that he gave. I would point out that the case on which he relied, which is Wylie v. Eccott ([1913] S.C., 16), was a case in which liability to the tax in respect of the letting of a furnished house was admitted, and the question in dispute was as to the right to a deduction. Accordingly, it is not authority, as the learned Judge would appear to have thought that it was, for some of the more extended cases that he mentioned. The whole subject is a difficult one, and as I hope some time, and perhaps before long, your Lordships may have the opportunity of considering it in full detail, I make no further observation about it, except that I should wish to reserve my judgment very fully on every aspect of it that goes beyond the facts of this particular case.

Lord Carson:—My Lords: I also concur with the motion which has been moved from the Woolsack, and I should like to limit the decision as regards Ryall v. Hoare (39 The Times L.R., 475; [1923] 2 K.B., 447) to what is necessary to be decided in this case. The learned Judge who decided that case introduced instances, where he thought income-tax would be payable, where there was in reality no trade being carried on and where it could hardly be alleged that trade was being carried on, they being isolated transactions. My Lords, I desire, like my noble friend who has preceded me, to reserve my opinion upon that subject if it ever becomes necessary to decide it.

THE STIKLESTAD.*

Ship—Salvage—Services rendered by request—No actual benefit resulting therefrom—Award—S.O.S. calls for assistance.

Wireless signals for assistance made by the defendants' steamship were picked up by the plaintiffs' steamship, which was then asked by wireless to give towage services for a daily rate of remuneration. The plaintiffs declined to assist except on a salvage basis, and finally the defendants' steamship wirelessed "Accept your offer for assistance." Thereupon the plaintiffs' steamship steamed some 120 miles to the defendants' steamship, deviating for the purpose from her own course, but, although she was after a time able to make fast, the tow-ropes soon parted, and the plaintiffs' vessel resumed her voyage by mutual arrangement without having rendered any really beneficial service. Subsequently the defendants' ship was towed into port by other salvors.

Held, that although merely responding to an S.O.S. call for assistance would not of itself necessarily give a claim to salvage remuneration, yet where a ship was definitely requested by wireless to come to the aid of a disabled vessel and do what she could to assist her, and she did go to the assistance of the disabled vessel, she was entitled to a salvage award, even although, as events turned out, she was not able to confer much, if any, benefit.

Decision of Bateson, J. (42 The Times L.R., 720 ; [1926] P., 205), affirmed.

This was an appeal by the owners of the Norwegian steamship Stiklestad from the decision of Mr. Justice Bateson (42 The Times L.R., 720 ; [1926] P., 205), in an action brought for salvage remuneration for services rendered to the Stiklestad.

Consolidated actions were brought by the owners, masters, and crews of the Dutch steam tug Zwarte Zee, the Norwegian steamships Dampfem and Flint, and the British steamship Geraldine Mary to recover salvage for services rendered to the steamship Stiklestad, of Oslo.

On October 3, 1925, the Stiklestad, a vessel of 6,350 tons, while bound from Rotterdam to Wabana, Newfoundland, in ballast, broke down in mid-Atlantic through injury to her propeller. Being fitted with wireless, she was able to communicate her position, and her owners made every effort to send out assistance. The Reindeer, a salvage steamer, was dispatched from St. John's, Newfoundland, but after several attempts to reach the disabled ship she was forced to return to port, damaged by the terrific gales which at that time prevailed, and which caused so many casualties among shipping. Vessels which were known to be passing through that part of the Atlantic were specially requested by wireless to keep a look-out for the Stiklestad, and on October 20 the Dempfem, which was bound from Rotterdam to Wabana, picked up the Stiklestad. On the following day, however, owing to the weather, she was forced to proceed on her voyage without having succeeded in taking the Stiklestad in tow.

On October 22 the Geraldine Mary fell in with the Stiklestad, which, being quite helpless and at the mercy of wind and current, was drifting more or less in a circle. The weather was still bad, and the Geraldine Mary was unable for several days to establish connexion. She stood by, and eventually succeeded in passing a tow-rope and making fast. On October 29, however, the tow-rope parted, and the Geraldine Mary resumed her voyage. By that time the Stiklestad was running short of provisions.

On October 30 the steamship Vittorio Emmanuel fell in with the Stiklestad, but left on the 31st, after trying, unsuccessfully, to supply the Stiklestad with provisions. Meanwhile, the owners of the Stiklestad had made arrangements for an American salvage steamship, the Relief, to be sent out, and on November 3 the Relief reached the Stiklestad and took her in tow for the Azores. The Flint, which came up shortly afterwards, kept the vessels company, by request, for several days.

Messrs. L. Smit and Co., of Rotterdam, although aware of the arrangements made to send out the Relief, and of the possibility that at any moment the Stiklestad might be picked up by some other vessel, dispatched their tug Zwarte Zee, a vessel of 600 tons gross, a distance of over 1,000 miles to the assistance of the Stiklestad. They had been asked to quote terms, but preferred to perform the service on a "no cure no pay" basis. While the Zwarte Zee was on her way, and still a long distance from the disabled vessel, information was received by wireless that the Relief had the Stiklestad in tow. Nevertheless, the Zwarte Zee was instructed to proceed. On November 5 the tow-rope connecting the Relief to the Stiklestad broke, and the vessels did not get connected again until the 8th. On November 9 the Zwarte Zee, which had been delayed by head gales, reached the Stiklestad and also made fast. By this time the weather had much improved, and, towed by the Relief and the Zwarte Zee, the Stiklestad arrived safely at the Azores on November 11. The value of the Stiklestad was agreed at £31,000.

Mr. Justice Bateson held that, although merely responding to an S O S call for assistance would not of itself necessarily give a claim to salvage remuneration, yet, where a ship was definitely requested by wireless to go to the aid of a disabled vessel and do what she could to assist her, and she did go to the assistance of the disabled vessel, she was entitled to a salvage award, even though, as events turned out, she was not able to confer much, if any, benefit.

In the result his Lordship awarded £4,000 to the Zwarte Zee, £2,400 to the Geraldine Mary, £800 to the Flint, and £400 to the Dampfem.

The owners of the Stiklestad appealed against so much of his Lordship's judgment as awarded £4,000 to the Zwarte Zee.

* Reported by E. J. M. Chaplin, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Mr. Dunlop, K.C., and Mr. B. B. Stenham appeared for the appellants; Mr. G. P. Langton, K.C., and Mr. H. C. S. Dumas, for the respondents, were not called upon.

Lord Justice Bankes, in giving judgment, said that the rule of that Court was well established that they ought not to interfere with an award made by a Judge in the Court below, even though they thought that the amount was rather more or rather less than they would themselves have given, unless they could come to the conclusion that an obvious mistake had been made—e.g., by taking an exaggerated view of the facts or because there had been a misdirection in law. He thought that it was impossible to say that anything of that kind had happened here. He was of opinion, having read Mr. Justice Bateson's judgment, that that Judge had correctly appreciated all the circumstances; that he had not taken into account matters which he ought not; and that he had considered all the points which had been brought to his attention. The case did not fall within the class of cases in which the Court of Appeal would interfere, and the appeal, therefore, failed, and would be dismissed.

Lord Justice Scrutton and Lord Justice Sargant agreed.

JOE LEE, LIMITED v. LORD DALMENY AND OTHERS.

SAME v. TATTERSALL'S COMMITTEE.*

Gaming—Betting disputes—Agreement to refer to arbitrator—Whether enforceable—Gaming Act, 1845 (8 and 9 Vict., c. 109), s. 18.

Where an agreement to refer betting disputes to a particular arbitrator is an integral part of the bargain by which the bets are made, the agreement to refer is itself a contract by way of gaming or wagering and is unenforceable.

These two actions, which were tried together, were brought by the plaintiffs, Joe Lee, Limited, turf commission agents, of Conduit-street, against Lord Dalmeny and others, forming Tattersall's Committee. The object of the actions was to obtain a decision on what was alleged to be a very serious question of principle with regard to bookmaking generally in this country—namely, whether the committee of Tattersalls were entitled to arrogate to themselves the right to give a decision upon any bet in dispute between bookmakers and their clients that might be brought before them, irrespectively of the consent of both parties, and, without any risk of restraint by the Court, to proceed therein contrary to the wishes of one of the parties or in his absence. The result of a decision given under those conditions, if hostile to the bookmaker, would inevitably result in his being reported to the Jockey Club and in his being warned off the Turf.

* Reported by A. W. Chaster, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The plaintiffs, who were bookmakers, claimed an injunction against Lord Dalmeny and others, forming Tattersall's Committee, to restrain them from adjudicating, without the consent of the plaintiffs, upon disputed debts between the plaintiffs and two of their clients, Mr. F. W. D. Pratt and Mrs. Frances, who had also been made defendants. The plaintiffs' two clients claimed to have won bets from the plaintiffs, and in both instances the plaintiffs disputed liability, and alleged that the bets were made on the basis of a binding contract that any dispute should be referred to an arbitrator by mutual agreement. Pratt referred the dispute to an arbitrator, but the arbitrator did not make an award in Pratt's favour, and Pratt subsequently applied to Tattersall's Committee to adjudicate upon his claim. Tattersall's Committee had, by their rules on betting, authority to settle all questions relating to bets, and to report defaulters to the Jockey Club. The committee summoned the plaintiffs to attend before them, and intimated that in the event of the plaintiffs' non-attendance the committee might proceed to adjudicate in their absence. The plaintiffs then brought the present actions.

Mr. Gover, K.C., and Mr. Herbert Jacobs appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. Geoffrey Lawrence, K.C., and Mr. Wilfrid Hunt for the defendants.

Mr. Gover, in opening the case for the plaintiffs, after stating the question in issue, said that he would ask his Lordship to restrain the defendants from investigating and affecting to adjudicate on the dispute without first obtaining the consent of the person concerned. The effect of an adverse decision followed by a report to the Jockey Club would spell ruin to the bookmakers' business. There were two defendants who had not put in a defence. They were the persons with whom bets were said to have been made.

He then referred to the rules of the club and the committee which appeared in Ruff's "Guide to the Turf." The club was conventionally recognized as the supreme authority on all matters of racing, and therefore those rules were also recognized. He referred to the rules relating to the powers of the stewards and the power to warn off the course. The effect of warning a person off would be to exclude him from all enclosures and betting rings. Advertisements would not be accepted and he would be excluded from sporting clubs.

There were also rules of that club which provided that disputed bets were to be referred to certain members of the committee, and the committee were to adjudicate thereon. By the rules of betting the committee were to have authority to settle disputes and report to the club. The plaintiffs did not see eye to eye with them in those matters. The plaintiffs drew a distinction between betting on the course and betting off the course. As to the first, they thought that there was no more convenient way of dealing with the matter than through Tattersall's Committee. But with regard to the second, they thought that the committee was not entirely a satisfactory tribunal, and that they ought not to be compelled against their will to submit to the committee's decision. In the cases in question in this action there was an express agreement to the contrary if there was a dispute. It was provided that there should be a reference to a particular independent arbitrator. That was done in one of the cases but not in the other.

He submitted, first, that the agreement to refer to a particular arbitrator was perfectly valid ; secondly that, although the Court would not in that or any other case specifically enforce the contract, it would in a proper case restrain a breach of it ; thirdly, that the Court ought to, and would, restrain either party if asked to do so ; fourthly, that as regards Tattersalls, the Court would restrain them from affecting to adjudicate on the matters on two grounds—(a) because their act amounted to a wrongful inducing of another to break his contract ; and (b) because they threatened to combine, or technically to conspire, with the bettors and each other, first to break the contract, and, secondly, to intimidate the plaintiffs into a course of action in reference to their lawful business which they were not bound to adopt. As to the first point, there was nothing illegal in the business of a bookmaker or in making bets. The extent to which the law had interfered was prescribed by statute and went no farther than this, that bets and securities for them could not be enforced and were avoided.

It followed that a contract or agreement such as this, which was collateral, was enforceable. The bets themselves were perfectly lawful. He referred to Goodson v. Grierson (24 The Times L.R., 364 ; [1908] 1 K.B., 761) ; Hyams v. Stuart King (24 The Times L.R., 675 ; [1908] 2 K.B., 696) ; Whiteman v. Newey (28 The Times L.R., 240) ; Hyde v. Tyler (42 The Times L.R., 652) ; Brimelow v. Casson ([1924] 1 Ch., 302). The action of the defendants need not be malicious : South Wales Miners' Federation v. Glamorgan Coal Company (21 The Times L.R., 441 ; [1905] A.C., 239) ; Larkin v. Long (31 The Times L.R., 405 ; [1915] A.C., 814) ; Pratt v. British Medical Association (35 The Times L.R., 14 ; [1919] 1 K.B., 244).

Mr. Lawrence, for the defendants, submitted that the plaintiffs had not made out any case for their right to an injunction. Before dealing with the legal aspect he would state the facts on which he relied in support of that submission. Lord Penrhyn, the chairman of the Jockey Club, and Lord Dalmeny, the chairman of the committee of Tattersalls, were present if it were necessary for him to produce evidence in support of his case.

The Jockey Club did not take any official cognisance of betting disputes, but acted on the report of Tattersall's Committee. They nominated two members of that committee. The Jockey Club was the authority which had governed flat racing in this country since 1750. They owned Newmarket Heath, and no one could attend there who did not agree to be bound by their rules. One of such rules, for instance, was that no horse could be run there which had been run at an unrecognized meeting. That was a perfectly legitimate exercise of a right of property. In pursuance of that position they passed rules made for the purpose of seeing that persons who did not behave properly were not to come on Newmarket Heath.

Tattersall's Committee began in a room which Richard Tattersall used for the purpose of betting in 1795. About the same time a similar room was used at Newmarket. But it was not until 1881 that the Jockey Club, being consulted with reference to the hearing of disputes in the case of non-members, requested the Newmarket Committee to deal with them. In 1896 the same thing was done with reference to Tattersall's Committee. The result was that in 1899 they were amalgamated and became the present committee. They commanded the respect of the racing world and the bookmakers were represented on the committee—at present by Mr. Sloper. They decided a great many disputes—as many as 1,075 in 1925.

Having regard to the attitude of the Legislature towards betting debts, it was essential that there should be one tribunal for questions arising over bets. It would be impracticable for the matters to be referred to particular persons in every case. He referred to Day v. Brownrigg (10 Ch. D., 294) ; North London Railway Company v. Great Northern Railway Company (11 Q.B.D., 30). The defendants were not procuring the plaintiffs to take a course which they ought not to be asked to adopt. Moreover, in each case the contract to refer was not collateral to the bet. It was all one contract and was void under the Gaming Act of 1845 and could not be the subject of litigation. He referred also to Société des Hôtels Réunis v. Hawker (29 The Times L.R., 578). The Courts could not direct the reference to a particular arbitrator (In re Smith and Service (6 The Times L.R., 434 ; 25 Q.B.D., 545)) ; Russell on Arbitration (10 Ed., 323).

Here in one of the cases there was no agreement in writing to refer, and therefore no agreement could be enforced. The contract was void and the plaintiffs' claim should be dismissed.

Mr. Gover replied. The action was not against the Jockey Club, the proprietors of Newmarket Heath, but against Tattersall's Committee, which was another body altogether. The agreement on which the plaintiffs sued was not a betting transaction at all, but something which arose out of such a transaction. There was nothing illegal or voidable in it, Hyde v. Tyler (supra).

Mr. Justice Eve, after stating the facts, said that the first question which arose was whether the agreement to refer disputes to a particular arbitrator was a valid and legal agreement. It had been argued that it must be treated as a separate agreement not tainted with illegality. In his opinion it was not a separate agreement. It was an integral part of the bargain by which the bets were made. The result was that it was a contract by way of gaming or wagering, and was unenforceable. That was, in his view, a short answer to the action.

But even if it were otherwise there would not be a ground for the injunction asked for. On the agreement to refer there could be no claim such as that. It was also said that, even if there was no contract, the plaintiffs were in fact coerced into adopting a course in their business which they ought not to be forced to adopt. That was said to be a sort of conspiracy or combination to inflict damage on the plaintiffs unless they were prepared to submit to the arbitration of the committee. He could not take that view. The committee was the recognized tribunal in those matters, and it was for the plaintiffs to elect, if the customers elected, whether they would submit to that tribunal or whether they would allow it to proceed in their absence. It was impossible for him to hold that there was any attempt on the part of the committee or by the customers to coerce the plaintiffs into a course of conduct which they would not otherwise take. The actions failed and must be dismissed, with costs.

NASH v. GILES.*

Highways — Repair — Two streets repaired together—One apportionment of total cost—Public Health Acts Amendment Act, 1907 (7 Edw. VII., c. 53), s. 19.

Two streets situated at right angles to one another but forming a continuous road surface were repaired by a local authority under s. 19 of the Public Health Acts Amendment Act, 1907. The local authority included the expenses in a single account, and made an apportionment of the total among the frontagers of both streets.

Held, that the apportionment was bad, and the local authority could not recover the amount ascertained by such an apportionment.

This was a case stated by Hampshire justices.

The appellant, Ernest Nash, on behalf of the Fleet Urban District Council (hereinafter called the local authority), preferred a complaint against the respondent, Colonel Frank Lucas Giles, of Thurlston, Victoria Hill-road, in the district of the local authority, for non-payment of the sum of £35 12s. 6d., being expenses incurred by the local authority in repairing Victoria Hill-road, which had been duly demanded from the respondent and not paid by him.

The following facts were admitted or proved :—

(1) On November 17, 1925, it was made to appear to the local authority that Victoria Hill-road, which was not a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large, was in a dangerous condition and in urgent need of repair.

(2) The respondent was the owner of premises known as "Thurlston," which abutted on the said road.

(3) The Public Health Acts Amendment Act, 1907, was in force in the district.

(4) On November 26, 1925, a notice under the Act was duly served upon the respondent requiring him to execute repairs.

(5) The respondent by his solicitor objected that the notice was not in order, as the work required to be done was more than was authorized by the statute.

(6) The respondent did not comply with the notice and the work was done by the local authority.

(7) Certain repairs were necessary to obviate and remove danger to passengers and vehicles in the said road, which was a street within the meaning of the Act.

(8) At the same time the local authority also did repairs to another street called Branksome Wood-road, which ran at right angles to Victoria Hill-road.

(9) The respondent's premises did not front, adjoin, or abut on Branksome Wood-road.

(10) The expense of the repairs to Victoria Hill-road and Branksome Wood-road was included in one account, and no separate account was kept of the expense of the repairs to each of the said roads.

(11) The expense of repairing both the said roads was charged upon the respective owners, including the respondent, in proportion to the extent of their frontages to the said roads.

The appellant contended :—

(a) That the work done was only sufficient to obviate or remove danger to passengers or vehicles.

(b) That the two roads were one continuous surface, and were a continuation of one another and formed one street.

(c) That the two roads were treated in the same manner, that there was very little difference in the condition of the two roads before the works were commenced, and that the cost to the owners, if the expense of each road had been calculated separately, would have been approximately the same to the respective frontagers.

(d) That the local authority were entitled to recover from the respondent his proportionate share of the expenses of the repairs required in order to obviate and remove danger to passengers in Victoria Hill-road.

The respondent contended (inter alia) that the apportionment was absolutely bad and the local authority could not recover any part of the expenses because Victoria Hill-road and Branksome Wood-road were separate streets, and the expense should have been separately apportioned.

The justices upheld this contention of the respondent, and found as a fact that Victoria Hill-road and Branksome Wood-road were two separate streets within the meaning of the Act. They held that separate accounts should have been kept and separate apportionments made, and that consequently the local authority's claim failed altogether.

The Public Health Acts Amendment Act, 1907, section 19, subsection 1, provides : "Where repairs are required in the case of any street, not being a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large, to obviate or remove danger to any passenger or vehicle in the street, the local authority may give notice in writing to the owners of the lands and premises fronting, adjoining, or abutting on the street, and may require the owners to execute, within a time to be specified in the notice, such repairs as are described in the notice."

By subsection 2 : "If, within the time specified in the notice, the repairs described in the notice are not executed, the local authority may execute the repairs, and may recover summarily, as a civil debt, the cost of the repairs so executed from the owners in default, and the amount recoverable from each owner shall be in the proportion which the extent of his lands and premises fronting, adjoining, or abutting on the street, bears to the total extent of all lands and premises so fronting, adjoining, or abutting. . . ."

Mr. G. R. Blanco White appeared for the appellant ; and Mr. W. H. Moresby for the respondent.

The Lord Chief Justice.—I think this is a perfectly clear case. The question arises out of a complaint preferred by the appellant against the respondent under section 19 of the Public Health Acts Amendment Act, 1907. To put the matter shortly, the repairs were required by the local authority to be done to a certain private street. The repairs were not done by the respondent, and the local authority thereupon proceeded to do repairs both to this street and to another street which ran at right angles to it. They did not keep separate accounts of the expenses of the repairs to each of the two streets, but mixed them up in one and the same account, and they called upon the respondent to pay a sum bearing to the total expenses of repairing both streets the same proportion as the extent of his premises fronting, adjoining, or abutting on the one street bore to the total extent of all the lands and premises fronting, adjoining, or abutting on the two streets. The justices dismissed the complaint. It was not so much as suggested that the two roads were identical with regard to the nature of the repairs required to be done to them. The highest at which it was put was that "the two roads were treated in the same manner, and there was very little difference in the condition of the two roads before the works were commenced, and that the cost to the owners, if the expense of each road had been calculated separately, would have been approximately the same to the respective frontagers." That was how the case was presented to the justices, who were in effect told that the calculation of the amount due from the respondent had not been made on the proper basis, but that the sum claimed was approximately that which would be found to be due if the proper calculation were made. The justices upheld the contention of the respondent that the apportionment was bad, as separate accounts were not kept for the two roads. The argument which has been advanced before this Court is that the justices had mixed up in their minds what is required under section 19 of the Public Health Acts Amendment Act, 1907, with the more formal allocation of expenses, which is called an apportionment under section 150 of the Public Health Act, 1875. There is, however, no magic in the word "apportionment." What is referred to in section 19 of the Act of 1907 is a sort of apportionment. How can the proper figure be arrived at except by a sort of apportionment? It may not be the same apportionment as that under section 150 of the Act of 1875. The method may be different, but there must be an apportionment before it can be said that a particular person is liable to pay a particular sum. In the present case a sum was demanded, but that sum was a totally wrong sum arrived at on a wrong basis, because it was arrived at by mixing up the accounts of the two streets. If that method of calculation is right, why stop at two streets? Why not mix up the accounts of the repairs to twenty streets? It is further suggested that the justices, instead of dismissing the only case put before them, should themselves have proceeded by an examination of the local authority's books, with the help of their officers, to arrive at an apportionment on the right basis. The justices, however, were neither asked to do that, nor had they any power to do it. In my view, the justices took the only course that was open to them in dismissing a complaint demanding a sum which never ought to have been demanded, and which was arrived at by a confused and unjustifiable method. The appeal therefore fails.

MR. JUSTICE AVORY.—I am of the same opinion. It is plain that the amount which the local authority sought to recover was not the amount referred to in section 19 (2) of the Public Health Acts Amendment Act, 1907. The amount which the local authority sought to recover was not in the proportion which the frontage of the respondent's premises bore to the total extent of the lands and premises fronting, adjoining, or abutting on Victoria Hill-road, but in the proportion which the frontage of the respondent's premises bore to the total extent of the lands and premises fronting, adjoining, or abutting on Victoria Hill-road and Branksome Wood-road. The justices had no jurisdiction to award the amount which the local authority sought to recover.

I cannot accept the argument of the appellant's counsel that the justices ought not to have dismissed the complaint but ought themselves to have made a proper apportionment. The justices had no power to assess damages as if they were a jury. Their powers were strictly limited by the provisions of the statute: they could only order payment of the sum claimed, if found on the evidence to be payable.

MR. JUSTICE SALTER.—I also agree. The amount which the local authority were entitled to recover was never proved and therefore the claim failed. The amount which the respondent was called upon to pay was arrived at on a wrong basis, because it was partly in respect of the repairs of a road which he was not and could not be called on to repair.

BALMFORTH v. CHADBURN.*

Rag Flock—New cloth—Excess of chlorine—Freedom from impurities — Offence — Rag Flock Act, 1911 (1 and 2 Geo. V., c. 52), s. 1—Rag Flock Regulations, 1912 (S.R. and O., 1912, No. 578), Art. 1.

The test of cleanliness of rag flock, provided by Art. 1 of the Rag Flock Regulations, 1912, is exclusive, and if the permitted amount of chlorine is exceeded an offence is committed whether the rag flock is otherwise pure or not, and whether it is made from new or old material.

This was a case stated by Mr. Horace Marshall, stipendiary police magistrate for the city of Leeds. On March 23, 1926, an information was duly laid by one Arthur Balmforth, of the Public Health Department of the Corporation of the City of Leeds, sanitary inspector (hereinafter called "the appellant"), against William Chadburn and John William Chadburn (hereinafter called "the respondents"), for that the respondents on February 17, 1926, in the city of Leeds, unlawfully did have in their possession for sale certain flock manufactured from rags, which flock did not conform to the standard of cleanliness prescribed by the Minister of Health, namely, to the Rag Flock Regulations, 1912, in that the said flock contained in 100,000 parts 70 parts of soluble chlorine. The information was heard on April 13, 1926, and was dismissed.

At the hearing of the information it was proved or admitted:—

(a) That the appellant was a sanitary inspector of the Leeds Corporation, duly authorized to institute and carry on proceedings herein.

(b) That the respondents jointly carried on the business of manufacturers of rag flock for sale at Tong-road in the city of Leeds.

(c) That on February 17, 1926, the appellant visited the premises of the respondents and took a sample of flock which he divided into two parts and placed in tins, one of which was given to one of the respondents, and the other was forwarded in sealed condition to the city analyst.

* Reported by J. W. HALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

(d) That the rags from which the flock was made consisted of small pieces of new unwashed material, being unused clippings of new cloth.

(e) That upon analysis one portion of the rag flock was found to contain 70 parts of soluble chlorine in every 100,000, and the other portion was found to contain 113 parts of chlorine in 100,000.

(f) That upon analysis the flock was found to be perfectly clean and free from all impurities, and was, in fact, suitable for the purpose for which it was used.

(g) That the chlorine test was not a test as to whether flock was dirty or impure or fit to be used.

(h) That the said test was merely a test as to whether flock, whether new and clean or not, had in fact been washed.

(i) That the additional cost of re-washing new cloth increased the price of flocks from £5 to £7 per ton.

The Rag Flock Act, 1911, provides by section 1 : "(1) It shall not be lawful for any person to sell or have in his possession for sale flock manufactured from rags or to use for the purpose of making any article of upholstery, cushions, or bedding flock manufactured from rags, or to have in his possession flock manufactured from rags intended to be used for any such purpose, unless the flock conforms to such standard of cleanliness as may be prescribed by regulations to be made by the Local Government Board, and, if any person sells or uses or has in his possession flock in contravention of this Act, he shall be liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding in the case of a first offence ten pounds, or in the case of a second or subsequent offence, fifty pounds . . . (4) Where a person is charged with having flock in his possession in contravention of this Act any flock proved in the proceedings to have been found in his possession shall be deemed to be intended for sale or for use in the manufacture of such articles as aforesaid, unless the contrary is proved."

The Rag Flock Regulations, 1912, made under the Rag Flock Act, 1911, provide (inter alia) that it is expedient that the regulations hereinafter set forth be made in relation to flock manufactured from rags :—

Article 1.—"Flock shall be deemed to conform to the standard of cleanliness for the purposes of subsection (1) of section 1 of the Act when the amount of soluble chlorine in the form of chlorides, removed by thorough washing with distilled water at a temperature not exceeding 25 degrees Centigrade from not less than 40 grammes of a well mixed sample of flock, does not exceed 30 parts of chlorine in 100,000 parts of the flock."

Upon these facts it was contended by the respondents :—

(1) That the flock in question, being made from new and uncontaminated material, was not flock manufactured from "rags" and therefore did not come within the Act or regulations.

(2) That at the time of the passing of the Act and regulations the manufacture of flock from new material was unknown to the trade, and that the Act and regulations could not therefore have been intended to apply to such material.

(3) That the Act of 1911 was passed to deal with harmful or contaminated rags, rags worn, soiled, or polluted by human contact or otherwise, and possibly of an infectious nature, and that chlorine (per se) was not injurious or harmful, but that the presence of chlorine in rags of worn clothes, &c., usually denoted the presence of other harmful contamination arising from human contact, urine, or other forms of excretion.

(4) That, whilst the Act of Parliament forbade the possession of flock for sale which did not conform to the standard to be prescribed by regulations, the regulations did not prescribe a standard required in all cases, but merely prescribed one method by which the flock would be "deemed to conform" to that standard.

It was contended by the appellant :—

(1) That the regulations prescribed a definite standard of cleanliness, and that any rag flock which, when subjected to the test specified in the regulations, was found to contain a proportion of chlorine in excess of the proportion specified in the regulations, did not conform to the standard of cleanliness prescribed.

(2) That, although Article 1 of the regulations was worded in positive terms, so as specifically to refer to such flock as "shall be deemed to" conform to the necessary standard of cleanliness, the only reasonable interpretation which could be put on the Act and the regulations was that any flock which on testing showed results inconsistent with the result specified in the regulations did not conform to the standard required by the Act ; that the regulations were the only regulations which had been made by the Government Department under this Act, and the fact that that Department had named only one standard as a test of conformity would appear to justify the assumption that any rag flock other than that which on testing showed a proportion of chlorine not exceeding that stated in the regulations was not to be deemed to conform to the necessary standard of cleanliness.

(3) That the Act and regulations in no way referred to any other test of cleanliness, and that an informant was not entitled to give, nor was a court bound to hear, any evidence relating to any test other than that referred to in the regulations.

(4) That support for the above contentions was contained in the judgments in the case of Cooper v. Swift ([1914] 1 K.B., 253).

The magistrate was of opinion :—

(1) That the decision in Cooper v. Swift (supra), being a decision upon totally different facts and upon a specific construction put upon the word "rags" by the magistrate, namely, that "rags" must be either portions of a garment or some material which has been worn or used by a human being or animal, or portions of a material which after being detached have been used in that way, was not a decision binding in this case ; and that the said decision must be confined to a state of similar facts where actual pollution was shown on analysis. In that case Mr. Justice Avory said : "In my opinion an offence is proved to have been committed when it is shown that the flock has been manufactured from rags which are in that state of pollution, however caused, that they do not conform to the standard of cleanliness prescribed by the regulations."

(2) That where pollution was shown to exist the Act and regulations, reasonably construed, were wide enough to secure a conviction, but that the regulations did not purport and were not expressed to give an exclusive definition of the standard of cleanliness enacted, but were expressed to define a standard of cleanliness by washing only.

(3) That the words in Article 1 of the regulations : "Flock shall be deemed to conform to the standard of cleanliness for the purposes . . . of the Act when the amount of soluble chlorine removed by thorough washing . . . does not exceed 30 parts . . .

in 100,000" could not logically be read to mean: "No flock shall be deemed to conform to such standard when the chlorine removed by washing exceeds 30 parts in 100,000," and that a legal construction could not be based upon a logical fallacy.

(4) That, if the regulations had been intended to set up the washing test as the exclusive test of cleanliness, clear words to that effect would have been adopted.

(5) That the Act and regulations, being penal, must be construed strictly and reasonably, and that the construction sought to be placed upon them by the appellant was neither reasonable nor strict.

(6) That, whether the word "rag" could or could not include pieces of new clean material clipped from bulk, the regulations were not intended or expressed to apply to material which, being found clean on analysis, did not require washing.

The magistrate dismissed the information accordingly.

The question for the opinion of the Court was whether the magistrate was right in law in so doing.

Mr. Mortimer, K.C., and Mr. Oldroyd appeared for the appellant; Mr. Arthur Morley for the respondents.

The Lord Chief Justice.—This is a very clear case. It is not necessary to repeat the facts. If one looks at Article 1 of the Rag Flock Regulations, 1912, the mere form of it might suggest, apart from anything else, that one standard was being laid down, but Article 1 must be read closely in connexion with the section of the Act under which it is made. By section 1, subsection (1), of the Rag Flock Act, 1911, it is provided: "It shall not be lawful for any person to sell or have in his possession for sale flock manufactured from rags or to use for the purpose of making any article of upholstery, cushions, or bedding flock manufactured from rags or to have in his possession flock manufactured from rags intended to be used for any such purpose, unless the flock conforms to such standard of cleanliness as may be prescribed by regulations to be made by the Local Government Board. . . ." What, then, is the standard of cleanliness and what is conformity? Article 1 of the Rag Flock Regulations says: "Flock shall be deemed to conform to the standard of cleanliness for the purposes of subsection (1) of section 1 of the Act when the amount of soluble chlorine in the form of chlorides, removed by thorough washing with distilled water at a temperature not exceeding 25 degrees Centigrade from not less than 40 grammes of a well-mixed sample of flock, does not exceed 30 parts of chlorine in 100,000 parts of flock." That article, being read with the section, clearly means that flock shall be deemed to conform to the standard only when this test is satisfied. The finding of the learned stipendiary appears clearly to be in conflict with the decision of this Court in Cooper v. Swift ([1914] 1 K.B., 253). I think it is clear that the learned stipendiary magistrate misdirected himself in this case, and that this appeal ought to be allowed.

Mr. Justice Avory.—I agree, and I only wish to add that, as it appears that some words used by me at the conclusion of my judgment in Cooper v. Swift ([1914] 1 K.B., 253) have misled the learned stipendiary magistrate in this case, it is well that I should explain my meaning. I said in my judgment: "An offence is proved to have been committed when it is shown that the flock has been manufactured from rags which are in that state of pollution, however caused, that they do not conform to the standard of cleanliness prescribed by the regulations." I was not there referring to any active pollution of the material which had taken place, but I was using the expression only to describe the condition, and it would be better perhaps if I had used the words "rags which are in that condition, however caused, that they do not conform to the standard of cleanliness prescribed by the regulation." I observe with some satisfaction that my brother Atkin, now Lord Justice Atkin, in his judgment also used the expression "the degree of pollution" in the material; so that, if I was in error, it is some satisfaction to find that he fell into the same error.

Mr. Justice Salter.—I agree.

WESTMINSTER BANK, LIMITED v. HILTON.*

Bankers—Negligence—Cheque—Directions by customer to stop payment—Wrong number mentioned — Other particulars correct — Cheque honoured by bank.

The plaintiff, who had an account with the defendant bank, on July 31, 1924, drew a cheque, No. 117285, and post-dated it August 2. On August 1 he telegraphed to the defendants to stop payment of cheque No. 117283, mentioning the payee and the amount. These particulars were correct as to cheque No. 117285, but the number of the cheque was wrong. Cheque No. 117285 was presented on August 6, and the bank officials paid it, supposing that it had been drawn in place of the one that had been stopped. In an action for negligence,

Held, that as the one certain item of identification was the number the bank was not guilty of negligence, and the action failed.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (42 The Times L.R., 423) reversed.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal (42 The Times L.R., 423) reversing a judgment of Mr. Justice Horridge.

The action was brought by the respondent against the appellants, the Westminster Bank, Limited, to recover damages for breach of duty and negligence as bankers in paying a cheque drawn by him upon the Tottenham branch of the bank in favour of John Poate, and for refusing to pay a cheque which he drew in favour of J. Newman.

In March, 1921, the respondent, a turf commission agent, then residing at No. 45, Morrison-avenue, Stamford Hill, opened an account with the Tottenham branch of the appellant bank.

From May 4, 1923, to February 5, 1924, the respondent did not operate on that account, and the balance standing to the credit of the respondent was 8s. 2d. By August, 1924, he had begun again to operate on the current account, but he had, to the knowledge of the appellants, ceased to reside at

* Reported by H. B. Hemming, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

No. 45, Morrison-avenue, and had not furnished any other address to the appellants. On July 31, 1924, the respondent drew a cheque in favour of one John Poate, numbered 117285, for the sum of £8 1s. 6d., which was post-dated August 2, 1924. On August 1, 1924, the appellants received from the respondent a registered letter giving no address, but enclosing £8 in cash for the credit of the said account, and later on the same day a telegram in the following terms :— "Stop payment of cheque 117283 amount of £8 1s. 6d. to Poate.—STANLEY HILTON." The telegram did not give the date of the cheque. On receipt of that telegram the cashier, Fuller, following the usual practice in such circumstances, entered upon the stop card kept for the purpose the fact that the appellants were required by the respondent to stop payment of cheque 117283 for £8 1s. 6d. payable to Poate. Further, the ledger clerk made a note to the same effect on a red slip ticket which was kept in the ledger.

On August 2, 1924, the respondent rang up the branch on the telephone and had a conversation with the cashier Fuller, which the Judge at the trial found as a fact to have been in the following terms :— The respondent said, "Did you get my remittance of £8 ?" Fuller said, "Yes." The respondent said, "Did you get my wire stopping the cheque to Poate for £8 1s. 6d. ?" Fuller said, "Yes," and volunteered, "it has not been presented yet." The respondent said, "That is all right," and added either, "It is due for presentment to-day," or else, "It is not presentable till this morning." Fuller said, "All right," and the respondent said, "Then it will be stopped when it comes in," and Fuller said, "Yes." Neither the actual date of the cheque nor the fact that it was post-dated was mentioned by the respondent.

On August 6, 1924, a cheque for £8 1s. 6d., dated August 2, 1924, numbered 117285, drawn by the respondent upon the Tottenham branch and payable to John Poate was presented for payment through the country clearing house, being sent by the head office of the appellant bank to the branch office by post. Upon the receipt of that cheque the branch manager, Stokoe, and the cashier, Fuller, together discussed whether the cheque should be honoured, and decided to and did honour it for the reasons, (1) that the cheque did not bear the number of the cheque of which payment had been countermanded, and (2) that it bore a date subsequent to the instructions received from the respondent, and was therefore probably issued in substitution for the cheque payment of which had been countermanded by the telegram. It was a common occurrence in banking practice when a cheque was stopped that at a later date a cheque for a like amount was presented in substitution. After payment of the cheque the respondent's credit balance amounted to threepence.

On August 20, 1924, the respondent drew a cheque on the branch for £7 in favour of J. Newman, which was duly presented for payment. The appellants had no funds available to pay the same and returned it. It was in respect of these two cheques of August 2 and August 20, 1924, that the action was brought.

The action was first tried before Mr. Justice Branson and a common jury, when the jury disagreed. A second trial on the question of liability only was held before Mr. Justice Horridge, sitting without a jury, damages having been agreed at £75.

That Judge held that the instructions given to the appellants were not so clear and specific as to render them liable for negligence, and gave judgment in their favour.

The Court of Appeal (Lord Justice Bankes, Lord Justice Warrington, and Lord Justice Atkin) reversed that decision and entered judgment for the respondent.

Mr. Neilson, K.C., and Mr. Robert Fortune appeared for the appellants ; Mr. R. James Willis for the respondent.

VISCOUNT DUNEDIN.—My Lords : This is an action brought against a bank for improperly paying a cheque which had been stopped and as a sequel, the customer's account having been depleted, for improperly failing to honour a subsequent cheque which was presented.

The facts are in small compass. The plaintiff styles himself a turf commission agent, in other words, he is occupied with betting transactions. He had an account with the defendant bank at their Tottenham branch, and was in possession of one of the printed form cheque books of that bank. At the relevant date, his credit balance was about £2. On August 1, 1924, in the morning, a letter arrived at the office from the plaintiff enclosing £8 to be put to his credit. On the same morning a telegram marked as handed in at 9.43 a.m. and received at 10.48 a.m. was received in the following terms :—

"To Manager, Westminster Bank, 530, High-road, Tottenham, London, N.—Stop payment of cheque 117283 amount of eight pounds one and sixpence to Poate.—STANLEY HILTON."

On the next day the plaintiff, on his way to Alexandra Park races, rang up the cashier at the defendants' branch and the following conversation took place after mutual identification. "Did you get my cash remittance ?" "Yes." "£8 ?" "Yes." "Did you get my wire to stop cheque to Poate for £8 1s. 6d. ?" "Yes." Then the cashier added, "It has not been presented yet, Mr. Hilton," and Hilton replied, "Oh, that is all right. It is not due to be presented till to-day," or perhaps the words were, "not presentable until to-day." The cashier said, "All right." Then Hilton said, "It will be stopped when it comes in ?" The cashier said, "Yes," and then Hilton rang him off. This conversation is as sworn to by the plaintiff. The cashier quite corroborated the account except as to what was said about the cheque not being presented or presentable. His account of this is as follows :—

"499. Mr. FORTUNE : Mr. Hilton said that he said —he is not quite sure of the words which he used— either 'The cheque is not presentable till to-day,' or 'will not be presented, or is not due for presentment till to-day.' Do you remember anything of that, and if so, what ?—A. No.

"500. Mr. Justice HORRIDGE : 'I cannot remember anything about the date of presentment of the cheque.' That is not justice to you ; the question is not quite put in the form it should be put. He and the other man have both sworn to it. Are you prepared to swear no such conversation took place or that it may have escaped your memory ?—A. I do not think I can, after 18 months.

"501. Mr. FORTUNE : At any rate, whatever the conversation was, can you say whether he did convey to your mind anything as regards the actual date of the cheque ?—A. No such thing was conveyed to my mind.

"502. Q. Did anything that took place on the telephone convey to your mind the fact that this cheque was a post-dated cheque ?—A. I had no idea of it."

On August 6, a cheque for £8 1s. 6d., dated August 2, in favour of John Poate, but numbered 117285, was presented through the country clearing house. This cheque, after consultation between the cashier and manager, was honoured, being, in their view, a different cheque from cheque 117283 to which the stop notice applied. On August 20 a cheque for £7 in favour of J. Newman, signed by the plaintiff, was presented, but, his balance being at that time only 3d., was not honoured.

The case depended before Mr. Justice Horridge. The defendants put their manager in the box before the cashier. Mr. Justice Horridge recalled the manager after he had been examined and cross-examined, and then proceded to do what I cannot help thinking was an unfortunate form of procedure —namely, to examine the manager on the hypothesis of the cashier's account of what had happened, exactly tallying with what the plaintiff said. Then there ensued the following passage :—

"467. Q. If the cashier had said that that cheque was not presented till to-day, meaning August 2, because that was the day it was dated, you would have considered that ?—A. Yes, my Lord.

"468. Q. That would mean, would it not, that you would have considered the person to whom the cheque was payable, the amount for which it was drawn, and the date on which it was presented—you would have had all those particulars, would you not, if that had been communicated to you ?—A. I do not know whether that would actually convey the date of the cheque.

"469. Q. Would you mind telling me anything else it would convey ?—A. It might convey that that was the day on which he imagined the cheque would be presented by the clearing bank.

"470. Q. How could it be if he said it was not presentable, or if he said it was not due for presentation—either one or the other—how could that mean anything else ?—A. I suppose if he——

"471. Q. Keep to the question I am asking. If he said what he says he said—I am not saying whether he did or not ; that will be for me after hearing your cashier—but if he said what he said he did, must not that have conveyed to the cashier that the cheque was not dated till the 2nd ?—A. Yes, my Lord."

I cannot help thinking this very unsatisfactory. First the hypothesis is put in the manager's mouth that he is told that the cheque was post-dated. Then, when he explains that the expression "will not be presented," an expression used in the telephone communication, does not lead to the necessary inference that the date was August 2, he is suddenly peremptorily told to listen to the question. He is reverted to the question as originally put which introduces the date, and he, not unnaturally, answers that it would lead to the conclusion that the date was August 2. Notwithstanding all this, in the long run Mr. Justice Horridge exonerated the bank on the simple ground that 117283 was stopped and 117285 was cashed.

The Court of Appeal reversed Mr. Justice Horridge, and went entirely on the evidence of the bank manager. They considered that the expression "not presented" or "not presentable" necessarily led to the conclusion that the cheque was post-dated and that that ought to have been communicated by the cashier to the manager, and, if it had been so communicated, on the manager's own showing, further inquiry would then have been made.

My Lords, I have been unable to grasp how the expression "not to be presented till this day"—and that was all that might have been said—could lead to the view that the cheque was post-dated. I think, therefore, that the cashier was perfectly entitled to take, as he did, the telephonic conversation as a mere confirmation of the telegram, and, if so, there was nothing to communicate to the manager. I could not, therefore, agree with the grounds of judgment of the Court of Appeal.

It must always be remembered that a bank can be sued just as much for failing to honour a cheque as for cashing a cheque that had been stopped. Under the regulations the bank had to inform the clearing house by 3.30 p.m. whether they honoured the cheque or not. They did not know the plaintiff's address, and when it comes to a question of identification it must always be remembered that the number of a cheque is the one certain item of identification. There can be only one cheque bearing a printed number ; there may be many cheques in favour of the same drawee and for the same amount. I was at one time inclined to think that, inasmuch as both the cashier and the manager knew that there was a stop on a cheque they ought, on August 6, to have made certain investigations, but I find that they did do so. They followed the ordinary practice. They looked at the ledger, and the ledger showed that no cheque in favour of Poate had come in. I think, therefore, that the view of the officials was correct that the cheque presented being subsequent to the date of the stop instructions might be a duplicate cheque, and that they were bound to cash it.

I move that the appeal should be allowed, and the judgment of Mr. Justice Horridge be restored, the appellants to have their costs in this House and in the Court of Appeal.

Lord Atkinson.—My Lords : It is well established that the normal relation between a banker and his customer is that of debtor and creditor, but it is equally well established that quoad the drawing and payment of the customer's cheques as against money of the customer's in the banker's hands the relation is that of principal and agent. The cheque is an order of the principal's addressed to the agent to pay out of the principal's money in the agent's hands the amount of the cheque to the payee thereof. Difficulty arises when, as in this case, the principal's order to his agent is ambiguous in character capable of conveying a command bearing different or inconsistent meanings. A question of this kind arose in the case of Ireland v. Livingston (L.R., 5 H.L., 395). There was a considerable difference of judicial opinion in the lower Courts. There was ultimately an appeal to the House of Lords. In the House of Lords the question put by Lord Chelmsford (then Lord Chancellor) to the Judges who attended was : whether judgment ought to be entered for the plaintiffs or the defendant in error ? It was held that the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber was wrong and ought to be reversed and that the judgment ought to be as decided by the Court of Queen's Bench for the plaintiffs in error. The principle upon which the decision of the House of Lords was based is correctly stated in the head note in these words :—"Where a letter of orders which constitutes a contract from a merchant to his commission agent is so worded as to be capable of two interpretations, if the agent fairly and honestly assumes it to bear one of those interpretations and acts on that assumption, the merchant cannot be released from his contract on the ground that he intended it to bear the other. As the error arose from his own indistinctness of expression, he must bear the loss."

Lord Chelmsford, in giving judgment, after stating that the transaction began in a contract of agency and that he would in that light consider it, said : "Now it appears to me that if a principal gives an order to an agent in such uncertain terms as to be susceptible of two different meanings, and the agent bona fide adopts one of them and acts upon it, it is not competent to the principal to repudiate the act as unauthorized because he meant the order to be read in the other sense of which it is equally capable. It is a fair answer to such an attempt to disown the agent's authority to tell the principal that the departure from his intention was occasioned by his own fault, and that he should have given his order in clear and unambiguous terms."

Lord Westbury concurred with this statement of the law.

In the case of Curtice v. London City and Midland Bank (24 The Times L.R., 176 ; [1908] 1 K.B., 293) a telegram was, on October 31, 1906, sent by a customer after business hours to his banker purporting to countermand the payment of a cheque this customer had drawn upon this bank, earlier in the day, in favour of the defendants. The telegram was delivered by the Post Office on the same day, October 31, but after office hours, and was therefore only placed in the letter box of the bank. By an oversight of the servants of the bank this telegram was not brought to the notice of the manager till November 2, 1906. On November 1 the cheque was presented and paid.

In an action for money had and received, it was decided that the cheque was not in fact countermanded, within the meaning of the 75th section of the Bills of Exchange Act of 1882, although it might well be that owing to the negligence of the bank officials the notice of the customer's desire to stop the cheque was not received in time.

Lord Justice Fletcher Moulton, as he then was, in delivering judgment, after stating that in matters such as this the banker was prima facie the agent of the principal, the customer, said : "It has long been held that an order must be unambiguous. If a master chooses to give an order to his servant that bears two meanings, he cannot find fault with his servant for having taken the meaning which it was not in fact intended to bear ; and that applies to a banker when receiving orders as much as to agents generally. Now that principle which applies to the duty of conveying the mandate in a form in which the meaning is unambiguous applies, in my opinion, mutatis mutandis to the question of its authenticity. If the mandate is sent in a form in which a servant, acting reasonably, has no security that the mandate comes from his employer, the employer cannot grumble that he did not act upon it." Now the cheque which the plaintiff in this case says he sought to countermand was one dated August 2, 1926, numbered A117285, drawn in favour of one John Poate, Esq., for the sum of £8 1s. 6d. The mandate intended to countermand the payment of this cheque was contained in the following telegram : "Stop payment cheque 117283 amount Eight pounds one shilling and sixpence to Poate."

It will be observed that in this telegram the date of the cheque is not given, nor is the address of the drawer or of the payee, while the number—which is the very best means of identifying a cheque—is not and cannot be right, since that was the number of a cheque dated July 25, 1924, drawn by the plaintiff in favour of one F. Hinchcliffe, Esq., for £1 10s., and paid on July 26, 1924. This telegram, of which the plaintiff was the author, became, by reason of the incorrect number mentioned in it, the cause of the ambiguity which has been introduced into this case. The plaintiff was examined at the trial touching a conversation which he had by telephone with a cashier of the bank (named Fuller) to which he had sent the above-mentioned telegram. Much depends upon this conversation, and it is better to quote it as it is printed at page 14 of the Appendix. It runs thus :—

"59. Q. Who spoke to you on the 'phone at the other end ?—A. The chief cashier.

"60. Q. Do you know his name ?—A. I think it is Fuller.

"Mr. FORTUNE : Fuller.

"61. Mr. WILLIS : Will you tell my Lord what you said to him ?—A. He identified me first.

"62. Q. Tell my Lord what you said to him and my Lord will see whether he identified you or not. What did you say to him ?—A. When I got through I asked if it was the number—I forget the exact number now—and I said 'Is that number so-and-so,' and a voice said 'Yes.' I recognized the chief cashier's voice. I said 'Mr. Hilton speaking.' He said something—I forget the exact words—I said '45, Morrison-avenue.' I then said 'Did you get my cash remittance ?' He said 'Yes.' I said '£8.' He said 'Yes.' I said 'Did you get my wire stopping cheque to Poate for £8 1s. 6d. ?' He said 'Yes.' Then he volunteered. He said 'It has not been presented yet, Mr. Hilton.' He volunteered that without my asking him. I said 'Oh, that is all right ; it is not due to be presented before to-day'—I forget the exact words, but it was either 'not presentable until to-day' or 'not to be presented until this morning.'

"63. MR. JUSTICE HORRIDGE : Give me that again ?—A. Either it was not to be presented until to-day or was not presentable until this morning.

"64. Mr. WILLIS : Did he say anything ?—A. Yes, he said 'All right, Mr. Hilton,' and I said 'It will be stopped when it comes in.' He said 'Yes.' I said 'All right, thank you,' and rang off."

A bookmaker's clerk named Hughes, in the employment of the plaintiff, was also examined on this point, and deposed as follows :—

"269. Mr. WILLIS : Did you hear Mr. Howard speak on the telephone ?—A. Yes. I went into the telephone box with him.

"270. Q. What did you hear Mr. Howard say ?—A. I heard him give a number and there was a pause. Then he said 'Mr. Hilton speaking. Did you receive my cash ?' Then there was another pause. He said 'No. 45, Morrison-avenue.' Then he said '£8 in notes in a registered envelope.' Then there was another pause. 'Did you receive my wire stopping cheque to Poate for £8 1s. 6d. ?' There was another pause, and then Mr. Hilton said 'It is not due for presentment until to-day.'"

Now it will be observed that the plaintiff's evidence and that of his clerk Hughes as to what took place when the telephone message was sent do not quite agree, but the more important matter is that the plaintiff himself states that he forgets the precise words used on that occasion, but that they were either "not presentable until to-day" or "not to be presented till this morning." These two forms of expression have entirely different meanings—"Not presentable until to-day" means that the payee would not be entitled to obtain payment of the cheque until "to-day" and because of that the words may possibly suggest that the date of the cheque was "to-day," I hardly think they do, but the words "not to be presented till to-day" might apply to any cheque whenever drawn and it does not suggest the date in the same way.

The manager of the bank, Mr. Stokoe, was examined for the defence. He was subjected to an examination by the presiding Judge closely resembling the cross-examination of a hostile counsel. He knew nothing of what had been said during the telephone conversation between the plaintiff and the cashier, Mr. Fuller. He was not told anything about it till long afterwards. But the learned Judge, instead of waiting till the cashier, who carried on the conversation by telephone, had been examined and given his account of what took place, put a number of hypothetical questions to the bank manager framed thus: "If you had heard what the plaintiff says was said, what would you have done?" &c. I think this was a most undesirable course to take because it was always possible that the cashier's evidence would conflict with that of the plaintiff, and cause the course which the manager might say he would take to be based on contradicted evidence.

Both the manager and the cashier stated, however, that when they saw this cheque with the date August 2 on it, they concluded it was a duplicate of the one countermanded, since it was dated after the telegram had been sent, and that they had no reason to doubt the number given on the telegram.

As the learned Lords Justices in the Court of Appeal seem to have given great weight to the manager's replies to the hypothetical questions put to him, I think it well to quote some of the most important of these replies.

The manager having been recalled, the learned Judge said to him, "Mr. Fortune asked you a question in re-examination, and you gave this answer: 'Looking at the date, I saw it was subsequent to the instructions, so we thought it was a duplicate.' I want you to consider that answer you gave carefully. You know that the plaintiff in this case says that he told your cashier and your cashier said, 'It has not been presented yet,' and he said, 'That is all right. It was not due till to-day, or it was not to be presented until this morning.' If the cashier had communicated that to you—I am not saying either way, but, supposing I find that that was the fact, and that he said that to your cashier—if your cashier had communicated that to you would it have been a matter that you would have considered?" The manager's answer is, "Yes, my Lord." If the cashier had said that that cheque was not due till to-day, meaning August 2 (because that was the day it was dated), would you have considered that? No witness has even suggested that the words in brackets "because that was the day it was dated" were ever spoken by anybody to anybody connected with the case.

He is then asked:

"That would mean, would it not, that you would have considered the person to whom the cheque was payable, the amount for which it was drawn, and the date on which it was presented—you would have had all those particulars, would you not, if that had been communicated to you?—A. I do not know whether that would actually convey the date of the cheque.

"469. Q. Would you mind telling me anything else it would convey?—A. It might convey that that was the day on which he imagined the cheque would be presented by the clearing bank.

"470. Q. How could it be if he said it was not presentable or if he said it was not due for presentation—either one or the other—how could that mean anything else?—A. I suppose if he . . .

"471. Q. Keep to the question I am asking. If he said what he says he said—I am not saying whether he did or not; that will be for me after hearing your cashier—but if he said what he said he did, must not that have conveyed to the cashier that the cheque was not dated till the 2nd?—A. Yes, my Lord.

"472. Q. Then if you had been told that, you would have had the person to whom the cheque was made payable, you would have had the amount of the cheque, which was an odd sum, £8 1s. 6d., and you would have had the date of the cheque. Therefore, you would not think it was a cheque drawn after your instructions had been received. Having all those materials before you, would you have paid the cheque without doing something else?—A. No, my Lord.

"473. Q. If you had had the communication before you, because you had the other material before you, from the cashier, 'I should not have paid it without doing something else,' what else would you have done? Would you have looked in the paid cheque drawer to see whether 117283 had been paid or not?—A. Yes, I think we should, my Lord.

"474. Q. To see if 117283 had passed too. That is what it amounts to, is it not?—A. Yes, my Lord."

Mr. Fuller, the cashier, was then examined.

My Lords, I cannot but think the way in which he was dealt with by the learned Judge was objectionable and not calculated to elicit the truth. The plaintiff had proved that a long conversation on the telephone had taken place between the cashier and himself, questions being asked and answered by both. Surely, it would have been better to have examined or cross-examined the cashier as to each particular individual statement alleged to have been made to him or by him. Instead of doing that immediately after his having said "I cannot remember anything about the date of presentation of the cheque," the learned Judge puts the whole conversation in globo to the witness, and asks him, "Are you prepared to swear that no such conversation took place, or that it may have escaped your memory?" And the cashier answers, "I do not think I can after 18 months." That means, of course, that he cannot swear that no such conversation took place, but he might well have not been able to recall the whole conversation and yet have been able to remember some particular expressions or expression used in the course of it. Many times a witness will truly state, "I cannot remember the whole of that conversation, but I can remember that I never made use of a certain word or expression that is alleged against me."

Mr. Fortune then proceeded with the examination of the witness, and the following questions were put to the cashier and answered:—

"501. Mr. Fortune: At any rate, whatever the conversation was, can you say whether he did convey to your mind anything as regards the actual date of the cheque?—A. No such thing was conveyed to my mind.

"502. Q. Did anything that took place on the telephone convey to your mind the fact that this cheque was a post-dated cheque?—A. I had no idea of it.

"506. Q. And when you got to this cheque to Poate for £8 1s. 6d., No. 117285, what did you do?—A. I took it in to the manager and referred it to him.

"507. Mr. Justice Horridge: Do you mean with the telegram?—A. Yes, the telegram."

In the further cross-examination of the manager there were other questions, but as my Lord on the Woolsack has already read those it is unnecessary for me to repeat them.

Mr. Justice Horridge, in delivering judgment, said he was not prepared to hold that the bank manager was guilty of negligence in the course he took. He held that the original mandate had been absolutely clear and specific. The plaintiff to succeed must show that the countermand was equally clear and specific, and he could not complain if the bank took a possible view of the transaction which was not the view that the plaintiff intended them to take. He rests his judgment upon this point on the cases of Ireland v. Livingston (L.R. 5 H.L., 395) and Miles v. Haslehurst (23 The Times L.R., 142; 12 Com. Cas., 83).

The Court of Appeal reversed this decision and the Lords Justices appear to have to a great extent based their judgment on the admission extracted from the bank manager during his cross-examination by the learned Judge.

The learned Lord Justice Bankes and Lord Justice Warrington (as he then was) seem to have based their judgments on the conclusions they drew from it. They in effect said there was no question about the authority of the telegram sent by the plaintiff. The plaintiff pledged himself to the substance of the telephone communication. The cashier did not. The substance of that conversation would have informed any reasonable person who paid sufficient attention to it, I think, that the cheque, which was referred to in the telegram, was a cheque dated August 2, and, in fact, a post-dated cheque. On August 2, therefore, a telegram was received which contained an important statement, the number of the cheque, 117283. There was a conversation on the telephone supplementing the telegram by adding the date of the cheque and the fact that it was post-dated, but not containing any reference to the number of the cheque or that the number, as given on the telegram, was wrong. That is the state of things on August 2, and this cheque was presented on the 6th.

I confess I am quite unable to arrive at the conclusion stated at page 78 of the Appendix, to the effect that the telephone gave the date of the cheque or that it was a post-dated one. I do not think it did anything so definite as that. The learned Lords Justices rely upon the fact that if the bank manager had known on August 2 that this cheque was dated August 2, and was a post-dated cheque, he would have jumped to the conclusion straight away that there had been a mistake in the number, and should not have paid the cheque. I do not think the evidence sustains this view. The whole of Lord Justice Bankes's judgment, in my view, rests upon this assumption, that the reasonable construction of the conversation by telephone was that the cheque which was to be stopped was dated August 2, and was a post-dated cheque. It is incredible, I think, that if specific and definite information of that kind had been conveyed to an official like the cashier of a bank, he would either have forgotten it, or failed to realize what was said to him, or omitted to inform his manager of these two facts when they consulted together.

It is, in my mind, the very ambiguity of this telephonic conversation, the omission from it of a clear statement of the two facts so much relied upon—namely, the date of the cheque and the fact that it was a post-dated cheque—which accounts for the cashier's action.

Lord Justice Atkin, at page 87 of the Appendix, states the ground of his decision with great clearness. He said:—

"The bank manager says in terms: 'If I had known of the communication that was made to the bank in the person of the cashier on August 2, I should have had recourse to the cheques which I had already paid. I should have examined them, and I should have found that 83 had already been paid on July 29, and if I had found that 83 had already been paid; I should have treated that as conclusive that the plaintiff intended to refer to this particular cheque which came forward on August 6.' In other words, he says, not 'There would have still been an ambiguity in my mind,' but 'If I had done that which the bank official's information would reasonably have led me to do, then there would have been no ambiguity at all; it would have been cleared up.' It appears to me that under those circumstances the bank are bound, and that the true conclusion is that here there was in fact no ambiguity, because if the bank had acted reasonably and had utilized the means of information that was in their possession—namely, the information of the bank cashier—there would have been no ambiguity left, and they would have construed the mandate in the sense in which the mandate undoubtedly was intended by the plaintiff—namely, as a mandate not to pay this particular cheque."

But no satisfactory explanation was given by the plaintiff of the fact which caused all the ambiguity, and for which the plaintiff is entirely responsible—the mentioning of the wrong number in the telegram. Again, the version of the evidence put to the bank manager, by means of which his statement so much relied upon was extracted, was itself ambiguous.

I am, therefore, unable to concur in the decision which puts so much weight on the manager's reply to this hypothetical question addressed to him. I think the appeal succeeds, that the decision appealed from should be reversed and the decision of Mr. Justice Horridge should be confirmed, with costs, here and in the Court of Appeal.

Lord Shaw of Dunfermline.—My Lords: I concur. The case has reference to the stoppage of a cheque of a particular number, name, date, and amount. When a banker is in possession of sufficient funds to meet such a cheque from a customer, the duty of the bank is to honour that cheque by payment, and failure in this duty may involve the bank in serious liability to its customer.

This duty is ended, and on the contrary when the cheque is stopped another duty arises—namely, to refuse payment. In a case of that character it rests upon the customer to prove that the order to stop reached the bank in time and was unequivocally referable to a cheque then in existence, and signed and issued by the customer before the notice to stop.

It would, of course, be intolerable in business to permit the form of stoppage to be applied to a non-existent and non-issued cheque. Further, in the ordinary course of trade a cheque is signed on the date it bears. This being so the notice of stoppage on reaching the bank will properly be treated as only applying to a cheque bearing a date the same as, or anterior to, the date of stoppage.

To carry the scope of stoppage further and to make it apply to the case (exceptional and out of the ordinary course of business transactions)—the case of cheques which though subsequent to stoppage in date were yet anterior to stoppage at the time of signature and issue, namely, post-dated cheques—it is, in my view, necessary for the customer to prove and explain the post-dating, but further to prove that this fact was brought clearly home to the mind of the banker so as to bring the post-dated cheque within the order of stoppage.

If these last things are not clearly proved (and the onus of doing so is no light one), then the bank acts rightly in declining to dishonour a cheque which ex facie bears a date subsequent to the stoppage.

In the present case the customer has, I am humbly of opinion, failed to discharge this onus, and in particular has failed to show that there was brought home to the bank knowledge of post-dating as now alleged. The customer, however, pleads that the bank failed in its duty, because having been asked to stop a cheque numbered 117283, and this request having been made by telegram on the morning of August 1, the bank honoured a cheque bearing another number—namely, 117285—and dated August 2, that is, one day after the stoppage.

The perplexity arose from the fact that the cheque as presented was for the same sum and to the same payee. But this perplexity arose not from any act of the bank but was actually caused by the acts of the customer, and Ireland v. Livingston (L.R., 5 H.L., 395) clearly applies. In the circumstances stated, was the banker to enter into a conjecture that the stopped cheque was the same cheque as one bearing a different number and appearing to have come into existence after the date of stoppage? And did he fail in his duty by not coming to a conclusion of identity? I do not see my way so to affirm, and for myself, I should have thought it highly dangerous in business to act upon any conjecture of the kind, or to dishonour such a cheque except upon clear and unmistakable instructions.

I agree to the motion proposed from the Woolsack.

Lord Wrenbury.—My Lords: On July 31, 1924 (which was a Thursday), the respondent drew and gave to John Poate a cheque for £8 1s. 6d. He post-dated it to August 2 (which was a Saturday). The cheque bore the number 117285. It was drawn upon the appellants' branch at Tottenham. The amount of the cheque was a loan by the respondent to Poate. On the morning of Friday, August 1, the respondent wrote to the bank sending a cash sum of £8 to the credit of his account. This remittance brought the credit balance of the respondent's account up to a sum sufficient to meet the cheque for £8 1s. 6d. Later, upon the same August 1, having reason to believe that Poate would not repay the loan the respondent telegraphed to the bank "Stop payment of cheque 117283 amount of £8 1s. 6d. to Poate." The telegram, it will be observed, did not give the date of the cheque, said nothing about its being a post-dated cheque, and erroneously stated its number to be 117283, when in fact the cheque he had given to Poate bore the number 117285. On August 2 (which was Saturday) the respondent telephoned to Fuller, who was a cashier at the bank. The statement of what passed is given by Fuller at page 14 of the book and was accepted by the Judge. I do not set it out at length. The words relied on by the respondent are that the respondent said: "It (i.e., the cheque) is not due to be presented before to-day," or "is not presentable before to-day," or is "not to be presented before this morning," and that Fuller said: "It will be stopped when it comes in."

The cheque was a country cheque and was crossed. It would have to be sent by Poate to his bankers or to some bankers. By the rubber stamp on the paid cheque it appears that it was in fact cleared through the Westminster Bank, Midhurst. It would have to pass through the County Clearing House and certainly would not have been presented at Tottenham before Saturday, August 2. All the respondent's statements as to its "not being presentable" or "not due to be presented", before to-day, i.e., before August 2, were well founded, but they gave no information as to the date of the cheque or as to its being post-dated. August 3 was a Sunday and August 4 was Bank Holiday. The cheque did not in fact reach the Tottenham branch until August 6. When it came in the appellants paid it. The question is whether they were justified in doing so. In my opinion they were.

There were two facts relating to the cheque which they were directed to stop which in my opinion justified the bank's officers in concluding that the cheque which came in on August 6 was not the cheque they had been ordered to stop. The one is that they were ordered to stop cheque No. 117283. The cheque they paid was No. 117285—a subsequent number and therefore presumably a later cheque. The other is that the cheque they paid bore date August 2, a date later than the telegram of August 1. It might well be that owing to differences between the drawer and the drawee the drawer might have stopped a first cheque and then by reason of those differences being settled he might have given a second cheque for the same sum. Had those been the facts and had the bank dishonoured the second cheque they would have been liable to an action. Their conduct was, I think, completely justified.

In fact the cheque 117283 had been drawn in favour of one Hinchcliffe on July 25, had been cleared on July 28, and was in the bank's hands on August 6. It is extravagant, I think, to suggest that the bank ought to have searched the paid cheques in their possession to correct the misstatement which the respondent made when he named cheque 117283 as the cheque he ordered to be stopped. Moreover, if they had done so that would have led only to the knowledge that their customer had given an erroneous number and would not have indicated in any way that the cheque was a post-dated cheque.

Lord Justice Bankes in the course of his judgment says that the telephonic communication ought to have conveyed (1) that the cheque was in fact dated August 2, and (2) that it was in fact a post-dated cheque. He even goes further and says that "There was a conversation on the telephone supplementing the telegram by adding the date of the cheque and the fact that it was a post-dated cheque." There is nothing whatever in the evidence to support this statement, as a matter of fact, and nothing, in my opinion, to support it as a matter of inference. A misapprehension of this kind runs through all judgments. The learned Judges below went wrong, I think, in attaching to the words which were used over the telephone a meaning which certainly was not conveyed by express words, and which is not, in my opinion, a meaning which the bank ought in the circumstances to have attributed to them and, indeed, is scarcely one which they could reasonably attribute to them.

In my judgment the appeal must be allowed and the action dismissed with costs.

Lord Carson.—My Lords: I agree. The whole difficulty in the case has arisen through the learned Judge at the trial treating the manager of the bank as a kind of expert witness giving an opinion on a series of hypotheses that were framed before the evidence of the cashier had been given, which, in my opinion, showed how unreliable the hypotheses were. The inferences so provided from the evidence of the manager permeated all the judgments in the Court of Appeal and are, in my opinion, unwarranted.

1926. Dec. 10.

KOKUSAI KISEN KAISHA v. LOUIS DREYFUS AND CO.*

Ship — Charterparty — Freight — Discount — Computation.

The plaintiffs, as owners, chartered a steamer to the defendants by a charterparty which, after providing for the rate of freight, contained the clause: "The said freight, less advances, if any, to be paid on unloading and right delivery of the cargo in cash, but if ordered outside the United Kingdom to discharge, in London concurrent with discharge, but, in any case, subject to two months' discount at 5 per cent. per annum." A further clause provided: "Money for steamer's ordinary disbursements, not exceeding one-fourth of estimated freight, to be advanced, if required by the captain, at the port of loading by the charterers . . . to be indorsed on bills of lading, if required, and deducted from the freight at settlement."

Held (Lord Hanworth, M.R., dissenting), that the 5 per cent. discount was to be calculated not on the whole amount of the freight but on that amount less advances for disbursements.

This was an appeal from a decision of Mr. Justice Rowlatt.

By a charterparty dated October 23, 1924, the plaintiffs, Kokusai Kisen Kaisha, as owners, chartered a steamer to the defendants, Louis Dreyfus and Co., to go to Australia and load a full and complete cargo of wheat, and carry it to the ports stated in the charterparty.

Clause 8 of the charterparty provided for the rate at which freight was to be paid, and the latter part of the clause was as follows:—

"The said freight, less advances, if any, to be paid on unloading and right delivery of the cargo in cash, but if ordered outside the United Kingdom to discharge, in London concurrent with discharge, but, in any case, subject to two months' discount at 5 per cent. per annum."

Clause 15 of the charterparty provided as follows:—

"Money for steamers' ordinary disbursements, not exceeding one-fourth of estimated freight, to be advanced, if required by the captain, at the port of loading by the charterers . . . to be indorsed on bills of lading, if required, and deducted from the freight at settlement."

Two and a half per cent. was to be added by way of commission for any advances made.

In the events which happened a dispute arose between the shipowners and the charterers about the amount of the discount to be allowed under the latter part of clause 8. The owners contended that it was to be calculated on the amount of the freight, less advances made under clause 15. The charterers contended that the discount was to be calculated on the whole amount of the freight.

The arbitrator held and awarded, subject to the opinion of the Court, that the discount was to be calculated on the whole amount of the freight.

Mr. Justice Rowlatt upheld the award.

The owners appealed.

Mr. James Dickinson appeared for the owners; Mr. Willink for the charterers.

The MASTER of the ROLLS said that, for his part, he thought that Mr. Justice Rowlatt was right, and that the words, "less advances, if any," in clause 8 should be put in parentheses. It was "the freight" which was to be the subject of the discount, and the 5 per cent. discount was to apply "in any case." Advances might or might not be made, but they were to be subject to the words, "if any," and it looked as if the freight, meaning the full freight, was to be the subject of the discount.

LORD JUSTICE ATKIN said that, applying the ordinary rules of discount, it would seem that what was subject to discount was the sum which was to be paid. The words indicated, in the ordinary commercial sense, that a certain sum was to be paid, and the sum which fell due to be paid was the actual sum from which discount could be deducted. If the charterers had got no benefit from the sums which they had advanced, a contrary intention might be indicated, but, in fact, they got 2½ per cent. for whatever period, long or short, the advances might cover. The appeal should, therefore, be allowed.

LEONARD v. WESTERN SERVICES, LIMITED.*

Hackney Carriages—Omnibus—Plying for hire—Return ticket—Omnibuses of same proprietor—Town Police Clauses Act, 1847 (10 and 11 Vict., c. 89), s. 45—Town Police Clauses Act, 1889 (52 and 53 Vict., c. 14), ss. 1-4.

A company of omnibus proprietors which had no licence to ply for hire in the district of R. issued return tickets to R. from a point which was outside R., but was in a district where they were licensed to ply for hire. On the return journey they accepted as passengers from R. only persons holding return tickets issued on one of the company's omnibuses—not necessarily the same vehicle as the one on which the passenger proposed to return.

Held, that in these circumstances there was no plying for hire in the district of R.

Armstrong v. Ogle (42 The Times L.R., 553 ; [1926] 2 K.B., 438) distinguished.

This was a case stated by justices for the county of Monmouth.

At a Court of Summary Jurisdiction sitting at the Police Court, Pentonville, Newport, an information was laid under the Town Police Clauses Acts, 1847 and 1889 (10 and 11 Vict., c. 89, and 52 and 53 Vict., c. 14), by Norah Leonard (hereinafter called the appellant) against Western Services, Limited (hereinafter called the respondents), for that they, being the proprietors of a certain hackney carriage, to wit, a motor omnibus, did on June 13, 1926, unlawfully permit the said motor omnibus to be used as a hackney carriage plying for hire in the district of Risca without having obtained for the said carriage a licence to ply for hire in the said district as required by the Act in that behalf. The information was heard on July 3, 1926, and was dismissed.

By the Town Police Clauses Act, 1847 (10 and 11 Vict., c. 89), section 45, it is provided as follows :—

"If the proprietor or part proprietor of any carriage, or any person so concerned as aforesaid, permits the same to be used as a hackney carriage plying for hire within the prescribed distance without having obtained a licence as aforesaid for such carriage, or during the time that such licence is suspended as hereinafter provided, or if any person be found driving, standing, or plying for hire with any carriage within the prescribed distance, for which such licence as aforesaid has not been previously obtained . . . every such person so offending shall for every such offence be liable to a penalty not exceeding forty shillings."

The Town Police Clauses Act, 1889 (52 and 53 Vict., c. 14), provides as follows :—

Section 1.—"This Act may be cited as the 'Town Police Clauses Act, 1889,' and this Act and the Town Police Clauses Act, 1847, may be cited together as 'The Town Police Clauses Acts, 1847 and 1889.'"

Section 2 (1).—"This Act shall be construed as one with the principal Act, and the expression 'this Act' in the principal Act shall be construed to mean the principal Act as amended by this Act."

Section 3.—"The term 'omnibus,' where used in this Act, shall include—every omnibus, char-à-banc, waggonette, brake, stage-coach, and other carriage plying or standing for hire by or used to carry passengers at separate fares to, from, or in any part of the prescribed distance ; but shall not include . . . any omnibus starting outside the prescribed distance, and bringing passengers within the prescribed distance, and not standing or plying for hire within the prescribed distance."

Section 4 (1).—"The several terms 'hackney carriages,' 'hackney coach,' 'carriages,' and 'carriage,' whenever used in sections 37, 40 to 52 (both inclusive), 54, 58, and 60 to 67 (both inclusive) of the principal Act shall, notwithstanding anything contained in section 38 of that Act, be deemed to include every omnibus."

Upon the hearing of the said information the following facts were admitted or proved :—

(a) The respondents were a limited company, having their registered office at Tredegar, in the county of Monmouth, and were the owners of a number of motor omnibuses and ran a regular daily services of such omnibuses between Tredegar and Newport through Blackwood, Pontllanfraith, Ynysddu, Cwmfelinfach, Wattsville, Cross Keys, Risca, Pontymister, and Rogerstone. The said omnibuses were duly licensed to ply for hire in all these areas other than the Risca area.

(b) At 4 p.m. on June 13, 1926, the appellant entered a motor omnibus belonging to the respondents, and numbered 6, while it was standing at Mill-street, in the borough of Newport, and she booked a return ticket to Risca Station Approach and paid 1s. for it.

(c) The said motor omnibus No. 6 stopped at Risca Station Approach, which was within the prescribed distance of the area of the Risca Urban District Council, and the appellant got out.

(d) After waiting at the said Risca Station Approach and within the prescribed distance of the area of the Risca Urban District Council for a short while the appellant hailed a motor omnibus belonging to the respondents which was travelling in the direction of Newport.

(e) The said motor omnibus duly stopped and the appellant boarded the same, and was accepted and conveyed as a passenger in such omnibus to Newport.

(f) As the appellant boarded the said omnibus she was asked by the conductor if she had a return ticket, and she said "Yes," and at the same time another person who had not a return ticket and attempted to board the said omnibus was refused admission.

(g) The omnibus which the appellant boarded on the return journey was numbered 2, and was a different omnibus from the one which had conveyed her from Newport to Risca, but both omnibuses belonged to the same proprietors—namely, the respondents.

(h) The said return ticket issued to the appellant was available for return by any omnibus belonging to the respondents which had sufficient accommodation for her.

(i) No accommodation was specially reserved in the omnibus in which the passenger had made the outward journey or in any particular omnibus of the respondents for passengers to whom return tickets had been issued.

(j) No licence to ply for hire within the said prescribed distance of the area of the Risca Urban District Council had been obtained in respect of either of the said omnibuses as required by the statutes in that behalf.

On the part of the appellant it was contended that upon the facts as proved or admitted an offence had been committed by the respondents under the aforesaid statutes. The case of Armstrong v. Ogle (42 The Times L.R., 553 ; [1926] 2 K.B., 438) was cited as an authority in favour of the appellant's contention.

On the part of the respondents it was contended that, as the appellant had booked her ticket outside the prescribed distance and had returned in accordance with the contract made outside the prescribed area, the respondents were not plying for hire within the district of Risca within the meaning of the statutes, and that the decision in the case of Armstrong v. Ogle (supra) did not apply.

The justices were of opinion that there had not been a plying for hire by the respondents within the district of Risca within the meaning of the aforesaid Acts, and they dismissed the information.

The question upon which the opinion of the Court was desired was whether the justices upon the above statement of facts came to a correct determination and decision in point of law, and, if not, what should be done in the premises.

Mr. E. W. Cave, K.C., and Mr. A. T. James appeared for the appellant; Mr. C. Paley Scott for the respondents.

The Lord Chief Justice.—In this case the justices were of opinion that there had not been a plying for hire by the respondents within the district referred to. The question for this Court is whether upon the facts stated in the special case the justices came to a correct determination and decision in point of law. In other words, the question is whether there was evidence upon which the justices were entitled to found this conclusion.

The argument on the other side was and is that the case is concluded by the decision in the case of Armstrong v. Ogle (42 The Times L.R., 553; [1926] 2 K.B., 438), but I am satisfied by the argument of Mr. Paley Scott that this case is distinguishable from that case. In the present case there is no such element as the pooling arrangement or plan which was an essential feature of the scheme of business in Armstrong v. Ogle (supra). The effect of that pooling arrangement was, amongst other things, that every owner in the association of owners was interested in attracting to his omnibus as many persons as he could with whom he had not himself made a contract, but who had made a contract with some other of the associated proprietors; and the result of his attracting these persons to his omnibus, if he succeeded, was that in the readjustment of accounts he collected money in respect of their fares. In the present case, so far as the facts are known to us, it appears that no person is taken aboard the respondents' omnibuses in the district referred to except persons with whom the respondents have previously themselves made a contract. There is, therefore, no occasion for soliciting, or picking up, or plying for hire; the hiring has already been done. It is not open to the omnibus driver by diligence or by skill to attract to his employers the customers of other employers. In these circumstances it seems to me that this case is distinguished from the case of Armstrong v. Ogle (supra), and that it comes very much nearer to the case of Sales v. Lake (38 The Times L.R., 336; [1922] 1 K.B., 553), which was so much discussed in that case.

In these circumstances I am not prepared to say that the justices came to a wrong conclusion, and I think that this appeal ought to be dismissed.

Mr. Justice Avory.—I agree that this case is distinguishable from the case of Armstrong v. Ogle (42 The Times L.R., 553; [1926] 2 K.B., 438) on the ground which my Lord has pointed out, and which certainly differs from the basis of his judgment in that case, and, if I may say so, from the basis of my own judgment in that case; and as soon as the present case is distinguished from Armstrong v. Ogle (supra) on that ground it seems to me to fall within the authority of the case of Sales v. Lake (38 The Times L.R., 336; [1922] 1 K.B., 553). In fact Armstrong v. Ogle (supra) was only distinguished from the case of Sales v. Lake (supra) on that very ground which has been mentioned by my Lord. That being so, it appears to me that this case falls within the authority of Sales v. Lake (supra), and I must follow that case, although, as I have previously said, I was a reluctant assenting member of the Court to that judgment.

Mr. Justice Salter.—I am of the same opinion. I think that to constitute "plying for hire" there must be, without attempting any exhaustive definition, a general invitation by the person in charge of the vehicle to make contracts with him for carriage in his vehicle. Here the person in charge of this omnibus No. 2 did not, so far as the evidence goes, solicit from any person contracts for carriage, and he certainly made no contract with the passenger mentioned in the case. She had already made a contract with his employers, and she was demanding (and she received) the performance of that contract. It therefore seems to me that the justices were right.

BROOME v. MINISTER OF LABOUR.*

Master and Servant—Compensation for injury by accident — Workman — Definition — Ex-Service man being trained in instructional factory—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906 (6 Edw. VII., c. 58), s. 13—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1923 (13 and 14 Geo. V., c. 42), s. 9—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925 (15 and 16 Geo. V., c. 84), ss. 3, 43.

An ex-Service man, working in a Government instructional factory and undergoing industrial training, is not a workman within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Acts.

This was an appeal from an award of his Honour Judge Farrant, sitting at the Luton County Court, holding that disabled ex-Service men, when working in a Government instructional factory under the Ministry of Labour and undergoing industrial training, were not "workmen" within the meaning of the definition contained in the Workmen's Compensation Acts, and were not entitled to compensation for injury by accident, or for disablement by an industrial disease, arising out of and in the course of the work which they were doing.

The applicant, Alfred Broome, enlisted in the Army on the outbreak of war and served in the R.A.S.C. until some time in 1918, when he was invalided out of the Service. He had been wounded in the head and suffered from neurasthenia, epileptic fits, and mental instability. He was in receipt of a disability pension of 40s. a week. He applied through the Employment Exchange at King's Cross for industrial training under the scheme for the employment of discharged and disabled ex-Service men and was accepted for training. For a short time he went for training to a tire company, then to the Mansions Motor Company, Limited, but he did not stay long in the motor trade, and eventually, on April 2, 1924, he went to the "Government Instructional Factory" near Luton for training in the making of furniture.

He had relinquished his pension, but received a maintenance allowance of 40s. a week for himself and 10s. a week for his wife, and daily travelling expenses between London and Luton. He had no children. If he was late for work or did not go he was fined at the rate of 1s. for each hour of absence. On July 23, 1925, he was discharged from the factory, and in August, 1925, he obtained a certificate from the certifying surgeon employed under the Factory and Workshop Acts to the effect that he was suspended from his employment owing to his suffering from dermatitis, an industrial disease produced by dust or liquids.

The applicant claimed compensation for a disability caused by instruction and work on french polishing.

The County Court Judge held that the relation between the respondent and the applicant was merely that of teacher and pupil and not that of master and servant; that the applicant's allowances were purely subsistence allowances and not in the nature of wages; that there was no contract of service between the parties; and that the applicant was not a "workman" within the Workmen's Compensation Acts.

The applicant appealed.

Mr. Cave, K.C., and Mr. S. J. Duncan appeared for the appellant; Mr. Lilley for the respondent.

The case was partly heard on November 30, and was adjourned for inquiry into the authority of the certifying surgeon to grant the certificate.

The Court dismissed the appeal.

The Master of the Rolls, in giving judgment, said that the appeal was brought by a man who claimed to be a workman and to be entitled to compensation on the ground that he had been disabled by an industrial disease caused by his employment. His Lordship stated the facts, and said that the applicant entered the Instructional Factory on the terms set out in a form entitled MLT.23. On July 23, 1925, he was discharged without any reasons being given.

On August 14, 1925, he received a certificate of suspension saying that he was suffering from dermatitis. He thereupon made an application for compensation, and claimed that the dermatitis from which he was suffering was an industrial disease within section 43 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925, and that he was entitled to receive compensation. The claim was disputed, and on April 1, 1926, he filed an application for compensation. The County Court Judge determined that the man was not a "workman" within the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, by section 13 of which a workman was defined as a person who worked under a contract of service or apprenticeship with an employer.

There were two points to be considered. The first was the one on which the County Court Judge had decided the case. But section 43 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925, required attention. By section 43 (1) "where (ii.) a workman is, in pursuance of any special rules or regulations made under the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901, suspended from his usual employment on account of his having contracted any such disease" as was mentioned in the Third Schedule to the Act of 1925 or as was added to that Schedule by the Secretary of State under s. 43 (3) of the Act of 1925, he was to be entitled, upon certain conditions, to compensation. The workman in the present case had produced a certificate of suspension. The nature of the training factory at Luton was not at all clear, but a workman, in order to recover compensation, must show that the Act had been complied with.

The Court was not clear, at the adjourned hearing on November 30, that there had been any rules or regulations made under the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901, which were applicable to the Instructional Factory, and which enabled a man being trained there to be suspended for dermatitis. It now appeared that, though there were certain rules and regulations, there were none made under the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901, which applied to the Instructional Factory. The suspension order which had been made could not therefore be sustained, and the appellant's claim must fail as the conditions did not permit of the order being made.

As at present advised he (his Lordship) would have come to the same conclusion as the County Court Judge that the applicant was not a workman within the Workmen's Compensation Acts. But the question whether a man was a workman or not was really a question of fact, and the County Court Judge had found that there was no contract of service. The payments made to the man were made in accord and satisfaction of his previous pension, and he was subject to rules under which money payable to him might, in certain circumstances, be stopped for fines.

On the other point the position was quite clear and the appeal would be dismissed, with costs.

Lord Justice Atkin and Lord Justice Lawrence delivered judgment to the same effect.

TATE AND LYLE, LIMITED v. LONDON AND NORTH-EASTERN RAILWAY COMPANY AND LONDON, MIDLAND, AND SCOTTISH RAILWAY COMPANY.*

Railways—Rates—Transitional period till appointed day—Power to reduce rates and then raise them within maximum—Railways Act, 1921 (11 and 12 Geo. V., c. 55), s. 60.

Under s. 60 of the Railways Act, 1921, which applies to the transitional period between August 15, 1921, and the day to be appointed by the Railway Rates Tribunal for the coming into force of the new rates to be approved by the Tribunal, the rates in existence on August 15, 1921, are maximum rates, and the railway companies are entitled to reduce them, and to raise them again, without applying to the Tribunal, if by so doing they do not exceed the maximum.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (43 The Times L.R., 49) affirmed.

This was an appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal (43 The Times L.R., 49), affirming an order of Mr. Justice Astbury (42 The Times L.R., 725).

The action was brought by the appellants, who were sugar refiners, to obtain a decision as to the validity of certain exceptional rates charged by the respondent companies, under the Railways Act, 1921, for the carriage of sugar from Silvertown to Leicester during what was known as the transitional period. The appellants contended that the respondents were not entitled to charge them, for sugar in four-ton lots, any rate in excess of the sum of 22s. 8d. per ton, or for sugar in five-ton lots any rate in excess of 22s. 6d. per ton, without first obtaining the sanction of the Railway Rates Tribunal.

In June, 1926, the respondents gave notice of their intention to increase the four-ton rate to 24s. 1d. and the five-ton rate to 24s. Those increases were objected to by the appellants as being contrary to the provisions of section 60 of the Railways Act, 1921, and as a breach of certain agreements entered into by the respondent companies.

The action was brought as a test case to question the right of the railway companies to raise their rates in the manner proposed. The actual amount at stake in the action was 13s. 2d., but the amount involved by the decision was said to be about £25,000,000.

In September, 1920, the base rates previously charged were raised by the Minister of Transport by 100 per cent., together with a flat rate of a shilling per ton. That order affected not only the normal base rates, but also the "exceptional rates" which the companies charged to certain traders for carriage over certain distances, according to the particular mode of conveyance or the volume of traffic carried. Those exceptional rates formed about 80 per cent. of the rates charged, and amounted in number to about 80,000,000. By the Railways Act, 1921, the existing railway companies were amalgamated into four groups, and a new Court was formed called the Railway Rates Tribunal, which, as regards questions of rates, took the place of the Railway and Canal Commission. The control of the Minister of Transport over the railways was to cease on August 15, 1921, and the companies were to prepare a new classification of merchandise and new schedules of rates (to be called standard charges), which were to be approved by the Tribunal.

Those new standard charges were to come into force on a day to be fixed by the Tribunal called the "appointed day," but the preparation of the classification and schedules had proved a much longer task than was expected, and the "appointed day" had not yet been fixed. The Act contained stringent provisions as to existing exceptional rates, which were either to be agreed between the companies and the traders or to be fixed by the Tribunal, and provisions were made as to new exceptional rates.

Section 60, upon which this appeal really turned, contained the transitory provisions until the appointed day, under which the existing rates were to be continued as in force on August 15, 1921.

The material parts of section 60 were as follows:—

"A . . . railway company which is liable to have applied to it a schedule of standard charges shall, notwithstanding anything contained in any special or general Act or in any agreement, be entitled till the appointed day to make such charges . . . as were in force as respects the railway on the 15th day of August, 1921, or, where no such charges were in force on that date, then such reasonable charges as shall, in case of difference, be determined by the Rates Tribunal:

"Provided that at any time after the said 15th day of August, and before the appointed day,

"(i.) Any representative body of traders may apply to the Rates Tribunal to reduce the aforesaid charges or any of them . . ."

Sub-clause (ii.) gave a similar right to a single trader, and (iii.) a right to a railway company to apply for an increase.

Under that section the Federation of British Industries, a representative body of traders, in May, 1922, applied to the Rates Tribunal to reduce the rates, and an arrangement was made with the companies whereby the rates were reduced from 100 per cent. to 75 per cent. above the old base rates, and the flat rate per ton was reduced from 1s. to 6d. In May, 1923, the companies voluntarily reduced the rates to 60 per cent. above the base rates. In July, 1923, on a further application by the Federation of British Industries, an arrangement was made by which the rates were reduced to 50 per cent. above the base rates. On neither of these applications was any order made by the Tribunal, except that by consent the applications were dismissed.

One question which arose in the action was whether the arrangement made in July, 1923, constituted a binding legal agreement that the rates then fixed should continue until the appointed day unless varied by the Tribunal, as the appellants contended, or whether, as the companies contended, they were at liberty at any time to raise those rates provided that they did not exceed the rates in force on August 15, 1921.

On June 12, 1926, all the railway companies gave notice that as from June 29, 1926, the exceptional rates charged under the arrangement would be increased to the level of 60 per cent. above the base rates. To this the traders objected, and by arrangement the action was brought as a test case. The appellants contended that, apart from the question of the nature of the arrangement made in July, 1923, the companies had no power under section 60 of the Act of 1921 to raise any rate which had been reduced unless they had the consent of the Railway Rates Tribunal. The companies contended that the rates mentioned in the section were only maximum rates, and that they were entitled to raise any rate that had been reduced, without application to the Tribunal, provided that it did not exceed the maximum.

A further special question arose between the appellants and the respondent companies. Before July, 1923, the companies had charged the appellants for the conveyance of sugar from Silvertown to Leicester the same exceptional rate in whatever manner the goods were conveyed; but after that date they agreed to carry sugar, if sent in consignments of five tons or more on a truck, at a slightly lower rate, i.e., 22s. 6d. per ton instead of 22s. 8d. The appellants claimed that that was a new exceptional rate which, under section 37 of the Act of 1921, could be varied only by the Railway Rates Tribunal. The respondent companies contended that there was a rate in existence on August 15, 1921, for the conveyance of sugar in five-ton trucks which was the same as in the case of other modes of conveyance, and that the reduced rate was only a favour granted and that they were entitled to raise it like any other rate.

Mr. Justice Astbury found for the respondents on both points. On the main question he thought that the companies were entitled to reduce their rates, and, having reduced them, to raise them again without applying to the Tribunal, provided that they did not exceed the maximum in force in August, 1921.

The Court of Appeal (the Master of the Rolls, Lord Justice Sargant, and Lord Justice Lawrence) affirmed the decision of the learned Judge.

Mr. W. A. Greene, K.C., and the Hon. Stafford Cripps appeared for the appellants; Sir John Simon, K.C., Mr. Macmillan, K.C. (of the Scottish Bar), and Mr. Bruce Thomas for the respondents.

The Lord Chancellor.—My Lords, the facts of this case and the effect of the statutes and orders which preceded the passing of the Railways Act, 1921, have been stated with admirable lucidity by Mr. Justice Astbury; and it is unnecessary to recapitulate them.

The first and principal question to be determined on this appeal is whether on the true construction of section 60 of the Railways Act, 1921, the respondent railway companies were entitled in the month of June, 1926, to increase the exceptional rate of 22s. 8d. per ton then chargeable by them for the carriage of sugar in lots of not less than 4 tons from Silvertown to Leicester, to 24s. 1d. per ton. The case is a test case and the decision of this question will affect a large number of rates.

Section 60 of the Act of 1921 provides in its first paragraph that "A constituent, subsidiary, or amalgamated company, or any railway company which is liable to have applied to it a schedule of standard charges"—a description which includes the two respondent companies—"shall, notwithstanding anything contained in any special or general Act or in any agreement, be entitled till the appointed day to make such charges in connexion with the carriage of merchandise and passengers or otherwise as were in force as respects the railway on the fifteenth day of August, nineteen hundred and twenty-one; or, where no such charges were in force on that date, then such reasonable charges as shall, in case of difference, be determined by the Rates Tribunal." Then follows a second paragraph containing a proviso to which I will refer later. If the paragraph which I have quoted stood alone, there could, I think, be no doubt as to the right of the railway companies to make the increase in question. That paragraph authorizes a railway company falling within its provisions to make, until the appointed day (which has not yet arrived), such charges in connexion with the carriage of merchandise as were in force on its railway on August 15, 1921; and it is unquestionable that this authority is sufficient to entitle a company to charge in respect of any class of merchandise a rate lower than the rate obtaining on that date. Nor, apart from the proviso to be mentioned later, could there be a doubt as to its authority to raise a rate so lowered to a higher sum so long as the rate in force on August 15, 1921, is not exceeded. A company which is declared to be entitled to charge a certain rate is not bound to charge the whole of that rate, but is at liberty to charge a lower rate and to vary that rate within the limits fixed. Now the rate in force on August 15, 1921, for the carriage of a 4-ton lot of sugar between the stations named was 30s. 6d. per ton, and that was the rate originally charged under the section. It was lowered by stages—first to 26s. 4d., then to 24s. 1d., and finally to 22s. 8d. per ton; and it was this last rate of 22s. 8d. which, in June, 1926, the companies raised to 24s. 1d. per ton. The last mentioned sum was, of course, well within the maximum, and apart from the effect to be given to the proviso, would unquestionably be within the power conferred by the section.

But the appellants contend that the proviso contained in the second paragraph of the section makes it necessary to put a different construction upon the first paragraph. That proviso is in the following terms: "Provided that at any time after the said fifteenth day of August, and before the appointed day, (i.) any representative body of traders may apply to the Rates Tribunal to reduce the aforesaid charges or any of them; (ii.) any trader interested in any particular charge may apply to the Rates Tribunal to reduce that charge; (iii.) any such company may apply to the Rates Tribunal to increase the aforesaid charges or any of them; any such application shall be published in such manner as the Rates Tribunal prescribe and the Tribunal after hearing all parties whom they consider entitled to be heard may make such modifications in the said charges or any of them as to the Tribunal may seem just, and shall fix a day upon which the modifications are to come into force." The contention of the appellants is that the expression "the aforesaid charges" which appears in headings (i.) and (iii.) of this proviso includes any charge made by a railway company under the authority of the first paragraph of the section, although such charge may be lower than the charge for the same service which was in force on August 15, 1921, and may not be a charge determined by the Rates Tribunal under the concluding words of the first paragraph; and that the provision under heading (iii.) that a company "may" apply to the Rates Tribunal to increase any of "the aforesaid charges" is imperative and means that a company must so apply before increasing any charge for the time being in force. This contention was supported by the argument that, if the expression "the aforesaid charges" is to be confined to the maximum charges referred to in the first part of the first paragraph and charges fixed by the Tribunal under the second part of that paragraph, then no direct application can be made for the reduction or increase of any lower charge whether voluntarily made by a railway company or fixed by an order of the Tribunal. It is absurd, it is said, that if traders desire to have a charge below the maximum reduced, they should be compelled to apply for a reduction of the maximum. Reference was also made to the provisions of section 1 of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1894, which cast upon a railway company the burden of proving that an increase of a rate, if challenged, was reasonable, and to the construction put upon that section in the North Staffordshire case (23 The Times L.R., 418; [1907] 2 K.B., 191), and it was argued that the Legislature would never have allowed that section—which was wholly repealed by section 86 of the Act of 1921—to be so set aside without providing in its place some equivalent safeguard against an unreasonable increase of rates.

My Lords, these contentions—with others—were pressed upon your Lordships by Mr. Wilfrid Greene in a very able argument, and no doubt they have considerable force. But having carefully considered them more than once, I am not persuaded that the powers conferred upon the railway companies by section 60 of the Act are limited in the manner suggested. That section provides in clear and unequivocal terms that a company shall be entitled during the transition period before the appointed day to make such charges as were in force on August 15, 1921, that is to say, immediately before the passing of the Act—a power which authorizes the company to make any charges within that maximum; and there are no words in the proviso which expressly cut down the authority so given. The words "the aforesaid charges" in heading (iii.) of the proviso are no doubt somewhat ambiguous, and it may be a question whether they include a charge fixed by the Tribunal under the proviso itself. But that question does not arise in this case, and it is unnecessary now to determine it; for the words quoted have an adequate content if applied to the maximum charges referred to in the first paragraph of the section, and I can see no sufficient justification for extending them to every charge which a railway company may voluntarily impose. If it had been the intention of the Legislature to forbid a railway company to raise any charge (though below the maximum) without the sanction of the Tribunal, an express provision to that effect would surely have been found in the section, and it would not have been left to the Courts to spell out such a prohibition from a clause which in terms only authorizes a company to apply for an increase of the maximum itself. The repeal of section 1 of the Act of 1894, even as to the transition period, appears to me to be an argument in favour of the freedom to fix rates during that period for which the railway companies contend. In my opinion the argument on the contruction of the section fails.

A separate point was raised as to the increase by the respondent companies of an exceptional rate for the carriage of not less than five tons of sugar loaded in one truck between Silvertown and Leicester, which was first entered in the rate books in the month of July, 1923, from 22s. 6d. to 24s. per ton. It was said that this five-ton truck rate, having affixed to it a new condition as to loading, was a new rate not in force on August 15, 1921, and accordingly fell within the second branch of the first paragraph of section 60, and could not be raised without the sanction of the Tribunal. In my opinion this contention was not made good. There was in force on August 15, 1921, a rate for the carriage of five tons of sugar between the stations mentioned—namely, the four-ton lot rate already referred to; and accordingly—whether the five-ton truck rate is regarded as a new rate or not—the words in section 60, "where no such charges were in force on that date," have no application to such a consignment.

Lastly, it was said that the respondent companies are precluded, by an agreement entered into in consideration of the withdrawal by the Federation of British Industries of an application for a revision of rates in or about August, 1923, from raising the rates as then settled; but for the reasons given by Mr. Justice Astbury and the Court of Appeal I am of opinion that there is no substance in this argument. In my view there is no evidence of any agreement at all having been entered into by the London and North-Eastern Railway Company, and while I am disposed to think that the London Midland and Scottish Railway Company did, in August, 1923, agree with the Federation of British Industries to reduce their rates to the level then specified—namely, 50 per cent. above the base rate, together with a flat rate—I am satisfied that they did not bind themselves to maintain the reduction until the appointed day. In any case I fail to see how the appellants, between whom and the Federation of British Industries the relation of principal and agent is not shown to have existed, can enforce any contract entered into by the respondents with the Federation.

For these reasons I am of opinion that this appeal fails, and I move your Lordships that it be dismissed with costs.

Mr. Macmillan.—Will your Lordship permit me to say that the parties are agreed that there shall be no order as to costs in this case, if it please the House?

The Lord Chancellor.—Then I move your Lordships that the appeal be dismissed.

Lord Atkinson.—My Lords: I concur.

Lord Shaw of Dunfermline.—My Lords: I concur. I reserve my opinion on one subsidiary point. I am not prepared to say that if a binding agreement had been made between the railway companies and the Federation, that could not be founded upon by individual traders composing the Federation as a ground of individual action and success thereon.

Lord Sumner.—My Lords: I agree that this appeal fails.

The right of the railway companies to make the charges in question ultimately depends on the construction of section 60 of the Railways Act, 1921. The section confers a power, and the enjoyment and exercise of that power are not subjected expressly to any supervision or control. The railway companies have made charges in connexion with the carriage of sugar which are within the amounts to which that power extends. They are within those in force on August 15, 1921. Prima facie, the companies were within their rights in doing so. Up to this point the words are quite clear.

In the rest of the section provision is made for the case where no such charges were in force on that date, and there is a triple proviso dealing with three cases, of which the first and third are material. Is the meaning of the earlier words cut down or modified thereby? I think not. Let it be that "the aforesaid charges" must have the same meaning throughout the proviso, and that the words mean all the aforesaid charges. I ask myself whether, so construed, there is anything in them so inconsistent with the earlier words as to control them. My Lords, I find nothing. Traders and companies can both go to the Tribunal to ask for alterations, down or up, in the maxima—namely, the charges of August 15, 1921, aforesaid. The working of this instead of a direct appeal against the actual charge may, so far as traders are concerned, seem cumbersome, though in practice it presents little difficulty, but it gives an adequate meaning to the words, grammatically natural and actually consistent with the earlier words in their ordinary meaning. The suggested anomalies in applying the proviso to others of the aforesaid charges do not, in my opinion, justify any implication which would go beyond that ordinary meaning or restrict it. As a matter of construction I think, as the Courts below thought, that your Lordships ought not to adopt it.

No doubt it is true that the policy of this section departs signally from the policy of the Act of 1894 in the matter of fixing charges, for what reasons (except that they were wise ones) I cannot tell, but unless there is real ambiguity in the section this consideration cannot be resorted to.

As regards the five-ton load rate, I do not think it falls within the second limb of the enabling section. It cannot be predicated of the subject matter of this charge—namely, the carriage of sugar from Silvertown to Leicester—that no charge was in force on August 15, 1921. Consignments of at least five tons and carriage of them in one truck are incidents conditioning this subject matter. It is admitted that a mere reduction in the money charge would not prevent it from being a "charge in force" on August 15, 1921, and, in my opinion, stipulations for these conditions as the price of the reduction have no greater effect. The appellants' real contention is that the words of the section mean, in the case of an exceptional rate, a specific rate duly entered and published in the rate book. The section, however, says nothing about this, nor, in my opinion, have the statutory provisions for keeping rate books and publishing entries therein any such effect.

My Lords, it may be that the results of the interpretation of this section, which are thus arrived at, were not appreciated by the parties interested in 1921. They may be a surprise to the companies and a disappointment to the traders, but we have nothing to do with that. The Act is the thing.

As to the alleged agreement the appeal fails. The letters carefully avoid pledging the companies to any particular duration for the rates in question. The application to the Tribunal which dealt with duration was expressly withdrawn, and no corresponding stipulation was obtained from the companies themselves. Both sides, in my opinion, were alive to this, and took their chance of the result. Furthermore, there is no evidence that the Federation of British Industries had any authority to establish privity of contract between the appellants and the companies. They had a locus standi before the Tribunal to ask for orders which might have benefited the appellants, but that is quite a different thing from being agents authorized to bring about several contracts on which individual traders could sue in their own names. The fact that the appellants are subscribers to the Federation is as irrelevant as their position would have been if the Federation had been a limited company and they had held shares in it.

Lord Carson.—My Lords : I agree.

GEORGE BANHAM AND CO., LIMITED, AND OTHERS v. F. REDDAWAY AND CO., LIMITED, AND ANOTHER.*

Trade Marks — Registration — Distinctiveness—Red lines woven into canvas fire hose—Goods manufactured for export only—Trade Marks Act, 1905 (5 Edw. VII., c. 15), s. 9 (5)—Trade Marks Act, 1919 (9 and 10 Geo. V., c. 79), s. 7.

Application was made to register as a trade mark for canvas fire hose three red lines or stripes woven into the hose. The mark had been used by the applicants for many years in connexion with woven fire hose which they manufactured and marked in this country for export, but they had never used, and did not intend to use, the mark in this country otherwise than by attaching it to goods manufactured for export, the applicants' reason for desiring registration here being to facilitate registration in other countries, and the grounds of their application being that the mark was in itself distinctive and that it had not been used by others. The applicants called evidence to show that the mark had come to be identified with their goods in America and Germany, and they offered at the hearing to submit to a limitation confining the use of the mark to goods for export to the United States and Canada. The Registrar refused the application on the ground that, though the identical arrangement of coloured lines had not been used in this country, the mark was not adapted to distinguish the applicants' goods, in view of the use of one or more lines by other manufacturers in the same trade in this country to denote quality or ownership, as distinguished from origin.

Held, that there was no ground for interfering with the discretion of the Registrar on the question of distinctiveness and that therefore the registration of the mark, if for use in this country, was rightly refused, and that it did not become registrable by reason of the applicants' having consented to a condition that they would use it only in certain countries abroad.

This was an appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal (41 The Times L.R., 527 ; [1925] Ch., 693), reversing an order of Mr. Justice Tomlin (41 The Times L.R., 337).

In October, 1921, the respondents, who were manufacturers of belting and canvas fire hose, applied to have registered as a trade mark for canvas fire hose in class 50 a mark consisting of three parallel red stripes of a particular width and form extending throughout the whole length of the hose. The application was opposed by several firms of rival manufacturers, most of whom were the present appellants, on the grounds, (1) that registration of the trade mark would interfere with the use, by the opponents, of similar arrangements of parallel red stripes which they were lawfully using ; (2) that the trade mark was common to the trade ; and (3) that the trade mark was not, in fact, distinctive.

The mark in question was adopted by the respondents mainly for the purposes of their export trade to the United States and Canada. It had been used on the hose which had been exported on a large scale to those countries for 40 years, and had also been used to a considerable extent on hose exported to Germany. It had not been used in the United Kingdom. At the hearing of the opposition the respondents offered to submit to a limitation confining the use of the mark to goods for export to the United States and Canada.

The Registrar refused the application on the ground that the mark was not adapted to distinguish the applicants' goods, in view of the use of one or more red lines in the same trade for the purposes of denoting quality or ownership, as distinguished from origin, and his decision was affirmed by Mr. Justice Tomlin.

The Court of Appeal (the Master of the Rolls, Lord Justice Warrington, and Lord Justice Sargant) reversed Mr. Justice Tomlin's decision. They were of opinion that the evidence of the user in the United States and Canada was relevant to the question whether the mark was adapted to distinguish the applicants' goods ; that the mark was adapted to distinguish the applicants' goods in the export market for which it was desired to register it ; and that no confusion would result from the registration.

Mr. Whitehead, K.C., and Mr. Trevor Watson appeared for the appellants ; Sir Duncan Kerly,

K.C., and Mr. Moritz, K.C., for the respondents; and the Attorney-General (Sir Douglas Hogg, K.C.) and Mr. Dighton Pollock for the Registrar of Trade Marks.

VISCOUNT DUNEDIN.—My Lords: On October 29, 1921, the respondents (Reddaway and Co.) applied for registration of a trade mark. The mark was to be used in connexion with hose for conveying water, and consisted of three parallel red stripes or lines extending the whole length of the hose. The application was opposed by the appellants, who are also manufacturers of hose, as they alleged that in the circumstances the mark was not distinctive and ought not to be registered. The Registrar refused to register the mark. Appeal was taken and his decree was confirmed by Mr. Justice Tomlin. Appeal was taken to the Court of Appeal, who reversed the decree of Mr. Justice Tomlin, and remitted the case to the Registrar to proceed to register the mark, with a note based on a concession of the respondents that it should only be used in Canada and the United States. Appeal has been taken to your Lordships' House, and the Attorney-General has intervened, wishing that the original determination of the Registrar should be confirmed. Evidence was led before the Registrar at great length, and additional evidence was led before Mr. Justice Tomlin.

For the purposes of this judgment it is, I think, only necessary to state five points, which the evidence, as I read it, disclosed:—

(1) There had been no use of the mark by the applicants on goods sold in this country. It was, therefore, an application based on the view that the mark in itself was distinctive, that it had not, as the applicants alleged, been used by others, and that it ought to be registered.

(2) The applicants are already the registered holders of a trade mark used in the same class of goods. It consists of two blue lines with a red one between them parallel and running the whole length of the hose. This registration was granted by Mr. Justice Warrington in 1914 upon evidence that this mark had been used by the applicants in this country and had become, by user, identified in the market with their goods.

(3) It was proved that the use of lines and stripes running the length of the hose was prevalent among many users of hose, and that they were in some cases put on hose at the order of the customer, either to indicate the ownership of the hose or to distinguish one set of hose from another. Instances of the former case are supplied by the Admiralty, who order hose to be supplied to them with a line of a particular colour showing a different colour for different manufacturers, and instances of the latter by some fire authorities, who have a distinguishing set of lines to discriminate the hose belonging to one fire engine from hose belonging to another.

(4) The applicants led evidence to show that the mark for which registration was asked had been used by them in America, Canada, and Germany and had come to be identified with their goods in those countries.

(5) Though three red lines had not been used by any manufacturers in this country, two and four red lines had so been used.

My Lords, the registration of a proposed trade mark is not an absolute right. It is a privilege, a privilege which, in certain circumstances, so far approximates to an absolute right that it must be granted. But, in cases where there is at least a question whether the proposed trade mark fulfils the conditions laid down by the Act, it is not an absolute right. This was laid down in this House very clearly so long ago as 1890 in the case of Eno v. Dunn (6 The Times L.R., 379; 15 App. Cas., 252). No doubt that case was decided upon the Patents, Designs, and Trade Marks Act of 1883, but the provisions as to the position of the Comptroller are really identical with the provisions as to the position of the Registrar under the Trade Marks Act of 1905. There was in that case a divergence of opinion on the merits, but on the point for which I cite it there was unanimity. Thus, Lord Halsbury, Lord Chancellor, who was in the minority, says (page 254):—

"While I agree that no absolute right to the registration of a trade mark is given to an applicant for registration, the meaning and intent of the statute itself is that, unless for some of the reasons contemplated by the statute there is an objection to the registration, the trade mark ought to be registered."

Lord Watson, who was in the majority, said (page 256):—

"The statute nowhere confers an absolute right to register a trade mark."

"The case was argued on behalf of the respondent as if he had an absolute right to have any trade mark registered which was not proved to fall within the terms of either the 72nd or 73rd section of the Act" [these were the "calculated to deceive" sections]. "I do not so read the statute. Those sections prohibit the registration of a trade mark in certain specified cases; but there is no duty cast upon the Comptroller of registering every other trade mark that may be applied for. On the contrary, whilst he is in certain cases prohibited from registering, a discretion whether to register or not appears to me to be in all cases plainly conferred. Of course this discretion must be reasonably and not capriciously exercised."

Lord Macnaghten (page 263) speaks of the Comptroller "to whom in the first instance is committed the 'discretionary power,' as it is termed in the Act (section 94), of registering a trade mark." Section 94 is the section corresponding to section 53 in the present Act.

Now, it is true that an appeal lies from the decision of the Registrar, but, in my opinion, unless he has gone clearly wrong, his decision ought not to be interfered with. The reason for that is that it seems to me that to settle whether a trade mark is distinctive or not—and that is the criterion laid down by the statute—is a practical question, and a question that can only be settled by considering the whole of the circumstances of the case. I look upon the word "distinctive" in the Act not as a scientific definition which may be explained and commented on by Judges, but rather as the indication of a practical standard to which the Registrar is bound to conform. I quote the words used by Lord Shaw in Registrar of Trade Marks v. W. and G. Du Cros, Limited (29 The Times L.R., 772; [1913] A.C., at p. 631):—

"I should describe the duty of the Registrar as this: that examining the particular facts, he has also to survey the possible confusions or difficulties which might arise in consequence of the grant of the trade mark, or the possible impairment of the rights of innocent traders to do that which, apart from the grant, would be their natural mode of conducting their business."

itself, if used as a trade mark, is likely to become actually distinctive of the goods of the person so using it. The applicant for registration in effect says, 'I intend to use this mark as a trade mark, i.e., for the purpose of distinguishing my goods from the goods of other persons,' and the Registrar or the Court has to determine before the mark be admitted to registration whether it is of such a kind that the applicant, quite apart from the effects of registration, is likely or unlikely to attain the object he has in view. The applicant's chance of success in this respect must, I think, largely depend upon whether other traders are likely, in the ordinary course of their business and without any improper motive, to desire to use the same mark, or some mark nearly resembling it, upon or in connexion with their own goods."

The fact which influenced the Registrar here was the clearly proved use, by other traders, of lines running the length of the hose. He treated it, as I think he should have treated it, as a practical question. Lord Justice Sargant says that the marks so used were not trade marks, but the relevancy of them, to my mind, is not whether they were trade marks, but that they were marks, and, as they were ordinarily used as such, the Registrar came to be of opinion that there would not be distinctiveness in the mark sought to be registered by the applicants.

My Lords, the cause of my disagreement with the Court of Appeal lies, (1) in the fact that they did not look at the question from what I think was the right point of view, i.e., whether the Registrar had really gone so wrong as to make it necessary to interfere with his discretion; and (2) in the fact that they considered the matter exclusively from the point of view of whether it could be said that the mark was calculated to deceive, leaving out the further question as explained by Lord Herschell in the passage above quoted.

Now, if the mark is one to which registration has been rightly refused if for use in this country, does it become registrable because the applicant consents to a condition that he will only use it in certain other specified places? I think Mr. Justice Tomlin was right when he said: "I think, first, that 'adapted to distinguish' means 'adapted to distinguish in this country,' having regard to the practice and conditions of trade here." It is one thing to limit the use, if desired, of a trade mark registered in this country by declaring that it is only to be used in certain countries besides this; it is quite another to try to make a mark, ex hypothesi unregisterable here, effective as a trade mark elsewhere by saying that its use would be confined to certain other specified countries. The whole idea of a trade mark register is for use in this country, and I cannot think that merely affixing the mark in this country when ex hypothesi that mark when affixed cannot be used in this country at all meets the intendment of the Act.

One word as to the evidence led that the mark had by user the significance of denoting the appellants' goods in other countries. Here, again, I agree with Mr. Justice Tomlin, who says: "Though evidence of user in another country may be some evidence of an inherent quality of distinctiveness, it cannot be evidence that the mark is adapted to distinguish in the market of this country."

I am therefore of the opinion that the appeal should be allowed and the judgment of Mr. Justice Tomlin and the Registrar restored.

The other noble and learned Lords concurred.

K.B. Div. } 1926.
(Horridge and MacKinnon, JJ.) } Dec. 16.

DOULIN v. PARCELL.*

Landlord and Tenant—Restrictions—Decontrol — Lessee in possession — Part of dwelling-house lawfully sublet—Sublease after July 31, 1923—Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923 (13 and 14 Geo. V., c. 32), s. 2 (1).

Section 2 of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923, subsection 1, provides: "Where the landlord of a dwelling-house to which the principal Act applies is in possession of the whole of the dwelling-house at the passing of this Act . . . then from and after the passing of this Act . . . the principal Act [i.e., the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920] shall cease to apply to the dwelling-house: Provided that, where part of a dwelling-house to which the principal Act applies is lawfully sublet, and the part so sublet is also a dwelling-house to which the principal Act applies, the principal Act shall not cease to apply to the part so sublet by reason of the tenant being in or coming into possession of that part. . . ."

Held, that the words in this proviso, "where part of a dwelling-house . . . is lawfully sublet" refer to the time at which the question arises whether the part of the dwelling-house is decontrolled, and not to the date of the passing of the Act.

Where, therefore, a tenant who was in possession of the whole of a dwelling-house on July 31, 1923, the date of the passing of the Act, and subsequently sublet four rooms in the house at a rent within the Rent Restrictions Acts, those four rooms were "sublet" within the meaning of the proviso and were protected by the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920.

This was an appeal from an order of Judge Hargreaves, sitting at Bow County Court, directing that certain rooms let by the appellant landlord, Mr. F. Parcell, to the respondent tenant, Mr. Ernest Doulin, in the landlord's house, 52, Queen's-road, Hoe-street, Walthamstow, came within the Rent Restrictions Acts, so that the rent agreed to be paid by the respondent to the appellant was liable to be readjusted by apportionment.

By an agreement in writing dated November 24, 1922, Mr. Parcell took the whole of the premises, 52, Queen's-road, a six-roomed house, on a three years' agreement, under which he paid a rent which, with rates and insurance, amounted to £2 12s. 6d. a week. In November, 1924, he sublet four of the rooms in the house to Mr. Doulin at a rent of 25s. a week, and in March, 1925, he bought the freehold of the house. In August, 1926, Mr. Doulin applied to the Registrar of the County Court to apportion the rent of the whole premises, so as to determine the rent of the rooms which he occupied. The Registrar accepted the contention made on behalf of Mr. Parcell, that the four rooms in question had never come within the Rent Restrictions Acts, and he dismissed the application. On appeal, Judge Hargreaves reversed the Registrar's decision and remitted the matter to him to make an apportionment. No part of the house had been let as a separate dwelling before November, 1924.

Mr. H. C. Leon appeared for the appellant; Mr. John Duncan for the respondent.

After argument on behalf of the appellant, the following judgments were delivered.

Mr. Justice Horridge.—I do not feel any doubt about the meaning of the first proviso to section 2, subsection 1, of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1923. When that Act came into force on July 31, 1923, the whole of the premises were in the possession of the appellant who was then the tenant of them under an agreement. After the passing of the Act the appellant let the four rooms now in dispute to the respondent and it was contended in the Court below that those four rooms did not constitute a dwelling-house within the meaning of the Rent Restrictions Acts.

It has been argued that, on the true construction of section 2, subsection 1, and the first proviso to it, the rooms occupied by the respondent were "decontrolled" owing to the fact that the appellant was in possession of the whole of the premises at the date of the passing of the Act of 1923. The appellant was clearly in possession of the whole of the premises at that date and, therefore, if the first part of the section stood alone, the premises would obviously have become "decontrolled." But then comes the first proviso. Mr. Leon has argued that the words in the proviso "is lawfully sublet" mean "is, or has been, at the time of the passing of this Act lawfully sublet," and, therefore, that the four rooms occupied by the respondent, not having been sublet at the time of the passing of the Act, did not fall within the proviso.

To my mind the words "is lawfully sublet" are merely a description of the position at the time when the question arises. In other words, the proviso might have begun in the following terms: "Provided that, where there is part of a dwelling-house to which the principal Act applies lawfully sublet. . . ." That being so the question is whether the dwelling-house consisting of the rooms occupied by the respondent was sublet at the time when the question involved in the present proceedings arose. It was so sublet and, in my opinion, therefore, it was not "decontrolled," but still came within the Rent Restrictions Acts. This appeal fails and must be dismissed with costs.

Mr. Justice MacKinnon.—I agree. There is a small point which distinguishes this case from Catto v. Curry (42 The Times L.R., 243; [1926] 1 K.B., 460). That distinction is that in Catto v. Curry (supra) there was a subsisting subletting on July 31, 1923, the date when the Act of 1923 came into force, whereas in this case, though the appellant was in possession of the premises on July 31, 1923, the rooms in question were sublet for the first time in November, 1924. In the circumstances a point which did not arise in Catto v. Curry (supra) arises here—namely, what is the proper meaning of the word "is" in the first part of the first proviso to section 2, subsection 1, of the Act of 1923?

Mr. Leon argues that that "is" means "is, or has been, at the date of the passing of this Act." The counter proposition is that it means "is or shall be." I think that the natural meaning of the word in this Act of Parliament is the latter and that the proviso should be read as if it were: "Provided that, where part of a dwelling-house to which the principal Act applies is, or shall be, lawfully sublet. . . ."

If there is any doubt on the point I think that it is removed by the later use in the proviso of the words "shall not cease to apply to the part so sublet by reason of the tenant being in or coming into possession of that part." "Being in" seems to refer to the date of the passing of the Act and, therefore, to indicate that the subletting contemplated by the proviso may begin after that date.

For these reasons I think that the decision in this case must be on the same principle as that in Catto v. Curry (supra)—namely, that the rooms occupied by the respondent were within the proviso and that the Rent Restrictions Acts still applied to them. This appeal fails and must be dismissed.

Prob., Divorce, and Adm. Div. (Lord Merrivale, P.) — 1926. Dec. 17.

GIFFORD v. GIFFORD AND FREEMAN.*

Divorce — Connivance — Husband's petition — Collusive agreement between husband and co-respondent—Dismissal of suit—Second petition naming same co-respondent—Charges of adultery subsequent to first petition—Effect of agreement—Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925 (15 and 16 Geo. V., c. 49), s. 178.

The petitioner filed a petition for divorce on the ground of his wife's adultery with the co-respondent, and it was disclosed to the Court that the petitioner and the co-respondent had agreed (1) that the co-respondent should pay the petitioner £2,500 damages, of which £1,750 was to be paid down and the rest later, and (2) that the petitioner should claim no further damages from the co-respondent and should put no obstacles in the way of a decree nisi being made absolute. The petition was therefore dismissed on the ground that the suit was collusive. After the dismissal the respondent and the co-respondent continued to live in adultery, and the petitioner, who had received the £1,750, presented a second petition against them, complaining of the adultery since the date of the former petition.

Held, that the petitioner had by the agreement prevented himself from complaining of any adultery whether past or future, and that therefore he had connived at the adultery of which in his second petition he complained, and the second petition must be dismissed.

* Reported by Clifford Mortimer, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Alan Cecil Gifford, an estate agent, of Boundary-road, St. John's Wood, prayed in this undefended case for the dissolution of his marriage with Phyllis Kenward Gifford, on the ground of her adultery with Leonard George Freeman.

After hearing the evidence, his LORDSHIP dismissed the petition.

Mr. Noel Middleton appeared for the petitioner.

The PRESIDENT said :—This is a husband's petition for divorce, in which he alleges acts of adultery by his wife with the co-respondent, Freeman, on various dates in the years 1925 and 1926. In the main, his petition is based on a charge that from the month of March, 1926, until the date of the petition, i.e., July 28, 1926, the respondent and co-respondent have lived and cohabited as man and wife at an address in East Sheen. This is the second time that the petitioner has approached this Court in respect of the alleged adultery of his wife with Freeman.

On April 30, 1925, he filed a petition, in which he alleged that in the early part of that month his wife and Freeman had committed adultery together at an hotel. On the hearing of that petition it appeared that the petitioner and Freeman had been in communication while the petition was pending, and that they had made an agreement with regard to the conduct of the case, and that as part of that agreement a sum of £1,750 was paid to the petitioner, and arrangements were made for the payment of a further sum of £750 by the co-respondent. That fact came to the knowledge of the petitioner's solicitors, whose duty was then to disclose it to the Court, and, that fact being disclosed, it was obvious that of necessity the petition must be dismissed, because the suit was collusive.

The present petition was then filed, alleging further adultery by the respondent with the co-respondent.

In considering this case it is the duty of the Court, under the provisions formerly contained in the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, and now contained in section 178 of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, to satisfy itself both as to the facts alleged and also that the petitioner has not been accessory to, or connived at, the respondent's adultery, and if, on the evidence, the Court finds that he has been an accessory or conniving, then the Court is bound to dismiss the petition. I have to determine here whether the agreement itself and the conduct of the parties make it manifest that the petitioner has been accessory to and connived at the adultery committed by his wife since the date of his former petition. I recognize that the duty of the Court may be a cause of disappointment and vexation to a suitor, but the law stands as I have stated it.

The respondent and co-respondent were desperately anxious that the past of the respondent, as regards illicit sexual relations, should not become matter of public knowledge. There has been some discussion recently of the effect of public knowledge of the proceedings of this Court, and I am proceeding in this case in such a manner that the facts may come to public knowledge.

The petitioner, it is said, resisted vehemently for a time the approaches of the co-respondent, but eventually an interview took place and a conversation occurred, the effect of which he has stated. The co-respondent said that he was anxious that the public should not become aware of the respondent's past, and said that he wanted to find out what amount of damages the petitioner ought to receive. The petitioner said that £5,000 would not be too much, but, before he left, that demand was reduced by one-half. In order that there should be no doubt as to the position of the petitioner and co-respondent, a letter was typed out by the petitioner's typist. That letter has been put in evidence, and shows that, in order to agree damages, the figure of such damages was put at £2,500, £1,750 of which was to be paid down, and the remaining £750 to be paid on or before a date five months in advance. Then came the passage : "Of course this is subject to your not claiming any further damages from me, and to your putting no obstacles in the way of a decree nisi being made absolute."

After the dismissal of the former petition the respondent and co-respondent continued to live in adultery, and it is of the adultery since the date of the former petition that the petitioner now complains. It is obvious that by the agreement he had prevented himself from complaining any more of adultery, whether that adultery was past or future. He had received £1,750 and he has spent it. In that state of things, can it be said that the petitioner has not connived at the adultery of which he complains ? Once and for all he has bargained away his claims, and they have been met by an agreement and payment of a sum of money. It is impossible to say that he did not connive, and his petition must be dismissed.

It is said that it is not generally known by the public that a man who deals with his marital relations as this petitioner has done is disabled from obtaining relief from this Court. If people do not know that, they ought to know it, and the means of publicity which are still available for proceedings in this Court should be used for the necessary purpose of dispelling that ignorance, if it exists. For my own part, I confess that I do not believe that the average English citizen, whether he possesses a pound or a penny, is in any doubt as to the effect of behaviour of this kind.

WHYTE, RIDSDALE AND CO., LIMITED v. ATTORNEY-GENERAL.*

Safeguarding of Industries — Dyestuffs — Synthetic organic colouring matter—Prohibition of import—Artists' colours—Small proportion of prohibited matter—Commercial impossibility of use for other purposes—Whether within the prohibition—Dyestuffs (Import Regulation) Act, 1920 (10 and 11 Geo. V., c. 77), ss. 1, 2 (1).

Section 1 of the Dyestuffs (Import Regulation) Act, 1920, which prohibits the importation, except under a licence granted in accordance with s. 2 (1), of "all synthetic organic dyestuffs, colours and colouring matters," includes in the prohibition artists' colours which are enclosed in toy paint-boxes and which contain a proportion of synthetic organic colouring matter, even though the proportion is so small that it would not pay to extract it and use it for any other purpose.

* Reported by E. K. CORRIE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

This was an action by the plaintiffs, Whyte, Ridsdale and Co., Limited, against the Attorney-General for a declaration that two notices issued by the Board of Trade on October 1, 1925, and January 21, 1926, under the Dyestuffs (Import Regulation) Act, 1920, were unauthorized and illegal.

By section 1 of the Act of 1920 it was provided :—

"(1) With a view to the safeguarding of the dye-making industry, the importation into the United Kingdom of the following goods, that is to say, all synthetic organic dyestuffs, colours and colouring matters, and all organic intermediate products used in the manufacture of any such dyestuffs, colours, or colouring matters shall be prohibited.

"(2) Goods prohibited to be imported by virtue of this Act shall be deemed to be included among the goods enumerated and described in the Table of Prohibitions and Restrictions Inwards contained in section 42 of the Customs Consolidation Act, 1876, and the provisions of that Act and of any Act amending or extending that Act shall apply accordingly."

By section 2 (1) the Board of Trade have power, by licence, to authorize, either generally or in any particular case, the importation of any of the goods, or any class or description of the goods, prohibited to be imported by virtue of the Act of 1920.

The Board of Trade published in the Board of Trade Journal of October 1, 1925, the following notice to importers :—

"Dyestuffs (Import Regulation) Act.

"Licences for Artists' Colours and Materials.

"The Board of Trade desire to draw the attention of importers to the fact that the open general licence which was in force under the above Act in respect of the importation of artists' colours and materials of synthetic organic origin when fully made up and ready for use as such (including paint-boxes) has now been revoked, and consequently individual licences will be required in connexion with each consignment of these materials which it is desired to import.

"Applications for licences, which must in all cases be obtained before the shipment of the goods to this country, should be made on the prescribed form to the Dyestuffs Advisory Licensing Committee, 53, Spring-gardens, Manchester.

"Similar individual licences will in future be required in respect of the importation of copying ink pencils and other coloured pencils in which the colouring matter concerned is of synthetic organic origin."

The Board of Trade published in the Board of Trade Journal of January 21, 1926, an amending notice purporting to be issued under the Act of 1920.

"Dyestuffs (Import Regulation) Act.

"Licences for Artists' Colours and Materials.

"The Board of Trade announce that as a result of consideration which has been given to certain representations which have been made to them in connexion with the importation of copying ink pencils, and other coloured pencils of synthetic organic origin, a notice regarding which appeared in the Journal of October 1 last, it has been decided that for the present licences will not be required under the Dyestuffs (Import Regulation) Act, 1920, in respect of these materials.

"Similarly, an open general licence has been issued under the above Act covering the importation of all paint-boxes containing paints of synthetic organic origin provided that the value of each box proposed to be imported does not exceed 6d. Consequently individual licences for specific consignments will not in future be required for paint-boxes (complete and ready for use) not exceeding a maximum value of 6s. a dozen. Licences will, however, continue to be necessary for all consignments of these paint-boxes which exceed the maximum value referred to above, and applications for licences should be made in the prescribed form to the Dyestuffs Advisory Licensing Committee . . . before the goods are shipped to this country."

The plaintiffs, who were importers of artists' materials, claimed that these notices were not authorized by the Act of 1920, because the amount of synthetic organic dye in the articles mentioned in the notices was very small and impossible to use for any purposes in the dyeing trade. The fact of having to obtain licences for each individual importation would seriously hamper them in their business. Even though the second notice rendered licences unnecessary for copying ink pencils and cheap paint-boxes, the fact that they were once included in the substances for which a licence was necessary would unsettle and disturb trade.

Mr. Comyns Carr, K.C., and Mr. W. M. R. Pringle appeared for the plaintiffs ; the Attorney-General (Sir Douglas Hogg, K.C.) and Mr. Dighton Pollock for the defendant.

It was contended for the plaintiffs that the Act was not intended to apply to articles which contained a very small quantity of synthetic organic dye which could not be extracted and used for any other purpose. The notices went beyond what the Board of Trade were entitled to direct.

Mr. Ernest John Parry, B.Sc., an analytical chemist and a member of the Bar, said that he had specialized in the chemistry of pigments. Nearly all the colours used were synthetic except carmine and non-synthetic indigo. The essence of dyeing was that it permeated stuff and formed a chemical combination. To recover the dye from paints in the boxes in question would not be a commercial proposition. Synthetic organic dyes were used for textile purposes and for staining and colouring foodstuffs where permanence of colouring was required. The synthetic organic colouring matter in paints had practically lost its identity owing to the difficulty in recovering it.

Mr. Kiley, a member of the plaintiff company, said that the plaintiffs imported a large quantity of the goods mentioned in the notices. They did not import artists' colours for serious purposes. They did a re-export trade. The paints were imported from France and Germany ready for use. He explained the inconvenience caused to his company by the requirement of licences for the paints.

The Attorney-General said that as the copying ink pencils had not, since January 21, 1926, required individual licences there should be no declaration made on what was an abstract point. The object of the Act of 1920 was to protect the British dye-making industry, which had been established during the war, as being a vital industry. Under section 1 of the Act the Court had not to decide whether the colours would compete with the dye industry. They were not allowed to be imported without a licence. The colours and colouring matters in question were included in the Act by Parliament, as distinct from dyes for materials.

Mr. Edward Armstrong, F.R.S., managing director of the British Dyestuffs Corporation, said that synthetic organic colours were mainly made from coal-tar products. Dyestuffs were usually sold, whether imported or made in England, of a standard strength which could be diluted as required.

Synthetic organic colours could be used for colouring food. British dyestuffs were used for artists' colours.

MR. COMYNS CARR, K.C., in reply, said that the Board of Trade were protecting not the dye industry but the paint-box industry.

MR. JUSTICE ASTBURY in the course of his judgment read the pertinent sections of the Act and the notices, and said that a committee had been appointed to grant licences under the Act. The plaintiffs, who were a company importing copying ink pencils, and paint-boxes more or less of the nature of toys costing two shillings or half a crown, asked him to declare that the Board of Trade notices were invalid.

As far as the copying ink pencils were concerned, the notice requiring licences for them had been withdrawn before the action was commenced, and in the exercise of his discretion he declined to make a declaration in a case where, at the issue of the writ, the plaintiffs were in no way interested. As to the rest of the matter, the paint-boxes of artists' colours were admitted to contain a proportion, even if very small, of synthetic organic dye. The plaintiffs submitted that the object of the Act was to protect the British dyemaking industry, and argued their case on the footing that the colours in question contained so small a proportion of synthetic organic matter that its recovery was not a commercial proposition and that it did not fall within the Act. It was not within his province to decide whether the Board of Trade had acted wisely or unwisely.

It was plain that the plaintiffs imported colours containing specific organic matter. It was true that the paint-boxes as imported by the plaintiffs contained very small parts of specific organic colours or colouring matters, but they were imported as colours or colouring matters to be sold as such. That being so it was impossible for him to declare generally as asked, that such colours did not fall within the Act. Evidence had been called, though it was hardly necessary, and Mr. Parry and Mr. Armstrong were in agreement on all [illegible] matters. He did not think that the value of the pain[illegible] matters. He did not think asked to make a general decl[illegible] mattered. He was colours were not prohibited under th[illegible] that case the Act plainly prohibited the impoe Act[illegible] of any synthetic organic colours or colouringatio[illegible]tters except under licence. The action was misconceived, and must be dismissed.

Prob., Divorce, and Adm. Div. (Hill, J.) } 1926. Dec. 10.

THE VALSESIA.*

Ship—Salvage—Duties of contracting parties—Salvage prevented by negligence of crew of ship—Damages.

The masters of the plaintiffs' tugs orally contracted with the master of a steamship—which after stranding and sustaining great damage had refloated on the flood tide—to render salvage services to the ship by towing her to a named spot and beaching her. Owing, however, to the negligence of the servants of the shipowners in failing to slip, at the proper moment, an anchor by which the steamship was being held, the tugs were unable to perform the contractual services, and the vessel again went aground.

Held, that there was an implied obligation on each party to the contract to act with ordinary skill and care in carrying out his share of the combined work, and that the plaintiffs, having been prevented by the negligence of the shipowners' servants from performing the contract, were entitled to recover in personam against the shipowners, as damages, the amount which but for such negligence they would have earned under the contract.

This was an action brought by the owners, masters, and crews of the steam tugs Bantam Cock and Prairie Flower against the owners of the Italian steamship Valsesia, her cargo and freight, for sums alleged by the plaintiffs to be due to them under a salvage agreement, or alternatively for a salvage award for services rendered.

At about 10 a.m. on August 25, 1926, during a dense fog, the Valsesia, which was bound to Barry Dock with a cargo of coal, went ashore at Friar's Point, Barry Island, and sustained damage. On the succeeding flood tide the vessel refloated and swung to her starboard anchor, which had been let go shortly before the stranding. Thereupon an agreement was entered into orally between the master of the Valsesia and the masters of the Bantam Cock and Prairie Flower by which, as the Court found, the tugs agreed to beach the Valsesia in Whitmore Bay. In order to enable this to be done it was necessary that, at the proper time, the anchor by which the Valsesia was being held should be slipped, but, as the Court further held, owing to the negligence of those on board the steamship the anchor was not slipped at the proper time, the tugs were unable to reach the Valsesia, and the vessel again grounded on Mr[illegible]ear Friar's Point and broke her back.

Thompso[illegible] Neilson, K.C., and Mr. G. H. Main Langton, k[illegible] appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. G. P. [illegible] and Mr. Lewis Noad for the defendants.

MR. JUSTIC[illegible] launched against HILL.—The plaintiffs' claim is and her cargo, and [illegible]wners of the steamship Valsesia to the ship and cargo under a contract. The respect of services rendered contract, or that the sum August 25 and 26, 1926, tugs was as the plaintiffs a[illegible]dants do not deny the the condition was different fro[illegible]ble to the plaintiff plaintiffs. The plaintiffs say that but they say that to render such services as they p[illegible]t set up by the substance, to do their best, but th[illegible] were employed that the condition was that the tugs [illegible]med, and, in to beach the vessel. expressed or not—that what was contemplated was that they should assist in getting the Valsesia on to the beach in Whitmore Bay, which is a little safe bay very close to Friar's Point and between it and Nell's Point further up the channel. That operation was not effective, and in the result, after some hours' work, the Valsesia grounded once again, after the tide had turned, on the same rocks, very nearly in the original position, so that she was in no better position than when the tugs took off. She had not been beached, and she was in no better position than she had been before. Therefore if it had been an ordinary claim for salvage the tugs would have been entitled to nothing because there had been no success. The first question I have to consider is the question as to what was agreed. There is a direct conflict of evidence as to this. It was all done orally—by hailing—between the ship and the tugs. The point which is made is, Was it stated that the money was to be paid for beaching the ship, or was it not stated at all? Unless it was stated, then the work for which the money was promised was not a definite work at all for any measured service in point of either time or duration. Undoubtedly it was in everybody's mind that the assistance of the tugs was for the purpose of beaching the ship in Whitmore Bay, and nobody contemplated anything else. The pilot of the Italian ship and the master had talked it over, and they did not contemplate anything else, and in view of that fact it is feasible that a matter which was in everybody's mind should not be specifically mentioned. On the other hand, there was some independent evidence, and that independent evidence supported the defendants' account of the conversation. The conclusion to which I come on the question of fact is that the promise or the contract was for £300 and £150 respectively either for putting the ship on the sands or for beaching the ship on the sands. But that does not, in my view, at all dispose of this case upon the facts as they have come out in the course of the case. If there was nothing else at all the plaintiffs clearly would not be entitled to recover, because it was a contract for a lump sum in respect of a completed work, and the work was not completed. But there is the question why the work was not completed. Both parties to the agreement knew that the intended operation which was in the common contemplation of both of them was the beaching of the steamer on the sands of Whitmore Bay, and both of them contemplated that the tugs would be used in that operation. Both knew that the anchor of the steamship was down, and that in order to carry out the intended operation it would have to remain down up to a certain point and then be slipped, and they all knew that unless it were slipped at the proper moment the operation must fail. Now with that knowledge in their minds they agreed to carry out this operation. In my view there was implied in such an agreement as this the obligation of each towards the other at least to act with ordinary skill and care in carrying out each his part in the combined work. It was the duty of the tugs to obey the orders of those who were in command of the ship, and to use skill and care in the handling of the tugs, and it was equally the duty of those in charge of the ship to use ordinary skill and care in carrying out their part of the contract, which in this case was the slipping of the cable at the right time, and, indeed, that was the essential part which the ship was to play in the combined operation. It was in that duty of slipping the cable that those on board the ship completely failed, with the result that the cable was not slipped. The tugs had got the ship into the position contemplated by the pilot as the position where the cable ought to be slipped, but, as I have said, the cable was not slipped. While they were trying to cut the cable—and they ultimately succeeded, after a long time, in doing so—the slack water had passed and the tide had turned, and then it is probable, as there was an exceedingly strong tide, that the tugs were no longer able to come up to the ship. But the pilot agreed, and the men on the tugs agreed, that, if the cable had been slipped when the pilot ordered it to be slipped, then the contemplated operation would have been carried to a successful conclusion, and the ship would have been beached in safety in Whitmore Bay.

The effect of these facts upon the legal position has been put in more than one way, and I am not satisfied that, apart from negligence, the failure to slip the cable would enure to the benefit of the plaintiffs or would entitle them to say they could still recover the agreed sum. But I clearly think that, if the failure to slip was due to negligence on the part of those on board the ship, then the plaintiffs must be entitled in one way or another to be put in the same position as they would have been in if that negligence had never occurred and if those in charge of the ship had carried out their duty towards the two tugs. I doubt very much whether the plaintiffs—apart from the ground of negligence and breach of contract by the defendants—can say: "We must be treated as if we had performed the contract, and we are entitled to recover the £300 and the £150," and I doubt that very much, because I find a difficulty in saying that anybody can ever recover a lump sum to be paid in respect of a completed work when, in fact, that work has not been completed. But if they were prevented from completing it by the negligence of those on board the ship, and if they were thereby deprived of the right to earn the stipulated sums, then they are entitled to damages for the breach of the shipowner through his agents, and in this case the damage would be exactly commensurate with the stipulated sums because the plaintiffs had really, and in substance, completed the whole of what they had undertaken to do. They had probably been saved no expense by reason that they were not able to complete the work. Therefore this issue remains: Has it been established that the shipowner, through his agents, was guilty of negligence? Such negligence has to be a breach on the facts as I have stated them of the implied undertaking towards the tugs. Now prima facie it seems to me that the failure to slip was the result of negligence. The pilot contemplated that the cable would be slipped, and the tugs contemplated it—everybody contemplated that it would be slipped, and it was not slipped. Now that seems to me to be prima facie evidence of negligence, and the Elder Brethren—as far as it is a matter of seamanship and therefore for them—are of opinion that everything in a well-found ship should be in a position to be slipped in an emergency, if it is something that can be slipped; but even apart from that, my own view, fortified as it is by the view of the Elder Brethren, is that the fact that the slipping in quite the ordinary way of ship working was not done when ordered by the pilot to be done, is some evidence of negligence, and puts upon the defendants the duty of showing that the failure to slip arose without any negligence on their part. They have, in my view, wholly failed to show that it arose without negligence on their part, and, indeed, it seems to me, looking at the evidence of the pilot, that it arose by reason of and in consequence of some negligence on the part of the defendants. Now, it being taken that it was an essential part of the operation that the cable at the proper time should be slipped, the cable ought to have been so disposed of that it could be properly slipped. It is said that it was so attached at the bare end that it could not be slipped, or, if slipped at all, only with very great difficulty. If that were the fact, then preparations ought to have been made so that it could be slipped some links short of the bare end. The Elder Brethren advise me—and I am entirely of their opinion—that at and after the time when the tugs were engaged—up, at any rate, to the time when nearly all the cable had been paid out—preparations could have been made to secure that the cable should be slipped at the right moment. I have asked myself the question, how can it be that the failure to slip should be due to anything else but negligence? I do not think it could be due to anything else but that, and I find that it was due to negligence. The result is, assuming the true view of the law to be that the plaintiffs are not entitled to recover the £300 and the £150 under the contract as money earned, that they are entitled to recover the same amount as damages in so far as the defendants by the negligence of their servants prevented the plaintiffs from earning these amounts.

Now the only other question that I have to consider is against whom the claim can be made. In my view, I am not at all certain that the contract can be regarded as having been entered into on behalf of the ship and cargo; I am inclined to think that such a contract can be regarded only as having been entered into by the shipowner. But, be that as it may, I cannot find that the negligence of those in charge of the ship was negligence in any other capacity than as servants of the shipowner, and therefore I think I cannot give judgment against anybody except the shipowner, and that must be a judgment in personam, because an action arising out of the negligent performance of such a contract as this, in my view, does not give rise to a right in rem. Therefore this is an action in personam. A little difficulty arose just towards the end of the case as to whether judgment can proceed against the owners in personam, but that only arises from the unfortunate fact of the writ being directed against the owners of an Italian steamship—the Valsesia—and to that writ appearance was entered by some of the defendants in this case. But the defence that was delivered in reply to the claim was obviously a defence, so far as it went, on behalf of the owners of the ship, because it was pleaded by the defence that the statement of claim disclosed no case against the cargo, but did not plead that it did not disclose a case against the shipowner. Although that was the form in which appearance was entered, it was, in fact, an appearance entered for those who appeared as the owners of the Valsesia. The only alternative is to pronounce that no appearance has been entered by the owners of the Valsesia, and in that case the plaintiffs would be in a position to obtain judgment in default of appearance, but I do not think that is the real position. The real position is that the defendants appear as owners of the Valsesia, and judgment in personam can go against them. Therefore I think it will be judgment in personam against the owners of the Valsesia in respect of the sums of £300 and £150 respectively, with costs, and I dismiss the claim against the cargo owners.

Court of Appeal.
(Lord Hanworth, M.R., Atkin and Lawrence, L.JJ.)
1926. Dec. 16.

MORGAN v. LIVERPOOL CORPORATION.*

Landlord and Tenant—Repairs—Liability on landlord—Disrepair—No notice by tenant to landlord—Right of landlord to enter and inspect—Damage to tenant—Non-liability of landlord for damage—Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920 (10 and 11 Geo. V., c. 17), s. 2—Housing Act, 1925 (15 Geo. V., c. 14), s. 1.

Neither s. 2 of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, which implies the liability of a landlord to do repairs where he has raised the rent under that section, nor s. 1 of the Housing Act, 1925, which enacts that, where the rent is less than a certain sum, there shall be implied "an undertaking that the house will be kept by the landlord, during the tenancy, in all respects reasonably fit for human habitation," imposes upon the landlord, even where he has a right to enter the premises for the purpose of inspection, any liability for damage caused to the tenant by a want of repair of which the tenant has not given him notice.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Presiding Judge of the Liverpool Court of Passage. It raised a question on the meaning of section 1 of the Housing Act, 1925, which enacted that in the case of the letting of small houses (the rent not exceeding £40 in London and £26 elsewhere) there should "be implied a condition that the house is at the commencement of the tenancy, and an undertaking that the house will be kept by the landlord during the tenancy, in all respects reasonably fit for human habitation."

The plaintiff was the tenant of a house belonging to the defendants. The rent before the war had been 5s. 6d. a week, but had been raised to 8s. 1d. under the provisions of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920. On March 26, 1926, owing to the breaking of a window cord, a window fell upon the plaintiff's hand, inflicting some injury. The plaintiff brought an action for damages, contending that by reason of the broken window cord the defendants had failed to keep the house "fit for human habitation" within the meaning of section 1 of the Housing Act, 1920, and were therefore liable for the damage suffered. The Presiding Judge found for the plaintiff and awarded him £24. It was admitted that the tenant had not given notice before the accident of any defect in the window cord.

The defendants appealed.

Mr. Singleton, K.C., and Mr. W. Clothier appeared for the appellants; Mr. Raleigh Batt for the respondent.

The MASTER OF THE ROLLS, in giving judgment, said that the plaintiff had put forward three grounds to support his claim:—(1) A breach of the covenant for quiet enjoyment; (2) failure to keep the premises in good and tenantable repair; (3) neglect to maintain them "fit for human habitation." Points (2) and (3) arose in connexion with the liability of landlords of houses of that class under the Housing Act, 1925, and the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920.

The appellants argued that the facts did not put them under the liability sought to be imposed upon them under the Acts; and that, even if it were so, they were not in fact liable, because no notice had been given of the lack of repair. The point of giving notice was essential in the case, but it would be as well to express an opinion on the other points, lest it should be supposed that if the tenant had given the notice he would have been able to recover.

As regarded the expressions used in the Act of 1925, he (the Master of the Rolls) asked himself whether the fact that a window cord was broken was evidence that a house was not "fit for human habitation." The Judge below had attached importance to the words "in all respects" in section 1 of the Act of 1925, but it must be remembered that it also contained the word "reasonably." Although the two terms might seem antagonistic, one had to exercise common sense.

He did not wish to say anything which would cut down the responsibility of landlords for the condition of houses like that of the plaintiff, yet the breaking of a window cord was an accident which might take place at any time and in any class of house; it was an ordinary incident in the habitation of a house and did not appear to be of much assistance in determining whether the house was or was not fit for human habitation.

His Lordship then dealt with the claim that the appellants had failed to keep the house in good tenantable repair within the meaning of the various Rent Restriction Acts, and in particular within the scope of section 2 of the Act of 1920, which implied a liability for repairs upon a landlord who had raised the rent. Continuing, he said that even if the respondent could establish that proposition, and could assert the liability to repair the window, yet even then it was difficult to say that if a window cord broke the premises were not in good and tenantable repair. On the whole, he could not agree with the Judge of the Court of Passage that there was that liability upon the appellants in respect of the slight mishap which had occurred.

But, more than that, it had long been the law that when there was a liability upon the landlord to keep a house in repair, the tenant, to make the landlord liable for resultant damages, must give notice to him of whatever was out of repair, because the tenant would naturally know better what the condition of the premises was. The principles of that rule were laid down by Lord Sumner in Murphy v. Hurley (38 The Times L.R., 386; [1922] 1 A.C., 369, at p. 389). It was said that that rule only applied where the landlord had no right to enter the premises for the purpose of inspection, and that here the appellants had an agreement with the tenant by which they were entitled to enter and inspect; but Lord Russell of Killowen, in Broggi v. Robins (15 The Times L.R., 224), had held that there must be notice in any case. In Murphy v. Hurley (supra) it was clearly laid down that in a case like the present notice should be given, even if the landlord had a right of access. The appeal must therefore be allowed, with costs.

Lord Justice Atkin said that he agreed, and, unfortunately, upon the only ground upon which all three members of the Court were agreed—namely, that notice was required before liability of the landlord existed. As regards the Housing Act of 1925, while no one could say that the mere fact that one cord, or two cords, were broken necessarily put a house in a state unfit for human habitation, yet in a certain class of house, inhabited by a certain class of person, and under the peculiar circumstances of a case like the present, a different conclusion might be arrived at. The argument of the counsel for the respondent commended itself to him (the Lord Justice)—namely, that if the state of repair of a house were such that by ordinary user damage might be caused to the occupier, either by injury or prejudice to health, then the house was not "in all respects reasonably fit for human habitation," and if that were the correct test, then the facts seemed to bring the present case within the definition. There was certainly the question of health to be considered. If a man had a house with many rooms and windows, it might well be that one window not opening properly would not matter, but in dealing with a working-class house with only two bedrooms, occupied by man, wife, and children, the question whether the window would or would not open had an important bearing upon the question whether the room or house was fit for human habitation.

But as regards the alleged liability of the landlord to keep the house in good and tenantable repair and the Rent Restriction Acts, he (Lord Justice Atkin) could not agree that section 2, subsection (5), of the Rent Restriction Act of 1920 imposed a new liability upon the landlord. The provision that the landlord should be deemed to be responsible for any repairs for which the tenant was under no express liability seemed to be merely a statutory answer to the question which must be asked in order to determine whether a landlord might raise the rent or not—namely, whether the landlord was responsible for the repairs, or part of the repairs. He (Lord Justice Atkin) thought that that was very far from creating a statutory liability on the landlord by the tenant. In the ordinary case of houses of the sort in question nobody would have contracted to do any repairs; there might be an implied agreement by the landlord to keep the premises watertight, but that would be about the extent of it. If the landlord in fact did the repairs then he could demand a higher rent, but he (the Lord Justice) could not think that the Act of 1920, for the first time, was imposing a statutory obligation, in excess of the existing obligation of the contract of tenancy, upon the landlord. Upon the whole, therefore, it seemed that the only clause which bound the landlord was that in the Housing Act, 1925.

But the liability of the landlord to do repairs did not come into existence until he had notice of a defect. The tenant had occupation of the house, and it would be unjust to impose an obligation upon a landlord in respect of matters of which he had no knowledge. There were many defects in a house which arose quite suddenly, such as leaks in pipes, &c., and it would be intolerably harsh to make a landlord liable for damage resulting from such an occurrence when he had had no notice. Nor did the power of access, extensive though it might be, take away from the condition inferred by the Courts that liability was only to arise after notice.

Lord Justice Lawrence said that he could not concur in the finding of the Judge below that because window-cords were defective and broke therefore the house was not fit for human habitation. In the case of Jones v. Geen (41 The Times L.R., 311; [1925] 1 K.B., 659) Mr. Justice Salter said that the effect of section 1 of the Act of 1925 was that the house must be decently fit for human beings to live in, and he (Lord Justice Lawrence) could not agree that a defective window-cord rendered a house unfit for human habitation within the ordinary meaning of the expression.

As regards the liability under section 2 of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, he regretted that he could not see eye to eye with the other members of the Court, and if the question had depended upon that liability he should have taken time to consider it. But upon the question of the necessity for giving notice he was in complete agreement with the other members of the Court, and the appeal must therefore be allowed with costs.

KOECHLIN ET CIE. v. KESTENBAUM BROS.*

Bills of Exchange—Indorsement—Signature of payee—Bill drawn in France—Acceptance in England—Indorsement in France by payee's agent in agent's own name—Sufficiency by French law—Action by indorsees—Whether acceptors liable on bill—Bills of Exchange Act, 1882 (45 and 46 Vict., c. 61), ss. 32 (1), 72 (1).

A bill of exchange was drawn in France by E. V. upon the defendants in London to the order of M. V., and the defendants accepted it. It was indorsed in France to the plaintiffs by E. V. with the authority of M. V., but the signature was not expressed to be for M. V., and on presentment the defendants declined to pay the bill as it did not bear the indorsement of M. V. In an action by the indorsees against the acceptors evidence was given that a valid indorsement might be made according to French law by an agent signing his own name if he was so authorized by the payee.

Held, that though by s. 72 (1) of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, the validity of the indorsement "as regards requisites in form" was governed by French law, this provision did not let in the French law so as to dispense with the signature of the payee as required by s. 32 (1), and the plaintiffs could not recover.

This was an action in which Messrs. F. Koechlin et Cie., of 53, Rue de Châteaudun, Paris, sued Messrs. Kestenbaum Bros., of 21, Manchester-avenue, Aldersgate-street, E.C., for £461 10s. 10d., as acceptors of a bill of exchange for 60,000 French francs, dated December 14, 1925, and alleged by the plaintiffs to have been drawn by M. Vigderhaus, payable at the end of February, 1926, to the order of M. Vigderhaus and indorsed by him to the plaintiffs, together with interest and notarial charges. The bill was both signed and indorsed by E. Vigderhaus, the son of M. Vigderhaus, and the signature was not expressed to be for M. Vigderhaus, but evidence was given that E. Vigderhaus had authority to sign for his father and frequently did so in his own name without the words "for M. Vigderhaus."

The defendants denied that M. Vigderhaus was the drawer and that he had duly indorsed the bill to the plaintiffs ; and they alleged that the plaintiffs were not holders of the bill in due course.

Mr. H. du Parcq, K.C., and Mr. R. F. Levy appeared for the plaintiffs ; Mr. Macaskie for the defendants.

* Reported by J. W. Hall, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Mr. Justice Rowlatt delivered the following judgment :—The bill upon which this action is brought was drawn in France by E. Vigderhaus upon the defendants in London to the order of M. Vigderhaus. It was sent to the acceptors, and returned accepted payable at a London bank. It was presented for payment on behalf of the plaintiffs, or of a subsequent indorsee, but it did not bear the indorsement of M. Vigderhaus, the original payee, the first indorsement being "E. Vigderhaus." This indorsement was affixed, on behalf of M. Vigderhaus, in France, and by his authority, and the bill was negotiated in France. The question is whether the plaintiffs can recover on the bill against the acceptors.

Evidence was given on behalf of the plaintiffs by a French lawyer, who deposed that a valid indorsement might be made according to French law by an agent signing his own name if so authorized by the payee. Although I admit that this evidence surprised me, it was not contradicted, and I accept it for the purpose of this judgment. It is to be observed that the signature was the signature of the drawer of the bill, who happened to be the agent employed in this case, but the signature might have been that of a total stranger to the bill if such a person had been authorized.

By section 31, subsection 3, of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, a bill "payable to order" is negotiated by the indorsement of the holder and completed by delivery. By section 32, subsection 1, the indorsement must be written on the bill itself and signed by the indorser. The contract, therefore, of the acceptor of a bill "payable to order" is to pay a holder only if the bill bears by way of indorsement the signature of the payee. This bill, on inspection, does not bear such signature, and, prima facie, the acceptors have never contracted to pay it in that condition.

But it is said that section 72, subsection 1, imposes this liability upon them on the ground that it is a question of the "validity as regards requisites in form" of the indorsement, which is governed by French law. In my view, this subsection does not let in the foreign law to dispense with the signature of the payee written on the bill itself, which section 32, subsection 1, requires, just as I do not think that foreign law could be let in to declare that a bill "payable to order" could be transferred by mere delivery or by writing contained in an independent document. If the foreign law of the place of indorsement declares that something more is necessary, that requirement must be observed.

If a forged indorsement becomes, under the law of the place, effectual by subsequent negotiation of the bill to a bona-fide holder for value without notice, as was the case in Embiricos v. Anglo-Austrian Bank (21 The Times L.R., 268 ; [1905] 1 K.B., 677), that will be effectual here, though not by virtue of this subsection, as it is not a question of validity as regards a requisite in form. But no case seems to me to suggest that an acceptor can be called upon to overlook the absence of an apparent chain of regular indorsements. The bill does not appear to be in order. In Embiricos v. Anglo-Austrian Bank (supra),

"It may, however, be that the contract of the drawer or acceptor is to pay on any indorsement recognized by the law of England, even though that indorsement be invalid according to what I will call for convenience the local law of England. I am disposed to think that is the true contract."

I think my decision in the present case exactly applies that formula. This is an indorsement not recognized by the law of England. It is not merely an indorsement invalid by that law. I have not overlooked section 72, subsection 2, by which the law of the place of indorsement governs its interpretation. Whatever scope may be assigned to the word "interpretation," there is no indorsement within the meaning of the Act to interpret.

There will be judgment for the defendants, with costs.

METCALFE v. BOYCE.*

Landlord and Tenant—Surrender or assignment of tenancy—By act or operation of law—Substitution of master for servant as tenant—No express notice to determine servant's tenancy—Payment of rent, rates and taxes by master—Advantage of servant—Estoppel—Statute of Frauds (29 Car. II., c. 3), s. 3.

In 1910 the defendant, a policeman, became tenant of a house, paying the rent and rates personally, receiving receipts in his own name and drawing from the police authority a grant in aid of those expenses. In 1912 an Order was made, to the knowledge of the defendant, that in future the Chief Constable would be the tenant of all houses occupied by policemen not in barracks, and that policemen should occupy the houses as servants of the police authority and not as tenants. While no express notice was given either by the defendant or by his landlord to determine the defendant's tenancy, after the date of the Order the rent of the house occupied by the defendant was paid by the police authority through the defendant, the receipts being made out in favour of the authority, and no demands for rates or taxes being made to the defendant, who paid none. Deductions were made from the defendant's pay on account of rent, except during certain periods when quarters were free. In March, 1926, the defendant retired on pension, and the plaintiff, the Chief Constable, who in January, 1926, had signed an agreement with the landlord for the tenancy of the house, obtained judgment for possession in an action in the County Court.

Held, that there was evidence on which the County Court Judge could find that in 1912 the defendant agreed with the landlord and with the plaintiff to surrender his tenancy and in future to occupy the house as a servant of the police authority and not as a tenant, that the landlord agreed to accept the surrender and to take the plaintiff as tenant, and that the plaintiff agreed with the defendant to accept the tenancy from the landlord, to allow the occupation by the defendant as a servant, and to pay the rent, rates and taxes. The plaintiff had undertaken liabilities of which the defendant had had the advantage; and, therefore, the defendant was estopped from denying that there had been a surrender by him of his tenancy by act or operation of law or an assignment thereby of his interest to the plaintiff.

This was an appeal from Yatton County Court.

The facts and arguments appear sufficiently in the judgments.

Mr. Croom-Johnson and Mr. F. Cyril Williams appeared for the appellant (the defendant in the action); Mr. Schiller, K.C., and Mr. Wethered for the respondent.

The Court reserved judgment.

The following judgments were read :—

MR. JUSTICE SALTER.—In this case the plaintiff sued in the Yatton County Court to recover possession of a house, being No. 2, Orchard Cottages, at Blagdon, in the county of Somerset. Judgment was given for the plaintiff and the defendant appeals.

The house in question is the property of Sir George Wills and was tenanted in 1910 by one Skinner, who was the policeman then stationed at Blagdon. In that year Skinner was moved and the defendant was appointed in his place. The defendant became tenant of this house from Sir George Wills on a quarterly tenancy at a yearly rent of £12, payable quarterly, the tenant paying rates and taxes. It is common ground that this tenancy continued until 1912.

In those days the members of the county police force who were not quartered in barracks received a grant in aid of their rent. From 1910 to 1912 the demands for the quarterly rent were addressed to the defendant; he went to the police office and drew the grant to which he was entitled and then paid the rent, taking a receipt in his own name. Demands for rates and taxes were addressed to him and paid by him. He drew his pay in full. In 1912 the county police authority adopted a new system. It was decided that, in future, the Chief Constable should be the tenant of all houses occupied by policemen not in barracks, that the policemen should occupy them as servants and not as tenants, that the Chief Constable should pay all rent, rates and taxes, and that a deduction should be made from the men's pay. This change was announced in a general Order dated April 22, 1912, and it is admitted that the defendant had notice of its terms.

No express notice to determine the defendant's tenancy was given by the defendant or by the landlord. From 1912 onwards the quarterly demands for rent were sent to the defendant addressed to the county authority. The defendant took them to the police office and received the full amount of the rent due. He paid this at the estate office and received a receipt acknowledging payment by the county authority, and sent the receipt to the county treasurer. No demands for rates and taxes were addressed to him, and he paid none. This course of business continued for 14 years. He continued to occupy the house and his name remained on the estate books as tenant. Deductions, varying in amount from time to time, were made from his pay on account of rent. During two periods in the 14 years quarters were free, and at those times no deduction was made from his pay. In 1923 a form of tenancy agreement was sent from the estate office to the defendant and to other occupiers of houses on the estate. They all refused to sign it. At the hearing, the landlord's representative said that the documents had been sent in error.

In November, 1925, the defendant gave notice of his intention to retire on pension. In January, 1926, a tenancy agreement in writing was signed by the landlord and by the plaintiff creating a quarterly tenancy at a yearly rent of £12, payable quarterly, the tenant paying rates and taxes. On March 26, 1926, the defendant retired on pension. He refused, on demand, to give up the house, and the plaintiff, who is and was at all material times the Chief Constable of Somerset, brought this action for possession. It was necessary for him to show that the defendant's tenancy which existed in 1912 had been surrendered or assigned. In the absence of writing it was necessary to show a surrender or assignment by operation of law. The plaintiff's case was that the tenancy had been surrendered or assigned by operation of law in 1912. The learned Judge held, on the evidence, that there had been a valid surrender, or, alternatively, a valid assignment by operation of law in 1912. The question is whether he was right in law.

I think that in view of the evidence and of his note of his decision it must be taken that he drew the following inferences of fact—namely, that in 1912 an arrangement was made between the defendant, his landlord, and the plaintiff, who was his employer ; the defendant agreed with the landlord that he would forthwith surrender his tenancy, and the landlord agreed with the defendant to accept the surrender and to accept the plaintiff as tenant ; the defendant agreed with the plaintiff that he would surrender the tenancy to the landlord and would in future occupy the house as a servant and not as a tenant ; the plaintiff agreed with the defendant to accept a tenancy from the landlord, to allow the defendant to occupy as a servant, and to pay the rent, rates and taxes ; and the plaintiff and the landlord agreed that the plaintiff should become tenant in place of the defendant and on the same terms.

I think that there was evidence on which the learned Judge could draw these inferences of fact. He further negatived the suggestion that the defendant made the above agreements under duress. The Rent Restriction Acts did not then exist, and the change was beneficial to the defendant on the whole. As regards rent, he did not lose but sometimes he gained, and he was relieved from payment of rates and taxes. The grant of a new tenancy by the landlord to the plaintiff, with the assent of the defendant, operated as a surrender of the defendant's tenancy, if the defendant gave up possession to the plaintiff at or about the time of the grant of the new tenancy. In my opinion, the defendant, while remaining in occupation of the house, did give up possession of it to the plaintiff in April, 1912, and the plaintiff took possession and remained in possession by his servant.

In Peter v. Kendal (6 B. and C., 703) it was necessary for the plaintiff to prove that a parol demise of a ferry by him to one Brown had been determined by surrender by operation of law. He proved that Brown, finding the ferry unprofitable, had agreed with him by parol to determine the tenancy and to work the ferry as the plaintiff's servant, and that Brown had then received wages and accounted for the takings. It was held that this effected a surrender of the tenancy by operation of law. A master is in possession of land rented by him and occupied by his servant as such and not as a tenant.

I think that the defendant, in pursuance of his agreement, ceased to occupy as tenant and occupied for his master, the plaintiff. There was, therefore, a good surrender by operation of law, and the appeal fails.

Mr. Justice MacKinnon.—I agree. The plaintiff says that by reason of what happened in 1912 there was either a surrender by the defendant of his interest to Sir George Wills, or an assignment by the defendant of his interest to the plaintiff. The learned County Court Judge seems to have accepted this contention. The only possible ground on which his judgment can be impugned is by the defendant's reliance on section 3 of the Statute of Frauds. And as there was clearly no written surrender or assignment, the sole question is whether the plaintiff can say that there was a surrender or assignment "by act or operation of law." We are told that this question was argued in the Court below, though there is no specific mention of it in the judgment.

I think that the cases cited to us, especially the judgment of Mr. Justice Chitty in Wallis v. Hands (9 The Times L.R., 288 ; [1893] 2 Ch., 75), show that "the act or operation of law" can be relied on when the party who is defending himself with this section 3 is estopped from denying that he has surrendered or assigned his interest. One form of such estoppel arises when a substituted tenant actually takes possession. My brother Salter has pointed out that that principle applies here. I agree that in the circumstances of this case the estoppel of the defendant can be asserted by the plaintiff. For on the facts the plaintiff can say to the defendant : "As a result of what happened in 1912 I have paid the rent every quarter and I have also paid the rates. These are liabilities which I have undertaken in consequence of your assent to my proposal at that time. I have altered my position for the worse, and you, especially with regard to the rates, have taken advantage of my action. You are therefore estopped from now denying the surrender or assignment."

That contention seems to me to have all the necessary ingredients of a plea of estoppel, and, if so, the plaintiff can rely upon a surrender or assignment "by act or operation of law" sufficient to satisfy section 3 of the Statute of Frauds. I therefore agree that this appeal should be dismissed, with costs.

IN RE WAIT—EX PARTE COLLINS.*

Contract—Sale of goods—Specific performance—Purchase of 1,000 tons of wheat to be loaded on named ship—Sale of 500 tons—Arrival of ship with wheat in bulk—Payment—Bankruptcy of vendor—"Specific or ascertained" goods—Sale of Goods Act, 1893 (56 and 57 Vict., c. 71), s. 52.

* Reported by H. Langford Lewis, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

One W. made a c.i.f. contract to buy 1,000 tons of wheat to be loaded in America on a named ship for Avonmouth, and the respondents then made a c.i.f. contract to buy 500 tons of it from him. Subsequently the wheat was shipped in bulk and a bill of lading for the 1,000 tons was received by W. on January 4, 1926, the price being payable on February 6. On January 5 W. delivered to the respondents a provisional invoice for the 500 tons, the price of which, less half the freight payable at destination, was due on February 6. On February 5 the respondents gave W. a cheque for the price of the 500 tons. On February 24 W. was adjudicated bankrupt, and on February 28 the vessel arrived at Avonmouth with the wheat in bulk. On an application by the respondents against the trustee for specific performance of the contract by delivery of the 500 tons on payment of their proportion of the freight,

Held (Sargant, L.J., dissenting), that the 500 tons were not specific or ascertained goods within s. 52 of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, and therefore specific performance of the contract would not be ordered.

Decision of the Divisional Court ([1926] Ch., 962) reversed.

This was an appeal from a decision of a Divisional Court sitting in Bankruptcy ([1926] Ch., 962).

The bankrupt Wait had carried on business in Bristol as a corn dealer. On November 20, 1925, he made a c.i.f. contract, as purchaser, with Balfour Williamson and Co., of London, as sellers, for 1,000 tons of western white wheat to arrive at Avonmouth, per motor-vessel Challenger, expected to load between December 16 and 31, 1925, from Oregon and/or Washington. On November 21, 1925, Messrs. Humphries and Bobbett made a c.i.f. contract with Wait to purchase 500 tons of that cargo of western white wheat.

The wheat was shipped in bulk from Oregon on December 21, 1925, and a bill of lading for the 1,000 tons was issued to Wait and was received by him on January 4, 1926, the purchase price being payable on February 6, 1926. On January 5, 1926, Wait delivered to Messrs. Humphries and Bobbett a provisional invoice for the 500 tons, the price of which, less half the freight payable at destination, was £5,933, due on February 6, 1926. On February 5, 1926, the sub-purchasers gave Wait a cheque for £5,933, and he paid the cheque, with others, into his general account at the bank.

On February 17, 1926, Wait gave notice of suspension of payments, and on February 24, 1926, he was adjudicated bankrupt on his own petition. On February 28, 1926, the Challenger arrived at Avonmouth with the 1,000 tons of wheat in bulk.

On March 3, 1926, the sub-purchasers, Messrs. Humphries and Bobbett, moved before the County Court Judge sitting in bankruptcy for an order that the trustee (then the Official Receiver) might specifically perform the contract by delivery of the 500 tons of wheat sold to them on payment of their proportion of the freight; or, alternatively, that the trustee should repay the purchase price of £5,933.

On March 5, 1926, Mr. Collins was appointed trustee. He was subsequently made a respondent to the motion.

On March 13, 1926, the County Court Judge held that the sub-purchasers could not obtain specific performance of the contract, but were entitled to a return of the £5,933 paid by them. On appeal, the Divisional Court in Bankruptcy (Mr. Justice Astbury and Mr. Justice P. O. Lawrence) discharged that order and declared that the sub-purchasers, the present respondents, were entitled to have the contract specifically performed on payment of £750 as an aliquot share of the freight.

The trustee appealed.

Mr. Jowitt, K.C., and Mr. Croom-Johnson appeared for the appellant; Mr. Luxmoore, K.C., and Mr. Wethered for the respondents.

The MASTER of the ROLLS, in his considered judgment, having stated the principal facts, proceeded. The Divisional Court held that the contract could be specifically performed because the goods were "specific" goods within section 52 of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, and that was the point mainly relied on by the respondents. It was argued that the wheat was "ascertained goods" within section 52 as soon as it was shipped on board the Challenger, because it could and ought to be ascertained upon arrival at Avonmouth, and that upon payment of the purchase price there was an equitable assignment of so much of the wheat as was necessary to satisfy the sub-purchasers' contract. The cases mainly relied on were Holroyd v. Marshall (10 H.L.C., 191); Hoare v. Dresser (7 H.L.C., 290); and Howell v. Coupland (L.R., 9 Q.B., 462; 1 Q.B.D., 258).

Section 52 of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, was a reproduction of section 2 of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856, which empowered the Courts to enforce contracts for the sale and delivery of specific goods. It provided for one of the remedies of the buyer, but did not give any correlative rights to the seller, and its operation remained limited. It applied to all cases where the goods were specific or ascertained, whether the property had passed to the buyer or not (Jones v. Tankerville (25 The Times L.R., 714; [1909] 2 Ch., 440, at p. 445).)

Looking at the history of the matter he could not agree with Mr. Justice Astbury in saying that if the property passed specific performance would not be necessary. The problem to be solved came back to the question—were the 500 tons specific goods? They were never appropriated, and it was admitted that the legal property had not passed to the purchasers. There was no ascertainment or identification of the 500 tons out of the cargo of the Challenger.

The argument for the respondents largely depended on the validity of a dictum of Lord Westbury in Holroyd v. Marshall (supra), which, if premature at the date of its utterance, was now said to be good law by virtue of section 52, and it was that passage which Mr. Justice Astbury mainly relied on. It was as follows (33 L.J., Ch., 193, at p. 196):—

"A contract for the sale of goods as, for example, of 500 chests of tea, was not a contract which would be specifically performed because it did not relate to any chests of tea in particular, but a contract to sell the 500 chests of a particular kind of tea which 'are now in my warehouse in Gloucester' was a contract relating to specific property, and which would be specifically performed."

Those words appeared to indicate specific goods in a specific place.

His Lordship then referred to other cases which had been cited : Wait v. Baker (2 Ex., 1) ; Hayman and Son v. M'Lintock (44 Sc.L.R., 691, at p. 698) ; Thames Sack and Bag Company, Limited v. Knowles and Co., Limited (88 L.J., Q.B., 585) ; and Laurie and Morewood v. Dudin and Sons (42 The Times L.R., 149 ; [1926] 1 K.B., 223). The limitations of the jurisdiction of a Court of Equity to grant specific performance of a contract for sale of goods were recognized by the Master of the Rolls (Sir George Jessel) in Fothergill v. Rowland (L.R., 17 Eq., 132), and recognized and affirmed in In re Clarke (3 The Times L.R., 818 ; 36 Ch.D., 348), where Lord Justice Cotton, at p. 352, said :—

"The ordinary application of the doctrine of specific performance is to compel a vendor or purchaser to complete a contract for sale or purchase, a contract which is wholly executory. Where such a contract relates to goods, the Court will not in general decree specific performance. Why is this ? Because the Court considers that in general damages are a sufficient remedy, and the proper remedy for the breach of a contract to sell or purchase goods, but that does not apply to a breach of a contract relating to land."

Considering the facts of the present case in the light of the authorities, it was, in his Lordship's opinion, impossible to hold that the 500 tons of wheat ex Challenger were specific or ascertained goods, and thus specific performance would not be ordered as the remedy of the buyer under section 52 of the Act. The passage relied on in Holroyd v. Marshall (supra), if taken as reported in the Law Journal, did not conflict with that view. The illustration given depended, said Lord Westbury, on the contract being such that a Court of Equity would decree specific performance of it. The effect of Holroyd v. Marshall (supra) was summarized by Lord Justice Cotton in Joseph v. Lyons (1 The Times L.R., 16 ; 15 Q.B.D., 280).

In Tailby v. Official Receiver (4 The Times L.R., 726 ; 13 App. Cas., 523), Lord Macnaghten, at p. 547, rejected the test apparently intended by Lord Westbury in Holroyd v. Marshall (supra)—"would a Court of Equity decree specific performance ? "—as a measure of the rights of the parties, but he added the qualification that the rights must be completely defined as between the parties to the contract. Here there was no such identification of the "very thing," for the goods were not appropriated nor was their individuality ascertained. Hoare v. Dresser (supra) did not conflict with Holroyd v. Marshall (supra), but Lord Cranworth's words, at p. 317 of Hoare v. Dresser (supra), if they conflicted with the authorities, appeared to be too wide and must be reconsidered. Looking at the present case more particularly from the point of view of equitable assignment, the sub-purchasers could not fulfil the conditions necessary to give them such a right. Howell v. Coupland (supra), which was much insisted on, did not appear to be an authority on the point now in question.

For the reasons which he had given, and upon the authorities referred to, the appeal, in his judgment, must be allowed, the orders of the Divisional Court and of the County Court set aside, and the motion of the sub-purchasers refused with costs here and below. He (his Lordship) desired to add that he much regretted to find that he was differing not only from the Judges in the Divisional Court, but also from Lord Justice Sargant. The question for decision appeared to him to be governed by the mercantile law applicable to a not uncommon contract for the sale of goods.

Lord Justice Atkin said that the case had resulted in a decision which, if correct, would have far-reaching effects upon commercial transactions. That decision had the support of both learned Judges below and also of Lord Justice Sargant, and therefore in expressing the opinion that the decision was wrong he felt bound to examine in some detail the facts and contentions relied on. [His Lordship then stated the facts and proceeded.] It appeared that the debtor had other contracts with other buyers for the purchase from him of further grain—500 tons of western white wheat, and 1,500 tons of northern wheat, all of which was shipped in bulk on the Challenger ; of the western white wheat 1,190 tons were shipped in the after-hold, and 320 tons in No. 2 hold. No 500 tons of wheat had ever been identified, earmarked, or appropriated, as the wheat to be delivered to the claimants under the contract. They had never received any bill of lading, delivery order, or document of title representing the goods. The trustee had 530 tons western white wheat in his possession, and it was not suggested that it was not an ordinary commercial commodity. It was said, however, that the claimants were entitled to have the contract of sale of November 21 specifically performed by a direction to the trustee to deliver 500 tons, or that the transaction had resulted in an equitable assignment to the claimants either of the whole bulk of 530 tons, or at any rate of 500 tons of it, or that they had a charge upon the bulk to secure the sum of £5,933.

In his (his Lordship's) opinion the claimants failed, and the grant of the relief claimed would violate well-established principles of law and equity. It would also affect and seriously embarrass the ordinary operations of buying and selling goods, and the banking operations which attended them. The claim of the claimants to specific performance was based solely on section 52 of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, under which the remedy might be given "in any action for breach of contract to deliver specific or ascertained goods." By section 62 "specific" goods were defined as "goods identified and agreed upon at the time a contract of sale is made." "Ascertained" probably meant "identified after the contract of sale is made." Here at no time were there any goods identified and agreed upon or ascertained. The effect of the Act was that in contracts for the sale of goods the only remedy by way of specific performance was the statutory remedy. It followed that as the goods were neither specific nor ascertained that remedy was not open to the creditors. His Lordship then discussed the decision in Howell v. Coupland (L.R., 9 Q.B., 462 ; 1 Q.B.D., 258), and said that the case had no reference to "specific" or "ascertained" goods for the purpose of passing the property or to specific performance. Decisions on cases before 1893 were not of much value, but he must refer to Hoare v. Dresser (7 H.L.C., 290) and Holroyd v. Marshall (10 H.L.C., 191), in which occurred the dictum of Lord Westbury relied on by the claimants. Its authority was weakened by the criticism of Lord Justice Fry in his work on Specific Performance. He (his Lordship) did not think that there was at any time an equitable assignment which gave the claimants a beneficial interest in the goods. It had been difficult to elicit the moment of time when that beneficial interest came into existence, and in the argument various times had been suggested. He thought (without deciding it) that much could be said for the proposition that an agreement for the sale of goods did not import any agreement to transfer property otherwise than in accordance with the terms of the Act, i.e., that the intentions of the parties were to be derived from the terms of the contract. The rules in the Act appeared to be complete and exclusive statements of the legal relations between the parties, both at law and in equity, though legal or equitable rights might come into existence dehors the contract of sale. He thought that it made no difference that in the present case the creditors had paid their purchase-money in advance of the due date, and in any case before they could get delivery under the contract. In Holroyd v. Marshall (supra) Lord Westbury was not directing his mind to contracts for the sale of goods which ordinarily would not be of the class in which a Court of Equity would grant specific performance. Payment of the price was no doubt material in contracts of sale of real estate as regards the right of an unpaid vendor to a lien on the land for his purchase-money. But that lien of the unpaid vendor could not exist in the case of any ordinary sale of goods; the remedies were defined; the unpaid vendor had a lien which was a possessory lien and a right of stoppage in transitu. But in his (his Lordship's) experience no one had ever claimed or been given as unpaid vendor a right to a lien over the goods in the possession of the purchaser. Similarly a purchaser who had paid the purchase price had never claimed or been given a lien over the property in the hands of the vendor.

It was said, however, that common honesty required that such a beneficial interest should be created. But the test of honesty was inadequate, being both too wide and too narrow; the sphere of honesty was not confined to dealings with beneficial interests in property. Many would think it dishonest deliberately to break a contract for the sale of future goods, but the law only gave a remedy in damages. If the contentions put forward by the claimants were to succeed the whole course of business would be fundamentally affected. Many large business transactions, and nearly all import transactions, were financed by banks or financial houses as this transaction was, and if notices of subsales were notices of equitable assignments the banks would be affected even though by holding the bills of lading or other documents they acquired the legal title to the goods. The effects of the decision below, when once appreciated, would throw the business world into confusion, for credit would be seriously restricted.

He (his Lordship) regretted to differ from the opinion of the Judges below and of Lord Justice Sargant, but he did not think that there was any difference of opinion as to the principles of equity, which were well settled and in their own sphere beneficial. The difference of opinion was as to their application to such facts as appeared in the present case, and he felt bound to repel the disastrous innovation which, in his opinion, the judgments now under review would introduce into well-settled commercial relations. He thought that the appeal should be allowed and the motion dismissed with costs here and below.

Lord Justice Sargant regretted that he could not agree with the other members of the Court, but his disagreement was complete and fundamental. In his opinion there had, before the bankruptcy, been created in favour of Humphries and Bobbett an equitable lien or equitable assignment in respect of the wheat, enforceable against Wait and the trustee in bankruptcy, and preventing the wheat from vesting in the trustee except subject to such equitable right. There was an executory contract for the sale of a definite portion of a definite cargo shipped on a named vessel at a definite period. The trustee in bankruptcy declined to recognize Humphries and Bobbett's title, and left them to prove in bankruptcy for purchase-money which they had already paid. Delivery of 500 tons from any other parcel of wheat than that contracted for would not satisfy the contract.

If they had bought and paid for the entire cargo of wheat they would have been entitled to something much more precise than a mere personal right to enforce delivery. Had Wait threatened to deal with the cargo in any way inconsistent with the sub-purchasers' interests (though they did not), the latter could have obtained an injunction restraining any such dealing. It made no difference to the equitable position that Humphries and Bobbett agreed to buy not the whole 1,000 tons, but only 500. Wait had been careful to dispose only of so much of the 1,000 tons as left 530 tons available to satisfy the equitable obligation.

He thought that there was an overwhelming mass of authority in favour of the proposition that the agreement for sale in the present case was an agreement for the sale of specific goods and amounted to an equitable assignment enforceable in respect of the particular goods, and that the sub-purchasers were entitled to have the 500 tons for which they had paid. The reasoning of Lord Cranworth in Hoare v. Dresser (7 H.L.C., 290) covered the exact point.

It was said that his (his Lordship's) decision was one which would interfere with the ordinary way in which business was conducted, but he could not agree, because ordinary business was not conducted dishonestly, and on any view of the law it would have been dishonest for Wait, after the sale to Humphries and Bobbett, to have sold so much of the parcel as not to leave enough to satisfy the respondents' claim. In his judgment the appeal should be dismissed.

K.B. Div. (Salter and Talbot, JJ.) 1926. Dec. 20.

PUTSMAN v. TAYLOR.*

Contract — Severance — Separate consideration and accord — Independent performance — Agreement by servant not to compete with employer in three different areas—Restraint of trade—Validity—Reasonable necessity to safeguard interests—Circumstances to be considered—Onus of proof.

A valid promise is enforceable although the promisor has made other and void promises supported by the same consideration and included in the same document if it is on the face of the document a separate promise, the subject of separate consideration and accord, and such that its performance is independent of the performance of any other promise made by the promisor. Whether or not a promise is separate depends on its particular language. Severance is an act of the parties, not of the Court.

* Reported by G. F. L. Bridgman, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Where, therefore, a servant agreed with his employer that after the determination of his employment he would not for a period of five years be employed in any capacity by any person, firm, or company carrying on a business similar to that of the employer in three areas in which the employer carried on business,

Held, that the contract not to be employed in any one of the three areas was severable from the contracts not to be employed in the other areas, and breach thereof could be restrained by injunction.

An employer is entitled in a contract of employment to protect himself by a covenant against competition by his servant, provided that the covenant is not wider than is reasonably necessary to safeguard his proprietary interest against unfair use by the former servant of information gained during the service. The question whether such a covenant in restraint of trade is unduly wide, though depending on questions of fact, is a matter of law. The limits in time and space, the nature and duration of the employment, and all the other circumstances must be considered together, the onus being on the employer to show that the covenant is not too wide.

The defendant was employed by the plaintiff, a tailor, as manager and cutter for 12 months certain, the employment being thereafter terminable by one week's notice on either side, and the written agreement between the parties providing that "after a determination of this agreement for any cause whatsoever the manager shall not for a period of five years from the date of such determination . . . be employed in any capacity by any person, firm or company carrying on a business similar to that of the employer in Snow-hill, Birmingham, or within a half-mile radius of Aston Cross, Birmingham, or Bristol-road, Birmingham."

Held, that, in view of the facts that the employment was highly confidential, that the service was for 12 months at least, and that the limit in space was very narrow, the time limit of five years was not such as to render the covenant illegal as being in restraint of trade.

Mallan v. May (11 M. and W., 653) and Attwood v. Lamont (36 The Times L.R., 895 ; [1920] 3 K.B., 571) applied.

Mason v. Provident Clothing and Supply Company, Limited (29 The Times L.R., 727 ; [1913] A.C., 724) and British Concrete Company v. Schelff ([1921] 2 Ch., 563) considered.

This was an appeal from Birmingham County Court.

The facts and arguments appear from the judgments.

Mr. R. A. Willes appeared for the appellant (the plaintiff in the action) and Mr. C. Williams for the respondent.

The Court reserved judgment.

The following judgments were read :—

Mr. Justice Salter.—This is an appeal by the plaintiff from the refusal of the County Court Judge to grant an injunction restraining the defendant, his former servant, from competing in business with him after the termination of the service.

The plaintiff is a tailor carrying on business in Birmingham at three places—namely, Snow-hill, Bristol-road, and Aston Cross. The defendant was formerly in the employ of Dresdens, a brother-in-law of the plaintiff, who carries on business as a tailor quite near to the plaintiff, and is a trade rival. One Joe Putsman, a brother of the plaintiff, also carries on business as a tailor at 73, Snow-hill, and is a trade rival of the plaintiff.

The defendant left the employ of Dresdens and entered the service of the plaintiff in March, 1925. The contract of service is in writing and is dated March 21, 1925. The employment is for 12 months certain, and after that to be terminable by one week's notice on either side. The plaintiff promises to employ the defendant, to pay him £4 a week and a commission, and to allow him two weeks' holiday in a year at half wages. The defendant promises to serve the plaintiff as manager and cutter at Snow-hill, "or at such other place or places where the employer's business shall be carried on and as the employer may require," to serve with diligence and fidelity, to keep his employer's secrets, to keep and render accounts, not to compete or to be engaged in any other business during the service, and not to compete after the determination of the service.

The provisions relating to the last-named matter are contained in clause 11 of the contract, and are as follows : "After the determination of this agreement for any cause whatsoever the manager shall not for a period of five years from the date of such determination carry on any business similar to that of the employer or be employed by Dresdens, tailors, or be employed in any capacity by any person, firm, or company carrying on a business similar to that of the employer in Snow-hill, Birmingham, or within a half-mile radius of Aston Cross, Birmingham, or Bristol-road, Birmingham."

Under this contract the defendant managed the plaintiff's business at 49, Snow-hill for 15 months. On Thursday, June 10, 1926, he went to the plaintiff's brother, Joe Putsman, and arranged with him to leave the plaintiff's service and enter that of Joe Putsman on the following Monday. On Saturday, June 12, the defendant paid the plaintiff £4 in lieu of notice and left his service. On the Monday he entered the service of Joe Putsman, who exhibited a photograph of the defendant in his shop window with a notice that he had secured the defendant's services.

The plaintiff took proceedings in the County Court and prayed an injunction in the terms of clause 11. He further submitted that, if clause 11 should be held to be too wide to be enforceable as a whole, he was entitled to an injunction restraining the defendant for a period of five years from the determination of the agreement from being employed in any capacity by any person, firm, or company in a business similar to that of the plaintiff in Snow-hill, Birmingham.

The learned Judge evidently rejected the claim to an injunction in the terms of the whole clause. He held that the promise not to take service for five years with any tailor in Snow-hill was a promise which might properly be enforced as a separate promise, if it were a valid promise, but he held that such a promise was invalid as being in undue restraint of trade.

In view of the opinion which I have formed, it is unnecessary for me to consider the validity of clause 11 as a whole, and it is, therefore, unnecessary to consider its meaning and to decide, for example, whether there is any limit in space to the promises not to set up in business for himself and not to enter the employ of Dresdens. I confine my judgment to the questions of severability, and the validity of the promise not to take service with any tailor in Snow-hill for five years.

The "doctrine of severability" is not confined to contracts of service, nor to contracts in restraint of trade. If a promisee claims the enforcement of a promise, and the promise is a valid promise and supported by consideration, the Court will enforce the promise, notwithstanding the fact that the promisor has made other promises, supported by the same consideration, which are void, and has included the valid and invalid promises in one document. But if the promise sought to be enforced is invalid as being in undue restraint of trade or for any other reason, the Court will not invent a valid promise by the deletion, alteration, or addition of words, and thus enforce a promise which the promisor might well have made, but did not make. The promise to be enforceable must be on the face of the document a separate promise, a separate compact, the subject of separate consideration and accord, the performance of which is independent of the performance of any other promises which the promisor may have made. If the promise is a separate promise and valid, the Court will enforce it. Whether it is separate or not depends on the language of the document. "Severance," as it seems to me, is the act of the parties, not of the Court.

Some of the judgments in the House of Lords in Mason v. Provident Clothing and Supply Company, Limited (29 The Times L.R., 727 ; [1913] A.C., 724) and the judgment of Lord Justice Younger in Attwood v. Lamont (36 The Times L.R., at p. 897 ; [1920] 3 K.B., at p. 581) appear to suggest that some of the earlier decisions on severance are no longer reliable guides. A definite test to be applied in determining, on the construction of an agreement, whether a particular promise contained in it is separately enforceable or not, is contained in the judgment of Lord Sterndale in Attwood v. Lamont (supra).

In that case (the converse of the present) the agreement was that the defendant would not engage in any one of many branches of business in one place. Lord Sterndale said (36 The Times L.R., at p. 896 ; [1920] 3 K.B., at p. 577) : "The doctrine of severability has been much criticized by Lord Moulton in Mason v. Provident Clothing and Supply Company (supra) and by Mr. Justice Neville in Goldsoll v. Goldman ([1914] 2 Ch., 603, at p. 613). These criticisms, however, were not accepted by the Court of Appeal—see per Lord Justice Kennedy in Goldsoll v. Goldman ([1915] 1 Ch., 292)—or by Mr. Justice Sargant in Nevanas and Co. v. Walker (30 The Times L.R., 184 ; [1914] 1 Ch., 413).

"I think, therefore, that it is still the law that a contract can be severed if the severed parts are independent of one another and can be severed without the severance affecting the meaning of the part remaining." Again (36 The Times L.R., at p. 896 ; [1920] 3 K.B., at p. 578) : "It remains, therefore, to consider whether the covenant in this agreement can be considered as though it contained a number of several covenants each relating to a separate trade. I think it clear that if the severance of a part of the agreement gives it a meaning and object different in kind and not only in extent, the different parts of it cannot be said to be independent." Lastly (36 The Times L.R., at p. 896 ; [1920] 3 K.B., at p. 579) : "I think it is necessary to examine the meaning of the agreement as unsevered in order to see whether it complies with the principles above stated, and then to see whether the severance alters the original meaning and effect of the agreement, or only limits the sphere of its operations."

Applying this test to the present case, the defendant has made many promises which are obviously separate. If clause 11 were held to be indivisible and wholly bad, the master could enforce the promises to be diligent, to account, and not to compete during the service. Turning to clause 11, the defendant promises, in consideration of the agreed employment, that for five years he will not (1) set up as a tailor for himself, (2) take service with Dresdens, (3) take service with any tailor in Snow-hill, (4) take service with any tailor in the Bristol-road area, (5) take service with any tailor in the Aston Cross area. If the first, second, fourth, and fifth of these promises are ignored and clause 11 is treated as though it comprised only the third, does the change give to the agreement as a whole "a meaning and object different in kind and not only in extent"? We have "to see whether the severance alters the original meaning and effect of the agreement, or only limits the sphere of its operations." In my opinion, the change is a change in extent only and not in kind, and the promise not to take service in Snow-hill is separately enforceable.

The remaining question is the validity of this promise. The relation between master and servant is always confidential, though in differing degrees. The relation between a master and the servant who manages his business for him is highly confidential. During the service he is in constant contact with the master's customers and cannot fail to learn their names and addresses, their likes and dislikes, and something of their financial credit. Such knowledge can be used with effect, after the determination of the service, to induce such customers to transfer their custom to a new employer.

Certain conduct of this kind will be restrained as being in breach of implied terms in the contract of service. (Robb v. Green, 11 The Times L.R., 517 ; [1895] 2 Q.B., 315 ; Louis v. Smellie, 11 The Times L.R., 515.) Other conduct of this kind, though injurious to the late employer, will not be restrained in the absence of express agreement. Such agreement need not take the form of a covenant against solicitation. Such a covenant is difficult to enforce ; it is difficult to show breach and difficult to frame an injunction.

The master is entitled to protect himself by a covenant against competition, provided that it is not wider than is reasonably necessary to safeguard his proprietary interest against unfair use by the former servant of information gained during the service. (See the judgment of Lord Sterndale in Attwood v. Lamont, 36 The Times L.R., at p. 896 ; [1920] 3 K.B., at p. 578.) The question whether a covenant in restraint of trade is unduly wide, though depending on questions of fact, is always treated as a matter of law. The limits in time and space, the nature and agreed duration of the employment, and all the circumstances must be considered together, the onus being on the employer to show that the covenant is not too wide.

Here the employment was highly confidential, the service was for 12 months at least, and the limit in space is, in my opinion, very narrow indeed. Seeing that the defendant could solicit the plaintiff's customers from the next street, I think that a limit of five years is not too long. I am, therefore, unable to agree with the learned Judge on this point.

Moreover, he has applied a wrong test in considering whether the scope of the promise is, or is not, too wide. After quoting at length from the judgments in Attwood v. Lamont (supra) and laying down the right principle, he gives as his reason, and apparently his only reason, for holding the covenant to be too wide, that the defendant had acquired no knowledge of the plaintiff's customers during his 15 months' management of the plaintiff's business and was not, therefore, at the end of the service in a position to do any injury to the plaintiff's goodwill. This seems to me not only incredible in fact, but unsound in law. The question is not whether experience gained during the service has shown the restriction to have been excessive or insufficient. The question is whether the covenant was a reasonable one for the parties to agree to at the outset of the service on the best estimate which they could then make of the future. If, for example, a long service as manager was contemplated as probable, and it proves in fact to be short, it may appear that a narrower restriction would have been sufficient. If, on the other hand, a short service was contemplated, and it proves to be a long one, it may well be that if the parties could have foreseen the future they would have agreed on a wider covenant.

For these reasons I think that the appeal succeeds. The judgment for the defendant and the order for an inquiry as to damages must be set aside and judgment must be entered for the plaintiff for an injunction restraining the defendant for a period of five years from the determination of the agreement from being employed in any capacity by any person, firm, or company carrying on a business similar to that of the plaintiff in Snow-hill, Birmingham.

Mr. Justice Talbot.—I need not read the material clause of the agreement again. The learned County Court Judge has held that it contains a separate severable contract not to be employed for five years from the determination of the agreement in any capacity for any person, firm, or company carrying on a business similar to the plaintiff's in Snow-hill. He has held that this contract is illegal as being in restraint of trade.

The first question is whether this contract is severable as held by the learned Judge. I know of no ground for saying that the law in this respect is not precisely the same as to contracts illegal as being in restraint of trade and contracts illegal in any other respect. It is thus stated by Mr. Justice Willes in Pickering v. Ilfracombe Railway Company (L.R., 3 C.P., 235, at p. 250) : "Where you cannot sever the illegal from the legal part of a covenant, the contract is altogether void ; but, where you can sever them, whether the illegality be created by statute or by the common law, you may reject the bad part and retain the good." The contract in the present case is (among other things) not to enter employment of a particular kind in either of three defined areas. Why is not that severable into three contracts each binding the defendant not to enter such employment in one of the three ? It is difficult to see how, if any such contract is severable, this is not.

There is, however, direct authority on this point. In Mallan v. May (11 M. and W., 653) there was a covenant that the defendant would not practise as a dentist as principal or assistant in London or any of the towns or places in England or Scotland where the plaintiffs or the defendant on their account might have been practising before a certain time. The Court held that the covenant as a whole was unreasonable and illegal, but that if confined to London it was good. Baron Parke, in delivering the judgment of the Court, said : "We think that the stipulation as to not practising in London is valid, and is not affected by the illegality of the other part. That point was decided in Chesman v. Nainby (2 Str., 739)." Chesman v. Nainby (supra) was decided in 1726 first by the Court of Common Pleas, then by the King's Bench, on error, and lastly by the House of Lords, in accordance with the unanimous opinion of all the Judges.

The law, therefore, as declared in Mallan v. May (supra) has been recognized for at least 200 years. The case is of the highest authority and it is directly in point. It applies to a contract exactly similar in essentials to that in question in the present case and shows the principle governing all contracts impugned on the ground of illegality—namely, that a man is not the less bound by a legal contract because he has at the same time made a contract which is illegal, the only question in each case being whether the legal and the illegal can be severed.

I should feel no difficulty about this part of the case but for the judgment of Lord Justice Younger in Attwood v. Lamont (36 The Times L.R., at p. 897 ; [1920] 3 K.B., at p. 593). It seems to be there suggested that the fact that it is now settled that on the question of the validity of a contract in restraint of trade the burthen is on those who assert and not on those who deny its validity has made inapplicable to contracts of this kind the general rule of law as to contracts alleged to be illegal and has introduced some other rule. Speaking with great respect, I cannot see how the question whether a contract is severable can be affected by the burthen of proof on the question whether the contract as severed is legal. You have first to see whether there is a severable contract, and, if there is, the plaintiff has then to show that it is legal as not going beyond what is reasonable.

The two questions appear to me to be entirely independent. The suggestion of Lord Justice Younger seems to be based principally on the judgment of Lord Moulton in Mason v. Provident Clothing and Supply Company (29 The Times L.R., at p. 728 ; [1913] A.C., at p. 745). The judgment must be read in connexion with the facts of the case before the House. It cannot have been intended to overrule the authorities which, as was said by Lord Justice Kennedy in Goldsoll v. Goldman ([1915] 1 Ch., at p. 299), after referring to Lord Moulton's words in Mason's case (supra), have established that "if words are used in a covenant such as admit of severability by mentioning different areas, we must sever the covenant so as to limit its operation to an area which is not too large." In Mason's case (supra) the agreement was that within three years from the termination of a service terminable by a fortnight's notice Mason should not be employed within 25 miles of London or 25 miles of any place where Mason should have been employed by the company during the agreement. The House of Lords considered that the 25 miles area, whether applied to London or to other places, was unreasonable and illegal, and the language of Lord Moulton will be seen from its terms to refer to the suggestion that it was the duty of a Court to pick out from this unreasonably wide agreement something not expressed which if expressed might have been not unreasonable. This is plainly inapplicable to a contract not to trade in either of three defined areas, which is indeed on the face of it the equivalent of three contracts each referring to one of the areas; and Lord Shaw draws this very distinction (29 The Times L.R., at p. 729; [1913] A.C., at p. 742); "There is," he says, "no occasion for the framing in the present instance of a limited injunction, the contract not being in separate and clearly-defined divisions."

The same view of Lord Moulton's judgment was taken by Lord Justice Sargant when a Judge of the Chancery Division in Nevanas and Co. v. Walker (30 The Times L.R., at p. 185; [1914] 1 Ch., at p. 422). He said: "Here I may clear the ground at once from a suggestion that, in view of certain remarks of Lord Moulton in the recent case of Mason v. Provident Clothing and Supply Company (supra), this part of the covenant is invalidated because the succeeding part of the covenant, namely, that prohibiting the carrying on by the manager of any trade or business similar to any trade or business carried on during the period of his employment by the company, is admittedly too wide. I do not think that those remarks were intended to be applicable to cases where the two parts of a covenant are expressed in such a way as to amount to a clear severance by the parties themselves, and as to be substantially equivalent to two separate covenants. No question of the kind was involved in the case before the House of Lords, and I think that Lord Moulton was not intending to deal with the numerous cases of high authority in which the good part of such a covenant was held to be enforceable, notwithstanding its collocation with a bad part, but was only thinking of those cases in which some severance has been effected by the Court, and the covenant has not been held bad merely because it might work unreasonably in certain exceptional circumstances not within its main and principal purpose and meaning." This passage was approved by Lord Sterndale in Attwood v. Lamont (36 The Times L.R., at p. 896; [1920] 3 K.B., at p. 578), and he states the law thus (36 The Times L.R., at p. 896 [1920] 3 K.B., at p. 577): "It is still the law that a contract can be severed if the severed parts are independent of one another and can be severed without the severance affecting the meaning of the part remaining." I should add that in British Concrete Company v. Schelff ([1921] 2 Ch., at p. 572), a case later than Attwood v. Lamont (supra), Lord Justice Younger appears to treat a contract as generally speaking severable where it relates to a distinct area. It seems to me, therefore, that we are bound to apply to this agreement the law applicable to contracts generally as it has always been understood. So applying it, I am clearly of opinion that the agreement contains a distinct and severable contract, as found by the learned Judge, not to be employed in the business mentioned in Snow-hill.

It was argued for the respondent on the authority of British Concrete Company v. Schelff (supra) that the contract not to be employed as a servant could not be severed from the contract not to carry on business, and that the contract not to carry on business being unrestricted in point of space was illegal. In my opinion, the case relied on did not, and indeed could not, lay down any such general rule as was suggested. The contract there was very different from that in the present case, and the decision that it was not severable clearly does not make the contract now sued on not severable. Moreover, I am of opinion that on the true construction of this agreement the contract not to carry on business is limited in space to the three areas specified. No doubt the words are capable of the other construction, but, if they are to be treated as ambiguous, it is right to give them the more limited of the possible meanings. The principle also applies that if an instrument is reasonably capable of two constructions that which does not involve illegality is to be preferred to that which does. In any case, my opinion that the learned Judge was right in severing the contract as he has severed it would not be affected if I took a different view of the meaning of the earlier part of the clause than that which I have expressed.

The question then is whether the contract as so severed is valid. On this I have very little to add to the judgment which has been delivered. I think that the result of the authorities is that stated by Lord Sterndale, M.R., in Attwood v. Lamont (36 The Times L.R., at p. 896; [1920] 3 K.B., at p. 578), namely, that though in a contract such as this the restraint can only be justified so far as it is necessary to protect the employer "against an improper use by the servant of the knowledge which he has acquired in the master's service," yet this restraint may take the form not of forbidding such improper use but of restraining the servant generally from trading in a certain area. In other words, the employer is entitled to make himself reasonably safe against abuse of his confidence without the necessity of proving definitely that the servant has actually taken, or is threatening to take, unfair advantage of what he has learned in his service. In this case it is, in my opinion, sufficiently evident from the nature of the defendant's employment, and all the circumstances, that for the defendant to enter the service of a rival trader in the same street necessarily exposes the plaintiff to unfairness against which he is entitled to protect himself. This establishes the reasonableness and the legality of the contract, and I think that the learned County Court Judge was mistaken in thinking that any further evidence was necessary to support the plaintiff's case.

I agree, therefore, that the plaintiff should have had judgment and that the appeal must be allowed.

The appeal was accordingly allowed, with costs.

INLAND REVENUE COMMISSIONERS v. PAKENHAM AND OTHERS. INLAND REVENUE COMMISSIONERS v. COUNTESS OF LONGFORD. INLAND REVENUE COMMISSIONERS v. EARL OF LONGFORD. GASCOIGNE v. INLAND REVENUE COMMISSIONERS.*

Revenue—Super-tax—Infant—Income of trust property—Sums paid by trustees for maintenance—Accumulation of balance of income—Whether moneys accumulated "receivable" by infant—Liability of infant to super-tax—Liability of trustees and guardian to make super-tax returns—Representative assessments—Conveyancing Act, 1881 (44 and 45 Vict., c. 41), s. 43—Income Tax Act, 1918 (8 and 9 Geo. V., c. 40), ss. 5 (3) (c), 7 (2) (5) and (6), 161—All Schedules Rules, rule 4.

* Reported by T. R. F. Butler, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Where trustees of a settlement set apart certain sums annually for the maintenance of an infant beneficiary and allow the balance of the income to accumulate, the income that is being accumulated is "receivable" by the infant within the meaning of s. 5 (3) (c) of the Income Tax Act, 1918, and he is liable to be assessed to super-tax in respect of the entire income as it accrues year by year and not merely in respect of the annual sums allowed to him by the trustees for his maintenance.

Representative assessments to super-tax cannot be made upon the trustees or the guardian of the infant beneficiary, either in respect of the actual total income of the infant, or in respect of a total income limited, as regards the particular trustee or guardian, to that income with which the trust or guardianship is concerned.

His Lordship delivered one judgment in these four cases stated by the Commissioners for the Special Purposes of the Income Tax Acts.

In the first two cases the Honourable G. M. Pakenham, Mr. G. F. Stewart, and Mr. H. N. Walford appealed against assessments to super-tax made upon them as trustees, and the Countess of Longford against an assessment to super-tax made upon her as guardian, of the Right Honourable the Earl of Longford, when he was a minor. The trustees were assessed in the amount of £16,000, £16,500, and £26,000, for the years ending April 5, 1918, 1919, and 1920 respectively; and the guardian was assessed in the amount of £12,000 for the year ending April 5, 1917.

The Earl of Longford was the sixth Earl, and was born on December 29, 1902. By a settlement made on August 22, 1899, the fifth Earl, his father, conveyed certain real estates in Ireland to trustees upon trusts under which, upon his own death on August 21, 1915, his son, the present Earl, became tenant in tail male. The settlement contained no express power of management during minority, and no direction that the statutory provisions were not to be applied. The trustees were appointed trustees for the purposes of section 42 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881. At the time of the fifth Earl's death, and since that date, the property settled consisted partly of realty and partly of personalty, which represented the investment of proceeds of sales of realty.

By a settlement dated November 8, 1862, certain property referred to as the Bedfordshire Estates was settled by the grandmother of the Earl upon her marriage with the fourth Earl of Longford. By that settlement the estates were limited to the use of the then Earl for life, with remainder to the use of his wife for life, with remainder to the use of the first son of the marriage in tail male, with divers remainders over. The settlement contained a clause directing the trustees to enter and receive and apply the rents and profits during minority, and they were given powers of management and, subject thereto, were to apply such sums as they should think fit to the maintenance of the infant and to accumulate the surplus. The trusts of the accumulations were, if the son should attain 21 or die under that age, leaving inheritable issue, for the son, but if he should die under 21 without such issue, then the accumulations were to be treated as capital money. The provisions were to apply, so far as they were or could be made applicable, to the minority of any person for the time being entitled under the settlement to the rents and profits. In the events that happened the sixth Earl, upon the death of his grandmother on January 22, 1918, became tenant in tail of these estates. The trustees of this settlement were not the same persons as the trustees of the settlement of August 22, 1899.

After the sixth Earl became entitled to the estates that were the subject of the settlement dated August 22, 1899, the trustees of that settlement paid yearly during his minority a sum of £2,500 for his maintenance, and after the Earl became entitled to the estates that were the subject of the settlement dated November 8, 1862, the trustees of that settlement paid yearly during his minority a sum of £500 for his maintenance, and the balance of income arising from both estates was accumulated.

During the year 1919 correspondence arose between the Special Commissioners of Income Tax and the guardian of the Earl with regard to the super-tax liability of the income of the Earl. The Countess of Longford was called upon, as guardian of the Earl, to make a return for the year ending April 5, 1917; and upon her failure to do so an estimated assessment to super-tax was made upon her for that year with the intention of bringing into assessment the total income of the previous year of the Earl from all sources, including the whole income arising from the estates that were the subject of the settlement of August 22, 1899, but not the income arising from the estates that were the subject of the settlement of November 8, 1862, as the Earl did not become entitled to such estates until January 22, 1918.

At a later date notices to make returns of the total income of the Earl from all sources for super-tax purposes for the years ending April 5, 1918, 1919, and 1920 respectively were served on the trustees, and the returns were in due course made by Mr. H. N. Walford on behalf of himself and co-trustees. In these returns there was included as the income of the Earl arising from both the settled estates each year only the sums paid by the respective trustees of both settlements for maintenance in the respective previous years. The assessments to super-tax referred to above were subsequently made upon the trustees with the intention of including therein each year the total income of the Earl from all sources for the respective previous years, including the whole income arising from both estates, whether used for maintenance or accumulated, but, as regards the income from the estates which were the subject of the settlement of November 8, 1862, only from the time at which the Earl succeeded thereto.

It was contended on behalf of the trustees and the guardian:—

(a) That the guardian was not liable to assessments as guardian for any year.

(b) That by virtue of section 43 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, the Earl was not entitled, under the settlement of August 22, 1899, to receive more than the sums allowed to him for maintenance under that settlement, and that by the provisions of the settlement of November 8, 1862, he was assessable on the same principle as regards the income of that settlement.

(c) That the trustees of neither settlement were under any obligation to make super-tax returns on behalf of the Earl.

It was contended on behalf of the Crown (inter alia):—

(a) That the trustees were liable to be assessed to super-tax in respect of the total income of the Earl from all sources.

(b) That such total income included for the purposes of super-tax for each of the three years ending April 5, 1918, 1919, and 1920 respectively, the whole income arising during the respective previous years (i.) from the estates which were the subject of the settlement of August 22, 1899, and (ii.) from the estates which were the subject of the settlement of November 8, 1862, from the date at which the Earl succeeded to them.

(c) That the trustees were liable to make super-tax returns of the income of the Earl.

(d) That the guardian was liable to be assessed to super-tax in respect of the total income of the Earl from all sources.

(e) That such total income included the whole income arising from the estates that were the subject of the settlement of August 22, 1899, during the year ending April 5, 1916.

The Special Commissioners held that the trustees were debarred from objecting to the form of the assessments, so far only as the minor was liable either through his trustees or his guardian to assessment to super-tax ; that the liability through the guardian was restricted to so much of the income of the minor as passed through her hands ; that, since the liability of the minor to super-tax did not depend on the estates, but upon his total income from the estates and all other sources, the trustees were not liable to make the returns ; and that the income of the minor which was being accumulated by the trustees was not "receivable" by the minor so as to be liable to super-tax. They accordingly discharged the assessment for the year ending April 5, 1917, and reduced the assessments for the years ending April 5, 1918, 1919, and 1920 to £3,333, £3,333, and £4,285 respectively.

The Crown appealed.

In the third case the Earl of Longford appealed against an assessment to super-tax made upon him in the estimated sum of £26,000 for the year ending April 5, 1921.

For that year the Countess of Longford had been assessed to super-tax as guardian of the Earl in the sum of £4,642. It was admitted on behalf of the Earl that that assessment was correct, and that it represented the amount received by the Countess in the previous year for the maintenance of the Earl from the trustees of the settlements of November 8, 1862, and August 22, 1899. Income-tax was added to the amount so received in computing the assessment.

A notice to make a return of total income from all sources for the purposes of super-tax for the year ending April 5, 1921, was sent to the Earl and, no return having been made, the assessment of £26,000 was made by the Special Commissioners on September 11, 1923.

It was contended on behalf of the Earl :—

(a) That the Special Commissioners should follow their decision for the earlier years and discharge this assessment.

(b) That this assessment was a double assessment with the assessment on the Countess for the same year.

(c) That the Earl had no control over the income sought to be assessed so as to be able to make a return.

(d) That the Earl was not in receipt or control of the income which was being accumulated by the trustees.

(e) That the assessment should be discharged.

It was contended on behalf of the Crown (inter alia) :—

(a) That the Earl could be called on to make a return for the purposes of super-tax.

(b) That the Earl was assessable to super-tax.

(c) That the total income of the Earl for the year ending April 5, 1921, included the whole income arising during the year ending April 5, 1920, from the two aforementioned estates.

(d) That the assessment was not a double assessment and was not intended to create any liability to the extent to which it overlapped the assessment on the guardian.

(e) That the assessment was correct in principle and should (subject to any necessary adjustment of figures) be confirmed.

The Special Commissioners held that the Earl was not the person in receipt of the income which was being accumulated by the trustees so as to be liable to super-tax thereon, and discharged the assessment.

The Crown appealed.

In the fourth case Miss Cynthia Mary Trench Gascoigne appealed against three assessments to super-tax for the years ending April 5, 1917, 1918, and 1919 respectively. She was the daughter of Colonel Frederick R. T. Trench Gascoigne, and came of age on February 9, 1919.

Under the will of her grandfather, who died on June 12, 1905, certain property in Ireland was devised to trustees in trust for her if she should be living at his decease, the property during her infancy to be managed and the rents and profits thereof to be received by her father to invest the same so that they should accumulate at compound interest and be paid to her on her attaining 21 years or marrying under that age. In the event of her decease before the testator's death, the property was to be held in trust for his grandson. The residue of the testator's real and personal estate was devised and bequeathed to her absolutely, but if she should die under the age of 21 years and without having been married, then to the grandson absolutely.

The assessments were made on Miss Gascoigne in the gross amount of the income arising from the Irish property and the testator's residuary estate in the respective previous years.

The Special Commissioners held that in regard to the Irish estate, as Miss Gascoigne was living at the decease of the testator, her interest became vested at his death and, although the income arising from the Irish estate had to be invested and accumulated for a certain period, that income was nevertheless the income of Miss Gascoigne ; and that as regards the residue she obtained a vested and absolute interest on the death of the testator, although such interest was liable to divest if she died under the age of 21 years and unmarried ; that, therefore, in the case both of the Irish estate and of the residue, the income arising therefrom was the income of Miss Gascoigne, and that the assessments were valid in law and should be confirmed.

Miss Gascoigne appealed.

The Attorney-General (Sir Douglas Hogg, K.C.), Mr. C. Stafford Crossman, and Mr. R. P. Hills appeared for the Crown ; Mr. A. M. Latter, K.C., and Mr. A. Andrewes-Uthwatt for the trustees and the guardian ; and Mr. Cyril King for the appellant Miss Gascoigne.

Mr. Justice Rowlatt.—In all these four cases I am of opinion that the income was income liable to super-tax. In the case of the Longford settlement of 1862 this result was contended for on the part of the Attorney-General by a detailed argument rested upon the rule against perpetuities. To the relief of all concerned this argument was not contested.

As regards the income under the Longford settlement of 1899 and the income in Miss Gascoigne's case, liability was contested on the part of the subject on the strength of my own decision in Commissioners of Inland Revenue v. Blackwell (40 The Times L.R., 801; [1924] 2 K.B., 351). I rather doubt, on the further consideration of the subject for which these cases have afforded me the opportunity, and also in view of what occurred in that case in the Court of Appeal (42 The Times L.R., 239; [1926] 1 K.B., 389), whether my view was right. However that may be, I think the income in these cases was the income of the infant year by year as it accrued. In Blackwell's case (supra) I thought the income was not his income, and that when he received the accumulated sum on attaining his majority he received it as capital. It was at that point that I went wrong, if wrong I was. In these cases I think that section 43 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, in the Earl of Longford's case, and the clause in the will in Miss Gascoigne's case, merely put the trustees in the position of bankers for the infant, if I may use that phrase, to hold and invest the money on his behalf until his majority. The Special Commissioners decided against the Crown on the ground that it was not income "receivable" within the meaning of section 5 (3) (c) of the Income Tax Act, 1918, within the year. This conclusion I think wrong for the reasons given in Blackwell's case (supra), which I will not repeat.

Under these circumstances the result in Miss Gascoigne's case is that her appeal must be dismissed, with costs.

In Lord Longford's case there remain very important questions of machinery. As regards the last of the series of years in question—namely, 1920-1921—the infant himself was assessed on the whole of the income to which he was entitled under the settlements. The Special Commissioners, for reasons to which I have already adverted, reduced the assessment to the amount which he had actually received by way of allowances, and the Crown is entitled to have it restored to the full amount unless the infant is unassessable in person. I can see no reason for so holding (see Rex v. Newmarket Income Tax Commissioners—Ex parte Huxley (32 The Times L.R., 353; [1916] 1 K.B., 788)), and therefore in that case the appeal succeeds with costs.

As to the preceding years, the questions are as follows:—

(1) Can his mother, as guardian, be assessed in respect of all his income for the year 1916-1917 under the settlement of 1862, though she handled on his behalf only an amount below the super-tax limit?

(2) Can the trustees of the settlement of 1862 be assessed for the year 1917-1918 in respect of the infant's income under the settlement? There is no question here of assessing them in respect of income under any settlement with which they had no concern. The question is the broad one, whether trustees can be assessed to super-tax at all.

(3) Can these same trustees be assessed for the years 1918-19 and 1919-20 in respect of the income under their own trust together with the income under that of 1899, with which they had no concern, and of course in an amount and upon a scale dependent on the aggregate of the two incomes?

As regards the guardian, I wish first to advert to the provisions of section 161 of the Income Tax Act, 1918, in order to dispose of them. That section does not authorize an assessment. It assumes default in payment by the infant, and that, it seems to me, involves the assessment of the infant. One may observe in passing that it is here that we find what would generally be effective machinery for the recovery of tax upon the income of an infant. This was, I think, the view of the Lords Justices in Rex v. Newmarket Income Tax Commissioners—Ex parte Huxley (supra).

The question is therefore whether, by virtue of section 7, subsection (6), and Rule 4 of the General Rules applicable to all Schedules, what I may call representative assessments can be made upon trustees and guardians on the actual total income of the beneficiary. If not, a secondary point might arise—namely, whether they can be made on a total income taken as regards the particular trustee or guardian as limited to the income with which the trust or guardianship is concerned. The Attorney-General did not, however, contend for this, so I do not deal with it.

For income-tax purposes under the Act of 1842, and still under the Act of 1918, there is no obligation to make a general return of, and no assessment is made on, total income. As pointed out by Lord Macnaghten in London County Council v. Attorney-General (17 The Times L.R., 131; [1901] A.C., 26), any such idea was foreign to the scheme of the Act of 1842. The tax was and is imposed Schedule by Schedule, and its assessment and collection were and are divided locally among the places where the income arises. It is inconceivable, in my view, that for income-tax purposes trustees or guardians or agents for non-residents (who in the Act of 1842 and now under Rule 5 of the General Rules to Schedules A, B, C, D and E are found in association with trustees and guardians) should be assessable save in respect of the trust, the guardianship or agency. No distinction was suggested by the Attorney-General between trustees for incapacitated persons and agents for non-resident persons, in whose name the non-resident is assessable.

Under the Act of 1842, agents were assessable only if they had the receipt of the profits or gains. Necessarily, therefore, they are assessable only in respect of the income of the agency. By the Finance Act, 1915, that limitation has been removed, and I understand the Attorney-General to contend that this leaves an agent exposed to assessment to income-tax in respect of any British income of his non-resident principal (and I think he should have added, of his wife). The only limitations he would concede were that the agent must be an agent for income and not (e.g.) an agent for sale or purchase of a mere investment, and secondly that he must be still an agent at the time of assessment. It seems to me, however, that the immunity of an agent from assessment in respect of income unconnected with his agency did not depend on the requirement that he should be in receipt of the profits or gains taxed, but is fundamental, arising from the natural construction of the Act.

This being the position of these representative persons for income-tax purposes, I now come to super-tax. This tax is administered by one central authority, and the territorial and piecemeal organization of income-tax, as has been pointed out in the House of Lords, does not apply to it. It depends also on one general return bringing the income of the individual under all Schedules and in all places into one total. Against this total may be set deductions unconnected with any particular item of the income, as, for instance, annual payments of interest (see Earl Howe v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue (35 The Times L.R., 461; [1919] 2 K.B., 336, at p. 348)), and (until recently) life assurance premiums.

By section 7 (2) of the Act of 1918 persons assessable to income-tax, as representing incapacitated, non-resident, or deceased persons (as to these latter see Rule 18 of the General Rules applicable to Schedules A, B, C, D, and E) may be required to make a return of the total income of the person represented. In Brooke v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue (34 The Times L.R., 142 ; [1918] 1 K.B., 257), the Master of the Rolls expressed the opinion that under this rule a trustee was bound to the best of his ability to include in the return income outside his trust. The liability to assessment depends, however, not on this subsection, but on subsection (6). The Attorney-General nevertheless based an argument on subsection (5) in connexion with subsection (2) as follows : As under subsection (5) it is only if there is a failure to make a return, or the Special Commissioners are not satisfied with it, that they can assess according to the best of their judgment, therefore when there is such a return as that described by the Master of the Rolls, they must, unless dissatisfied, assess the person returning and upon the total amount returned. I do not think this proposition is involved in the words used. I see no reason why they should not, on the information in the return, make an assessment on the beneficiary. The right to assess the representative depends on subsection (6).

By this subsection all the provisions of the Act relating (inter alia) to persons who are to be chargeable with income-tax and to income-tax assessments are, so far as applicable, to apply to the charge and assessment of super-tax. That subsection does not specifically mention, as did subsection (2), persons chargeable in a representative capacity. If they are included it is under the general words "persons chargeable," and the inclusion is not limited to persons representative of incapacitated, non-resident and deceased persons to which the provision in subsection (2) is confined. If all persons chargeable to income-tax are also chargeable to super-tax in respect of the total income (whether their own or another's) of which that in respect of which they are charged to income-tax forms part, then it would seem to follow that every occupier chargeable with the landlord's tax under Schedule A (see No. VII. (1)) would be chargeable with his landlord's super-tax. A receiver appointed by the Court (see General Rules 15) would be in an analogous position. Every railway company would be chargeable by reference to Schedule E, Rule 7 (2), with the super-tax of its higher officials. Perhaps even partners by reference to Schedule D, Rules 10 and 12 of the rules applicable to Cases I. and II., would be liable to be jointly assessed for the super-tax of all of them. Other persons exposed to this liability would be the collectors of tithes, royalties and fines (Schedule A, No. II., and rules), the managers of mines and the like (Schedule A, No. III.), and the occupiers of lands subject to tithes. Doubtless there are other persons in like situation. None of these persons would necessarily have adequate security for their indemnity. They could not command knowledge of the other income of their principals, or of the deductions available, nor could they independently promote an appeal. These are very startling consequences. The truth is that the machinery applicable to the compartments into which incomes divide themselves for income-tax purposes does not fit in this respect a tax like super-tax imposed on income in the bulk.

There is another way in which this proposition can be put. The question is whether a trustee is chargeable to super-tax in respect of income of his beneficiary outside his trust. Now there is no provision which makes him chargeable with income-tax in respect of such income, and therefore none, it seems to me, by the application of which he can be made chargeable to super-tax in respect of it. Perhaps an example may make it clearer. Suppose between 1910 and 1915 an agent for a non-resident person exercised a trade on his behalf by making contracts, but was not in receipt of the profits or gains. He was not liable for income-tax thereon. But if he received any other income for the principal he thereby (according to the present argument) became liable for super-tax upon the first-named profits. This result would follow by the application of the income-tax principle according to which he was not liable.

The conclusion I have come to does not involve the consequence that there is nothing in the charge of super-tax to which the income-tax provisions as to persons chargeable can be applied under the subsection.

It is to be observed that section 4, like the section in the Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910, which it replaces, merely creates super-tax in respect of the income of any individual. Section 5 (2), which makes income-tax assessments conclusive for super-tax purposes, was not to be found in the Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910. It was to be expected that some reference would be found to the person chargeable, even if there was no such thing as representative chargeability to income-tax. One important effect of the application of the income-tax provisions is to make a husband chargeable to super-tax on his wife's income as if it were his own. It is possible that it is only under this subsection that executors can be charged.

In the result the appeal of the Crown as regards the years 1918-19 and 1919-20 fails.

The question remains whether the trustees can be assessed for the year 1917-18 on the income of their own trust, being in fact the total income of the infant. I think I must deal with this point as the facts directly raise it, though the Attorney-General did not contend for any such limited success, pinning his faith to the larger view. If I may say so, I think he was right, because, in my view, if trustees and the like are not assessable on the total income simpliciter, the accident that there is no other income can make no difference. The non-existence of other income is a fact outside their sphere as much as the quantum of it if there is any. Moreover, the difficulty as to independent deductions still applies. I think, therefore, that the appeal in respect of this year fails also, and must be dismissed with costs.

The trustees have been assessed on the income actually allowed to the infant, and they have not appealed, being content to pay on those figures. It was not suggested that they are precluded from arguing the point of principle in resisting the larger demand.

* Reported by William Latey, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Where a wife has been found guilty of adultery on the petition of her husband for dissolution of marriage but the petition has been dismissed because the husband was found guilty of conduct conducing, and where the wife subsequently petitions for dissolution of marriage, the Court has jurisdiction to award her alimony pendente lite.

A question of considerable importance was raised on this summons adjourned into Court, namely, whether a wife, who had been found guilty by the Court of adultery on the petition of her husband for the dissolution of his marriage, though the petition was dismissed because the husband was found guilty of conduct conducing, was entitled on herself petitioning for divorce to alimony pendente lite. The matter came before the President on appeal from the Registrar.

Mr. J. Acton Pile appeared for the husband ; Mr. T. J. O'Connor for the wife.

Mr. ACTON PILE said that this was an appeal from an order of the Registrar directing that the husband, pending the hearing of his wife's petition for divorce, should pay her 10s. a week alimony. On February 5, 1917, the wife was granted a separation and maintenance order on the ground of her husband's cruelty. On June 4, 1918, the husband petitioned for the dissolution of his marriage on the ground of his wife's adultery, and at the hearing on January 22, 1922, Lord Coleridge found the adultery proved, but dismissed the petition on the ground that the husband had been guilty of cruelty and conduct conducing. In March of that year the separation and maintenance order was rescinded. In July, 1926, the wife filed her petition for divorce and also a petition for alimony pendente lite.

This form of relief, counsel argued, differed from any other sort of payment ordered by the Court inasmuch as it depended entirely on section 103 of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, which invoked the procedure of the Ecclesiastical Courts, "save as is otherwise provided by this Act or by rules of Court." Section 190 (3) of that Act said : "On any petition for divorce or nullity of marriage the Court shall have the same power to make interim orders for the payment of money by way of alimony or otherwise to the wife as the Court has in proceedings for judicial separation." The Ecclesiastical Courts, in his submission, could never have entertained such an application as this, where a wife had been adjudged guilty of adultery. As regards the finding of the husband's conduct conducing, such a finding was not known to the Ecclesiastical Courts, whose procedure was founded on that of the common law and in this connexion recognized only condonation or connivance.

LORD MERRIVALE.—Conduct conducing was in a juristic sense the creation of the Matrimonial Causes Act of 1857.

In support of his submission Mr. ACTON PILE referred to Whitmore v. Whitmore (L.R., 1 P. and D., 96), Wells v. Wells and Hudson (3 Sw. and Tr., 542), Wilson v. Glossop (3 The Times L.R., 588 ; 19 Q.B.D., 379), and Seaver v. Seaver (2 Sw. and Tr., 665).

LORD MERRIVALE.—Wilson v. Glossop (supra) was a case of compensatio. This is not. In this case the wife says : "If I committed adultery, you caused it." The husband replies : "It is not open to you to raise that issue. You committed adultery." The wife's further answer is : "You conduced and cannot set up my adultery." Do you suggest that where there is a right to permanent alimony on a decree absolute there is none for alimony pendente lite ?

Mr. ACTON PILE.—Yes.

Counsel referred to Ashcroft v. Ashcroft and Roberts (18 The Times L.R., 821 ; [1902] P., 270) and other cases.

Mr. T. J. O'CONNOR, for the wife, submitted that alimony pendente lite was in effect a substitution by the Matrimonial Causes Act of 1857 for the common law, and that the argument advanced could not stand, as a case like the present could not have been presented under the ecclesiastical practice. The 1857 Act had changed the situation by the introduction of "conduct conducing," which eliminated the result of the wife's adultery. He cited several cases and said that the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, laid down no principle which bound the Court to deal with these matters in accordance with an obsolete law.

LORD MERRIVALE delivered the following considered judgment :—The petitioner in this suit is suing for divorce on the ground of her husband's adultery. Pending the suit she has applied for and obtained in the Registry an order for weekly payment by way of alimony pendente lite. Against this order the respondent appeals. The Registrar has coupled with this order for alimony an order for payment by the respondent of moneys for the maintenance of his children of the marriage. This also was included in the respondent's notice of appeal, but the appeal in respect of this has not been proceeded with.

The ground of the respondent's appeal against the order for alimony pendente lite is that in a previous suit wherein he was petitioner for dissolution of marriage the present petitioner was found guilty of adultery. Counsel on his behalf contended that there is no jurisdiction in the Court to allot alimony pendente lite to a wife so found guilty, or to a wife shown to be guilty by her own confession. This proposition is founded on authorities in divorce such as Holt v. Holt (28 L.J., P. and M., 12) and Whitmore v. Whitmore (L.R., 1 P. and D., 96), and numerous decisions under the common law which lay down that a wife, living apart from her husband and guilty of adultery, may not pledge her husband's credit for necessaries, and that in the case of such a wife certain statutory liabilities of a husband in respect of maintenance cannot be enforced.

Holt v. Holt (supra) and Whitmore v. Whitmore (supra) were simple cases. In the former alimony pendente lite was refused in a suit for divorce upon proof that in an Ecclesiastical Court the respondent had already been found guilty of adultery. In the latter, upon a wife's confession of adultery in the course of the proceedings on a petition for divorce, an order for alimony pendente lite which was subsisting was, as from the date of the confession, discharged. In like cases the same course would probably be taken.

The present case is complicated, however, by the fact that the decree of the Court in the husband's suit, which pronounced the guilt of the wife, found the husband guilty of conduct conducing to the adultery, and therefore dismissed his petition. This state of facts was said by the wife's counsel to bring the case within the principle laid down in Wilson v. Glossop (3 The Times L.R., 588 ; 19 Q.B.D., 379), that a husband who connives at adultery on the part of his wife remains under the same liability for the wife's maintenance as though she had remained chaste. So far as the argument on the husband's behalf goes to the jurisdiction of the Court to order payment of alimony in a case like the present, it depends upon the provisions of the Matrimonial Causes Acts, 1857 and 1907, which are re-enacted in the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, whereby, under section 190 (3), power is given to make interim orders for alimony in a petition for divorce as "in proceedings for judicial separation"; and under section 32 this jurisdiction is to be "exercised as nearly as may be in the same manner as that in which it might have been exercised by the Court to which it formerly appertained." The last-mentioned section, if examined, maintains with regard to proceedings for judicial separation the provision of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, section 22, whereby the Court is to proceed therein "on principles and rules . . . as nearly as may be conformable to the principles and rules on which the Ecclesiastical Courts . . . acted and gave relief."

Concisely stated, the argument is this: A suit for divorce a mensâ et thoro by a guilty wife could not have been maintained; therefore no order for alimony pendente lite in such a suit could or would have been made; consequently no such order can be made under section 190 (3) of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, in a suit for divorce instituted by a wife who has been guilty of adultery.

As a test of a wife's right to an allotment of alimony in a case like the present I was asked to determine whether she could sue for restitution of conjugal rights and to hold that she could not. Cogent reasons for not embarking on this inquiry are suggested by the conflict of opinion as to the true view of the ecclesiastical law regarding the matter, which is evidenced in Seaver v. Seaver (2 Sw. and Tr., 665), Hope v. Hope (1 Sw. and Tr., 94), Russell v. Russell (11 The Times L.R., 579; [1895] P., 315; 13 The Times L.R., 516; [1897] A.C., 395), Brooking-Phillips v. Brooking-Phillips (29 The Times L.R., 288; [1913] P., 80). However, the answer would not necessarily be decisive of the present dispute. The conformity to the principles and rules which is prescribed by the statutes is such conformity as may be had, due regard being given to the provisions of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, and the rules and orders thereunder. The Act of 1857 instituted the jurisdiction of the Court to dissolve marriage, and it expressly provided that the adultery of a petitioner should not be an absolute bar to a decree. True it is that alimony pendente lite has been refused or discontinued in cases where adultery was established simpliciter against a guilty wife, but in cases where connivance or conduct conducing is alleged or established these decisions give little guidance. Nor are they necessarily decisive in any case of mutual guilt. So long as a wife was a competent suitor in the Ecclesiastical Court in a matrimonial cause the general practice of these Courts was to require the husband to make provision according to his means for her maintenance and for the costs of her suit.

I know of no ground for doubting the accuracy of the statement on this subject contained in Oughton's Ordo Judiciorum, Tit. 206, 207. The wife in the present suit is a competent suitor, in that she sues for relief which the Court is able, upon proper proof, to afford to her. Moreover, the husband is not free of complicity in the misconduct on her part, as has been established in his suit by the decree of the Court. Whether after such misconduct the wife could pledge the husband's credit for necessaries is not the question. The decisive inquiry, in my view of the matter, is whether the wife, on the facts before the Court, is a competent suitor for relief in a matrimonial cause. She undoubtedly is. Thereupon the jurisdiction of the Court to order alimony pendente lite appears to arise. It is that jurisdiction which has been exercised in the Registry.

Conditions are easily conceivable in which, although this jurisdiction exists, no order could properly be made. A wife who has brought cohabitation to an end by admitted misconduct for which the husband was not to blame, or a wife who, in some independent situation, is seeking divorce and cannot be granted relief except under the discretionary power of the Court, may very likely not be a proper applicant for an allotment of alimony. That will depend upon consideration of the relevant facts. In dealing with these regard must be had not only to the decisions in cases like Holt v. Holt (supra) and Whitmore v. Whitmore (supra), but to the state of the existing law of divorce, under which the Court has the responsibility of deciding, not only as to innocent wives but as to guilty wives, whether provision of some sort should be made for the wife by the husband.

There is jurisdiction to make an order in the present case, and I see in the facts nothing which ought to induce the Court to overrule the discretion of the Registrar as to the order proper to be made. The appeal therefore fails.

Leave to appeal was refused, but it was granted on December 21 by the Court of Appeal.

PUBLIC TRUSTEE AND OTHERS v. CHANCELLOR OF THE DUCHY OF LANCASTER AND ANOTHER.*

Tithe—Tithe rent charge—Separate hereditament—"Issuing out of the land"—Conveyance of land in general words—Whether passing title in the tithe arising out of the land conveyed—Tithe Act, 1836 (6 and 7 Will. IV., c. 71), ss. 67, 71.

A conveyance of land in general words does not pass the title in the tithe rent charge arising out of the land. Tithe does not belong to or appertain to the premises and it is not something which an owner of premises has in, to, or on the premises. It is a separate hereditament the title to which does not pass in the absence of special words in the conveyance.

Chapman v. Gatcombe (2 Bing. N.C., 516) followed.

This was an appeal by the defendants from an order of the Divisional Court.

The trustees of the settlement of the life interest of Sir Oswald Mosley sought an order against the Duchy of Lancaster, as representing the Crown, to recover arrears of rectorial tithes issuing out of certain lands at Tutbury, in the county of Stafford, the land in question having been conveyed to the Duchy of Lancaster as representing the Crown. The trustees further asked that the order for the recovery of the tithe rent charge should be executed by the appointment of a receiver under section 2 (3) of the Tithe Act, 1891.

The material facts were that in 1894 Mr. Oswald Mosley, being tenant in tail of certain lands at Tutbury, in Staffordshire, executed a disentailing assurance with the consent of his father, who was then life tenant and protector. By a resettlement dated March 12, 1895, Sir Oswald Mosley (then Mr. Oswald Mosley) conveyed the land to trustees on trust for himself for life with remainder over. On April 4, 1900, Sir Oswald Mosley assigned his life interest to trustees upon trust as to part for himself and on further trusts not material to this report. The trustees of the indenture of April 4, 1900, were not the same as the trustees of the indenture of March 12, 1895. Sir Oswald Mosley, as tenant for life, offered the lands at Tutbury for sale subject to certain conditions of sale and particulars disclosing a tithe of £3 16s. 8d. and land tax of £4 8s. 9d. as being the only outgoings known to the vendor. On September 2, 1920, the lands were conveyed to H.M. the King in the right of the Duchy of Lancaster. It was subsequently discovered that a tithe rent charge of £36 6s. 3d. was payable out of the lands so conveyed to the King, but that the same had not been paid for a great many years as the tithe had been bought in 1859 by Sir Oswald Mosley's predecessor in title.

These proceedings were taken by the present trustees of the assignment of April 4, 1900, to recover two years' arrears of the tithe rent charge against the King and the occupier of the lands conveyed by the conveyance of September 2, 1920.

The defendants pleaded (inter alia) that the tithe rent charge had been extinguished by merger or by the doctrine of lost grant; that the plaintiffs were estopped from claiming it; and that the tithe rent charge passed to the defendants under the conveyance of September 2, 1920. It was said that the word "hereditament" in that conveyance included and denoted the tithe rent charge, which it was contended therefore passed, along with the fee simple, to the Duchy of Lancaster under the conveyance. Neither party to that conveyance knew of the existence of the tithe rent charge.

The main question in the case was whether the general words used in the conveyance passed the "tithe rent charge" in question to the purchasers.

The County Court Judge held that the conveyance did not pass the tithe rent charge, whether it was intended to do so or not, and he gave judgment in favour of the plaintiffs, with costs. The defendants appealed to the Divisional Court, who affirmed the decision of the County Court Judge.

The defendants appealed to the Court of Appeal.

Sir Herbert Cunliffe, K.C., and Mr. E. J. L. Whitaker appeared for the appellants; and Mr. Gavin Simonds, K.C., and Mr. T. N. Winning for the respondents.

Lord Justice Bankes, in the course of his judgment, said that he would have been very glad if he could have been shown in some way how to reverse the judgment of the Divisional Court which affirmed the judgment of the County Court Judge. The judgment of the County Court Judge was quite right, and he (the Lord Justice) almost felt inclined to content himself by saying that he agreed with the decision of the learned County Court Judge, and with the reasons for his decision, but out of deference to the arguments of the appellants' counsel he would deal with the points that had been raised.

The property was put up for sale, and there was an elaborate catalogue with a description of the property. The description of the lot in question contained the statement "Outgoings: Tithe £3 16s. 8d." That was a correct statement with regard to the vicarial tithe, but it was quite incorrect in reference to tithe as a whole—that is, true rectorial tithe. It was a misrepresentation, but it was admitted that it was an innocent misrepresentation, which in itself, the conveyance having been executed, gave no relief.

The first point taken by Sir Herbert Cunliffe on behalf of the appellants was that on the face of it that was a contract for the sale of property which was liable to a payment in respect of tithe of £3 16s. 8d. only, and that it was inequitable, in the first instance, to treat the matter from any other point of view. But there was no ground on which relief could be given. The second point was that the statement in question was an estoppel. But one of the first points in reference to an estoppel by representation was that there could be no estoppel against a person except in respect of a representation which he had made himself, or which had been made on his behalf, and even assuming that the representation in this case was what it was contended to be, Sir Herbert Cunliffe had wholly failed to bring it home to the plaintiffs in this case. They stood in quite an independent position. They were the trustees, and the sale was one by the tenant for life. Even assuming that their consent was necessary, as indeed it was, and that the sale was a consent sale, it was not brought home to them that they had any knowledge of the statement in question, or approved of it, or authorized it. Therefore the appellants' first two points failed.

Then it was said that the right in reference to the rectorial tithe in question had ceased to exist. But the reason why it came to cease to be paid or claimed was because in 1859 the tithe was bought by the then tenant for life of the lands, and therefore, the result was that the tenant for life became no longer liable to pay the tithe to himself, and no record was made, but it was treated as though the tithe was no longer payable. That, however, was not enough. It could not be assumed that the fact that the tithe was not paid for a number of years was due to a lost grant. Nor was there any ground for saying that the tithe had been discharged by merger. The appellants had therefore failed in proving either merger or lost grant.

Then it was said that the conveyance of September 2, 1920, by the tenant for life—who undoubtedly had the right to convey the tithe in question if he had desired to do so—did in fact, by the conveyance which was executed, convey the tithe. It was said that not only must the general description of the parcels be considered, but special attention must be given to the words in the conveyance which described what the habendum was to be, and the habendum was to be "freed and discharged from" certain matters which were set out in the conveyance; but when those matters were looked into it was plain that they were confined to a certain class of obligation or liability which might arise under the original settlement and could not possibly include a claim for the tithe in question. That point therefore failed. It was also said that it might be quite true that up to the time of the Tithe Act, 1836, the tithe was looked on as a separate or independent hereditament, not issuing out of the land, and that it required special words in the conveyance of land to convey the separate hereditament—the tithe. But that Act, it was said, had altered the essential characteristics of the tithe and had converted it from a separate or independent hereditament into something issuing from the land, like a rent charge, and that the conveyance of the land, as from the date of that Act, operated to convey the tithe. That assumed that it was the object of the Legislature and the effect of the Act to create that complete transformation in the essential characteristics of tithe. He (the Lord Justice) was unable to accept that view, because it seemed to him that the whole object of the Act of 1836, and particularly of section 71, was to maintain the essential characteristics of tithe, and that that had been the view of the profession might be accepted from the fact that all the text-books had so treated it, and no reference could be made to any decision indicating a contrary view, or to any extract or any expression of judicial opinion anywhere suggesting that it was the intention or effect of the statute to alter the essential characteristics of the tithe. There was no ground for the suggestion that, merely because the statute (in section 67) used the words "issuing out of the lands," it was to be assumed that the whole essential characteristics of tithe had been changed. Chapman v. Gatcombe (2 Bing. N.C., 516) was still good law, and the reasons given by the learned Judges in giving their judgment in that case disposed of the contentions put forward by both counsel for the appellants in the present case. Tithe rent charge was not anything which the conveying party had in, to, or on the property conveyed. Mr. Justice Park indicated that view pretty clearly in Chapman v. Gatcombe (supra), when he said that he would give his decision not merely on the view that tithe would not pass by virtue of "hereditament," but also on the view that it would not pass where that word was employed only in the society of general words and was limited by the words "belonging or appertaining to the premises." The tithe did not belong or appertain to the premises, and it was not something which the party had in, to, or on the property conveyed. The appeal ought to be dismissed, with costs.

Lord Justice Scrutton, in concurring, said, in the course of his judgment, that he agreed with Lord Justice Bankes in thinking that if it were possible to decide in favour of the appellants he would have liked to do so, because it was clear that the trustees who were claiming the tithe rent charge were getting, if they were right, first of all, the tithe rent charge, and were, secondly, getting interest on the price of the land, which was larger because it had been assumed that there was no tithe rent charge except the small one which was mentioned, and therefore they were, as a matter of business, getting the money twice. But it did not follow from that that the rules of law, in the events which happened, prevented them from getting the benefit of the money twice.

Up to the time of the passing of the Tithe Act of 1836 it was quite clear that the conveyance simply of land and hereditaments would not convey tithe issuing out of the land. Tithe would be called, and was called in the language of the lawyers of that time, a collateral hereditament, or a collateral inheritance, which did not pass simply by the conveyance of land and hereditaments. In Phillips v. Jones (3 Bos. and P., 362) it was stated that tithes were not hereditaments belonging to land, but were a separate subject of tenure, and must be held by a different title.

It was stated in Chapman v. Gatcombe (3 Bing. N.C., 516) that tithes were not a charge; they were a collateral inheritance. That case clearly decided that before the passing of the Act of 1836 a conveyance of land with hereditaments did not pass tithes, because tithes were a collateral inheritance which did not pass under such words. The Act of 1836 did effect a change in the manner of recovering the tithe. Instead of getting one-tenth of the corn grown, and counting the chickens and taking every tenth, and counting the eggs and taking every tenth, and counting the fish and taking every tenth fish, a sum of money was fixed in accordance with the price of corn and according to certain rules. But although there was a tithe rent charge, the Act never intended to alter the incidents of the previous tithe, because section 71 provided as follows:—"Any person having any interest in or claim to any tithes . . . before the passing of this Act shall have the same right to or claim upon the rent charge for which the same shall be commuted as he had to or upon the tithes, and shall be entitled to have the like remedies for recovering the same as if his right or claim to or upon the rent charge had accrued after the commutation: provided that nothing herein contained shall give validity to any mortgage or other incumbrance which before the passing of this Act was invalid or could not be enforced; and every estate for life, or other greater estate, in any such rent charge shall be taken to be an estate of freehold; and every estate in any such rent charge shall be subject to the same liabilities and incidents as the like estate in the tithes commuted for such rent charge. . . ."

Parliament intended to leave the legal incidents exactly where they were, altering only the method of collection, and that view seemed to have been taken from 1836 down to the present day. The text-books continued to cite Chapman v. Gatcombe (supra), and there did not appear to have been any suggestion that, in some way, whereas before 1836 a conveyance of "land and hereditaments" did not pass tithe as a hereditament, since 1836, because it was a tithe rent charge, a conveyance of "land and hereditaments" did pass the tithe. That point, therefore, failed and therefore the appeal must fail.

Lord Justice Sargant, in the course of his judgment, said that he agreed with what had been said with regard to the strong desire, if possible, to afford some relief to the appellants, because there could be no doubt whatever that, through an innocent misrepresentation by the vendor, the result was that the estate retained the rent charge in question as part of the property belonging to it and at the same time received the price of land sold increased by the ignorance of the purchaser that it was subject to the rectorial tithe rent charge in question. But there was no method by which such relief could be given.

Turning to the conveyance of September, 1920, the parcels in the conveyance showed quite clearly that what was being conveyed was physical land. It was property mentioned in a schedule. Therefore, prima facie, the subject-matter of the conveyance was physical land with metes and bounds; and, if there was any hereditament, quite distinct from that physical land, that hereditament would not pass. One hereditament could not be appendant or appurtenant to another hereditament, and would not pass if it was a separate hereditament by a conveyance of the other hereditament. Before the Tithe Act, 1836, a conveyance of physical land, with any number of words added, such as estate, right, property, interest, claim and demand, and many other words such as were to be found in the case which had been referred to, Chapman v. Gatcombe (supra), would not have the effect of conveying rectorial tithes and other appropriate tithes arising out of that land.

Could it be assumed that there had been such an alteration in the nature and incidence of the tithe by the Tithe Act, 1836, that tithe rent charge was a property of a different nature, and that it was not a separate hereditament, but was something in the nature of a mere rent charge issuing out of the land? The object of the Act of 1836 was to render definite that which was previously indefinite, and to prevent the discouragement which was cast on the owner of the land by reason of the fact that under the law as it existed one-tenth of the value of any improvement, as well as one-tenth of the original value of the land, went to the tithe proprietor, who had no share in the expense and risk and trouble of making that improvement, and throughout the Act there was nothing—apart from the words of section 67—which suggested that there was any intention at all of putting the tithe commutation rent charge on any different footing from that on which the tithe previously stood. Section 67 provided that a certain sum should be paid, having regard to the value realized by certain kinds of produce during the year, and then the amount was to be payable instead of the said tithes in the nature of rent charge issuing out of the lands charged therewith; and then under section 71 there were general words also. It seemed to be a quite general intention that tithe rent charge should be held and dealt with on the same footing as the tithes for which they were substituted. Having regard to the fact that the tithe rent charge was to be payable instead of the tithes, and having regard to the language of section 71 and the preamble to the Act, the words "in the nature of a rent charge issuing out of the lands charged therewith" (in section 67) could not have such a sweeping effect as was contended for by the appellants, nor could they have had the effect of radically altering the nature of tithes, and converting them into something which instead of being a separate hereditament, was in the nature of a charge on the land. The position was that the conveyance, which was on the face of it a conveyance of physical property, had not the effect of conveying, in addition to that physical property, the rectorial tithe commutation rent charge which was payable out of the property in the nature of a rent charge, but which nevertheless formed, as the tithes formerly did, a definite separate hereditament which had to be conveyed, if at all, by separate deed.

The appeal was dismissed with costs.

Chan. Div. (Tomlin, J.) } 1927. Jan. 11.

HUTTON v. ATTORNEY-GENERAL AND OTHERS.*

Lands—Compulsory acquisition—Military purposes—Certificate by deputy-lieutenants of county—Whether judicial decision involved—Defence Act, 1842 (5 and 6 Vict., c. 94), s. 23.

The grant of a certificate by two deputy-lieutenants of a county under s. 23 of the Defence Act, 1842, that the acquisition of certain land in the county is expedient for military purposes, is not a judicial matter, and therefore, before giving the certificate, they are not bound to give the owner of the land an opportunity of being heard.

This was a motion brought by the plaintiff, as the tenant for life of an estate near Richmond, Yorkshire, to restrain the Attorney-General and the Right Hon. Sir Laming Worthington-Evans, the present Secretary of State for War, from proceeding with an arbitration under the Acquisition of Land (Assessment of Compensation) Act, 1919, for fixing the price at which part of the above estate was to be compulsorily acquired for the purposes of the War Office, and to restrain the arbitrator, Mr. John Willmot, from holding any such proceedings.

Mr. Schiller, K.C., and Mr. H. G. Robertson appeared for the plaintiff; the Attorney-General (Sir Douglas Hogg, K.C.) and Mr. Dighton Pollock for the Attorney-General and Sir Laming Worthington-Evans; and Mr. Morton for the arbitrator.

Mr. Schiller said that the War Office were purporting to acquire the land compulsorily under the Defence Act, 1842. Notice to treat had been given, and negotiations had followed. Section 19 of the Act, if the negotiations failed, gave power to acquire compulsorily, but section 23 provided, by way of condition precedent to anything being done under section 19, that a certificate should be granted by the tribunal there mentioned that it was necessary and expedient that the land should be acquired. It was not until long after a certificate had been obtained under section 23 from two of the deputy-lieutenants of the North Riding of Yorkshire that the plaintiff became aware that it had been granted, and the first ground on which he claimed an injunction was that the condition precedent in section 23 involved a judicial decision, for which purpose it was necessary that both sides should be heard: Everett v. Griffiths (37 The Times L.R., 481; [1921] 1 A.C., 631); Spackman v. Plumstead District Board of Works (1 The Times L.R., 313; 10 App. Cas., 229); Cooper v. Wandsworth District Board of Works (14 C.B., N.S., 180); and Local Government Board v. Arlidge (30 The Times L.R., 672; [1915] A.C., 120).

Mr. Justice Tomlin said that the whole issue was whether section 23 of the Defence Act, 1842, involved the determination of a matter between the parties, or merely provided that the War Office must, as a preliminary to acquiring land compulsorily, obtain the certificate of independent officers that it was necessary and expedient to acquire the land.

Mr. Schiller contended that it was a matter for determination between the parties. It was a very serious thing to expropriate land, and the subject was entitled to every protection.

Mr. Justice Tomlin said that the warrant of the Lord High Treasurer was also required under section 23. Was it suggested that the parties must be heard before that was done? It was most unlikely, and, if not in that case, why should it be different in regard to the granting of the certificate?

Mr. Schiller said that there was a further objection to the holding of the arbitration—namely, that it was a condition precedent under section 19 for the War Office to go into possession. This had not been done. Under that section a jury was only to be summoned to assess compensation after the land had been taken.

Mr. Justice Tomlin said that even if that was so under the Defence Acts, was not the objection met by sections 1 and 7 of the Acquisition of Land (Assessment of Compensation) Act, 1919?

Mr. Schiller submitted that it was not, and said that the Act of 1919 did no more than create a new tribunal for assessing compensation.

The Attorney-General said that, without accepting the suggested construction of section 19 of the Defence Act, 1842, his answer would be that already indicated by the Court—namely, that assessment of compensation was sufficient.

* Reported by H. C. Garsia, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

As regards the other contention that the Lord Lieutenant and deputy-lieutenants exercised a judicial function in granting their certificate, he submitted that that was clearly not so. The Lord Lieutenant was, in 1842 and for many years after, the head of the military forces of the county ; so that he would be the very last person to be selected to decide judicially between the War Office and a subject, but a most suitable person to say whether the acquisition of the land was necessary and expedient for military purposes.

In 1842 the position of the Lord Lieutenant had been laid down in 42 Geo. III., c. 90, an Act relating to the raising of militia. Deputies acted for him when he was out of the country. It was in the following two years that the Acts were passed as emergency provisions which were afterwards embodied permanently in the Defence Act, 1842.

Mr. ROBERTSON replied.

MR. JUSTICE TOMLIN said that in this action the plaintiff, who was the tenant for life of a large estate in Yorkshire, was suing the Attorney-General and Sir Laming Worthington-Evans and Mr. John Willmot. Sir Laming Worthington-Evans was sued in his personal capacity as the present Secretary of State for War, and Mr. Willmot was the arbitrator appointed in circumstances to be mentioned. The plaintiff was moving to restrain the first two defendants from taking any proceedings to ascertain the assessment of compensation to be paid for the compulsory acquisition of the plaintiff's land, and to restrain Mr. Willmot from holding any such proceedings.

The War Office required part of the plaintiff's land for military purposes, and had taken steps for that purpose under the Defence Act, 1842. On August 5 and 6, 1925, certificates had been obtained from two deputy-lieutenants under section 23 of the Act, and a warrant had also been granted by the Treasury under the same section. On October 2, 1925, notice was served on the plaintiff under an earlier section requiring him to agree the purchase price of the land. That the parties had failed to do, but it was not till March, 1926, that the plaintiff learned that the certificates had been given by the deputy-lieutenants in the preceding August.

The plaintiff now claimed that the exercise of the compulsory powers under section 19 was contingent on a certificate being obtained under section 23 ; and that the granting of that certificate by the Lord Lieutenant or two deputy-lieutenants was a judicial matter, so that a certificate could not properly be granted without giving the owner of the land an opportunity to be heard.

Mr. Schiller had cited a number of authorities to show that a body of that sort was acting in a judicial capacity. In Cooper v. Wandsworth District Board of Works (14 C.B., N.S., 180) Mr. Justice Willes said that a tribunal which was invested by law with power to affect the property of one of his Majesty's subjects was bound to give the subject an opportunity of being heard. That was not questioned, and the only matter to be determined was whether the deputy-lieutenants were such a tribunal, and that was a question of construction of the statute.

His (his Lordship's) attention had been called to the historic position of the Lord Lieutenant and the deputy-lieutenants, as laid down in 42 Geo. III., c. 90, and to the fact that the Act (43 Geo. III., c. 55), which, though a temporary measure, was the prototype of the Defence Act, 1842, was passed in the following year, and was amended (44 Geo. III., c. 95) in the next year afterwards. It was said, on behalf of the plaintiff, that a judicial function was vested in the Lord Lieutenant or deputy-lieutenants, and that, if that were not so, then the procedure under the Acts was such that a landowner could have his land compulsorily acquired without his ever being in a position to object on the ground that it was neither necessary nor expedient. But that consideration would not justify him in coming to a conclusion contrary to the reasonable meaning of the language employed in the statute.

It was to be observed that when, under the Defence Act, 1842, a judicial function fell to be performed, the Act provided for its being performed by judicial officers, with elaborate provisions as to procedure. That was so in section 19, but in section 23, on the contrary, officers who were not judicial officers were selected. They were persons who had certain military functions and might well be considered by Parliament to be well qualified to form a judgment as to the necessity or expediency of the taking of lands in their county for military purposes.

Further, section 23 contained two conditions precedent which were linked together—namely, the certificate under consideration and the warrant of the Treasury. It would be a bold person who contended that the subject must be heard before that warrant was granted. The question of the necessity or expediency of acquiring the land must be largely a matter of policy, and it was difficult to suppose that the Legislature should contemplate a question of policy, possibly vital to the defence of the country, being debated before a tribunal at the instance of the subject whose land was being acquired.

That consideration would not affect the Court if the language of the section was such as clearly to set up a judicial tribunal ; but when the Court was asked to construe language that did not clearly do so it was a material consideration. He came, therefore, to the conclusion that this contention of the plaintiff failed.

A further point had been taken—that there was no power under section 19 of the Act to summon a jury to assess the compensation until the Crown had taken possession of the land. There were two answers to this. First, the power to call a jury did not, on the true construction of section 19, depend on the Crown having been put in possession. Secondly, even if that had not been so, the matter was now governed by the Acquisition of Land (Assessment of Compensation) Act, 1919, the provisions of which were, by section 7, made to prevail over those of any earlier Act. The second contention also failed. The motion would, therefore, be refused.

GUILDFORD TRUST, LIMITED v. GOSS AND ANOTHER.*

Bills of Exchange—Cheque—Partnership—Two partners sued as drawer and indorser respectively—Cheque drawn in favour of third partner—Signatures in blank—Belief that partnership stamp would be affixed—Fraudulent negotiation of cheque to money-lenders by payee—Right of moneylenders to recover.

The plaintiffs, who were moneylenders, sued the defendants as the drawer and one of the indorsers of a cheque indorsed to the plaintiffs for value. The defendants were in partnership together with the payee of the cheque and other persons. The cheque had been signed by them in blank, in the belief that the rubber stamp of the partnership would be added and that the cheque would be used for the partnership's business. The payee, in fraud of the other partners, neglected to affix the partnership stamp and used the cheque for the purpose of raising money from the plaintiffs. The cheque, which was post-dated at the time of the loan, was subsequently presented by the plaintiffs, when repayment of one of the agreed instalments under the loan became due, and was dishonoured.

Held, that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover as holders of the cheque for value in due course, as nothing had occurred to put them on inquiry whether the payee was committing a fraud, and the defendants could not contend that the cheque was a document given in escrow, so as not to impose liability until the fulfilment of a special condition, since both the drawer and indorser, when signing the document, had intended that it should be used and negotiated as a cheque.

In this action, which was tried as a short cause, judgment for £100 and interest was given in favour of the plaintiffs, the Guildford Trust, Limited, who were registered moneylenders carrying on business at 29, Duke-street, St. James', S.W. The defendants Goss and Curry were in partnership and carried on business as the Kent Match Syndicate, with another partner named Holdaway, who had also been made a defendant, but upon a receiving order having been made against him the action against him had been stayed. There were also two other partners. The action was brought upon a cheque drawn by the defendant Goss and dated November 1, 1926, upon the Shaftesbury-avenue branch of the Westminster Bank (the bank used by the syndicate) in favour of Holdaway. The cheque was indorsed by Holdaway and Curry in favour of the plaintiffs, but was not met upon presentation. The defendants set up the defence that the cheque was obtained from Goss by the manager of the syndicate, a man named Dursford, in conjunction with Holdaway, apparently for use in the ordinary course of the syndicate's business, and that they did not know that it would be used by Holdaway for the purpose of borrowing money from the plaintiffs. They also claimed relief on the ground that the cheque was given in respect of a moneylending transaction and that the rate of interest charged was harsh and unconscionable.

At the time when the syndicate was formed, about the end of 1925, the defendant Goss was living in London, but subsequently he removed to Aldershot. The banking account of the syndicate continued to be kept in London, and Goss was the person authorised to draw on that account. A practice was adopted whereby the manager Dursford used to send blank cheque forms to Goss, which Goss used to sign, trusting that the syndicate's stamp would be affixed in due course and that they would be used for the syndicate's business. In July 1926 Goss signed a batch of ten such cheques. To five of them Holdaway affixed the syndicate's stamp, so that they appeared as properly drawn syndicate cheques. The other five were left unstamped and appeared as the personal cheques of Goss himself. Holdaway procured those ten cheques to be indorsed by the defendant Curry, who was prepared to back the syndicate's cheques in certain circumstances.

Holdaway then approached the plaintiffs for a loan of £400. He showed them the ten cheques which appeared as post-dated, and the plaintiffs agreed to grant the loan, but required from Holdaway a promissory note for £500 payable by five monthly cheques of £100 each. £200 of that sum was repaid to the plaintiffs by two cheques that appeared on the face of them to be the syndicate's cheques and were met by the syndicate's bankers.

A third cheque, which appeared on the face of it to be a syndicate cheque, was not met, as the syndicate had by that time no available funds at the bank. Subsequently the plaintiffs presented in place of it a cheque which appeared to be drawn as the personal cheque of Goss and was in fact one of the five to which Holdaway had not affixed the syndicate's stamp. It was dishonoured on presentation, and on that cheque the plaintiffs now sued Goss as drawer and Curry as indorser.

Mr. F. T. Barrington-Ward, K.C., and Mr. H. J. Wallington appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. Robert Ritson for the defendants.

Mr. Justice Branson, in giving judgment, said that the plaintiffs were claiming as indorsees for value of a cheque for £100, the cheque being on the face of it drawn by the defendant Goss in favour of Holdaway and indorsed by Holdaway and by the defendant Curry. Prima facie, therefore, the plaintiffs were entitled to succeed. It was said, however, on behalf of the defendants that the cheque had been negotiated by Holdaway in fraud of the two defendants and that therefore the prima facie inference did not follow.

It was possible that if the case had borne certain aspects it would have been necessary to draw a distinction between the two defendants, but in the view that he (his Lordship) took that distinction ceased to be material. The first defence raised by the defendants was that the fact that the cheque was post-dated should have put the plaintiffs on enquiry, when they would have found that Holdaway was not entitled to negotiate the cheque. Evidence had, however, been given on behalf of the plaintiffs that it was quite usual for a syndicate such as this to borrow money from moneylenders and to give post-dated cheques in connexion with such transactions. In the fact that the cheque was post-dated and in the fact that a person, whose name appeared as a partner in the printed heading of the syndicate's paper, was dealing with cheques that bore the signature of other partners, there was, in his opinion, nothing that ought to have raised a suspicion in the plaintiffs' mind that a fraud was being perpetrated. The first defence, therefore, failed.

The next defence was that the ten cheques, of which the cheque sued on was one, were not cheques signed in order to be used in the way in which they had been used, and that therefore the matter fell within the case of Smith v. Prosser (23 The Times L.R., 597; [1907] 2 K.B., 735), in that the cheque was a document delivered in escrow and one that could not impose liability, if used prematurely. The plaintiffs' answer was that when the defendant Goss signed those documents he intended that they should be used as cheques and issued as negotiable instruments, and that it was not a case of documents having been given which were not to be issued except in certain circumstances that had not arisen. It was contended on behalf of the defendant Curry that when he indorsed those cheques he intended in every case to indorse a document which should purport to be drawn by the syndicate and not by Goss personally. Had the syndicate been a limited company, a strong argument, and one requiring very careful consideration, might have been developed on those lines, but those questions did not arise in the present case, because the syndicate was an ordinary partnership, and consequently, when Goss signed a cheque intending that it should bear the rubber stamp of the syndicate, he did not thereby limit his liability, inasmuch as, if the cheque had been negotiated in the way that he had intended, he would still have been liable to a holder for value for the full amount. Similar considerations applied in the case of the defendant Curry.

The plaintiffs, therefore, were entitled to recover as holders for value in due course. Having seen Mr. Harris, who conducted the transaction on behalf of the plaintiffs, in the witness-box, and having listened to his evidence, he (his Lordship) was quite satisfied that the plaintiffs had no suspicion that Holdaway was perpetrating any fraud at all.

With regard to the defendants' claim to relief under the Money-lenders Act 1900, relief would be granted upon their paying the balance of the principal due to the plaintiffs, together with interest at 40 per cent., within fourteen days.

KOSKAS v. STANDARD MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY, LIMITED.*

Insurance (Marine) — Certificate of insurance—Goods consigned c.i.f.—Sale by consignee on arrival — Goods damaged — Right of action against insurers by purchaser — Condition as to notice—Liability of insurers.

The defendant company insured a quantity of leather, consigned c.i.f., for a voyage from New York to Tunis, by a certificate of insurance which provided: "This certificate represents and takes the place of the policy and conveys all the rights of the original policy-holder . . . as fully as if the property were covered by a special policy direct to the holder of this certificate." By clause 11 of the policy, "In case of loss or damage to the property hereby insured the loss shall be reported to the representative of the company, or, if there be no representative of the company, to Lloyd's agent, as soon as the goods are landed or the loss is known or expected." On the day after the arrival of the goods at Tunis the consignee sold them to the plaintiff, who found them to have been damaged by salt water. In an action by the plaintiff on the certificate of insurance the defendant company pleaded that the clause in the policy as to giving notice within a limited time had not been complied with.

Held, that as it was not clear either that the certificate incorporated clause 11 of the policy or that clause 11 was a condition precedent, the plaintiff was entitled to recover.

This was an appeal by the defendants from a decision of Mr. Justice Sankey (42 The Times L.R., 692).

By a certificate of insurance dated May 16, 1919, 281 bales of sole leather were insured for $10,000 for a voyage from New York to Tunis. The bales were taken from New York as far as Algiers on a steamer, the Eole, and were trans-shipped at Algiers and carried on to Tunis by another steamer, the Nice. The bales arrived at Tunis on July 9, 1919, consigned c.i.f. to a firm called Medina, and on July 10 Medina sold them to Mr. Koskas, the plaintiff.

Mr. Koskas examined the leather and found it, so he said, to have been damaged by salt water. Both steamers had met with bad weather. Mr. Koskas claimed under the policy, and certain examinations of the goods and other proceedings took place at Tunis, but the defendants refused to pay and the plaintiff brought an action.

The defence put the facts in issue and raised two points of law: (1) that the plaintiff was not the right person to sue; and (2) that a clause in the policy as to giving notice of claim within a limited time had not been complied with.

The certificate of insurance was worded as follows:—

"This certificate represents and takes the place of the policy and conveys all the rights of the original policy-holder . . . as fully as if the property were covered by a special policy direct to the holder of this certificate."

One of the conditions of the policy was in much smaller print than other parts of the policy and was as follows:—

"11. In case of loss or damage to the property hereby insured the loss shall be reported to the representatives of the company, or, if there is no representative of the company, to Lloyd's agent, as soon as the goods are landed or the loss is known or expected."

Mr. Justice Sankey held that the certificate, having been issued by the defendant company itself, enured to the benefit of the plaintiff; and that since the plaintiff did not know of the condition as to notice, and since the clause as to notice was in such small print that a reasonable man reading with reasonable care would not regard it as forming part of the contractual terms, the plaintiff was entitled to recover.

The defendants appealed.

Sir W. Greaves-Lord, K.C., and Mr. R. K. Chappell appeared for the appellants; Mr. S. L. Porter, K.C., and Mr. J. St. C. Lindsay for the respondent.

The Court did not call on counsel for the respondent.

Lord Justice Bankes, in giving judgment, said that this was an appeal in an action brought by a person claiming to be entitled to certain policy moneys because he was the holder of a certificate of insurance. In the Court below the defendants had contended that there was no loss covered by the terms of the insurance. That point was decided against them, and there was no appeal as to that. Secondly, it was said that the plaintiff was not the right party to sue, there having been no assignment. That point had not been persisted in. Thirdly, it was said that by the terms of the policy notice to Lloyd's agent (there being no representative of the company at Tunis) was a condition precedent to any right of claim.

His Lordship then referred to clause 11 of the policy, and said that the question was whether that condition, properly construed, created a condition precedent which, if unfulfilled, would avoid the plaintiff's claim. For that purpose he thought that it was necessary to consider the contract as a whole. It presented some very remarkable features. The certificate was said to represent and take the place of the policy and convey all the rights of the original policy-holder. Now what did those words mean? There were three separate expressions to indicate the effect of the document. Did they mean that the certificate wiped out the policy altogether and gave to the holder all the rights contained in the original policy, even though they were inconsistent with the special certificate? He thought it impossible to put a meaning on those three separate expressions and for the insurance company to set up a condition precedent in their favour. In dealing with the contract as a whole he was driven to the policy in spite of the certificate. The policy was the governing document, and it said nothing about notice being a condition precedent. In those circumstances he was not satisfied in dealing with these particular documents that it was the intention of the parties that the giving of notice was a condition precedent. For those reasons the appeal failed. He wished to add that upon the question of the small print, if that point had been taken, he would not have been able to agree with the Judge below. He thought that the printing was sufficiently clear and intelligible to bind both parties.

Lord Justice Scrutton said that he agreed. As to the language of the certificate, he found it extremely puzzling. It was said on behalf of the defendants that clause 11 was a condition precedent. Whether it was so depended, in his opinion, on the construction of the contract between the parties. It was impossible to construe the certificate without reference to the policy which the certificate was said to represent. There were any number of matters in which the certificate differed from the form of the policy. It was impossible for the Court to see what conditions governed or limited the right of payment, or whether compliance therewith was a condition precedent. If underwriters wished to set up a condition limiting liability, they must make it clear in reasonably plain words. In the present case the certificate did not make it clear that notice was to be a condition precedent, and he was not satisfied that clause 11 was to be such a condition. He thought certificates like the present were very common in America, but it was not for him to lecture the Americans. Nevertheless, as regards English certificates, that particular form required to be thoroughly overhauled.

On the question of the illegibility of the print, he was not disposed to agree with the Judge below. He did not agree with the doctrine that one could get out of a clause by saying that one could not read it.

Lord Justice Atkin said that he agreed. The main contention that had been put forward on behalf of the appellants was that there had been a breach by the plaintiff of the condition precedent mentioned in clause 11—namely, that notice should be given as soon as the goods arrived. He thought that the certificate was difficult of construction. It was not a complete contract of insurance in itself. It seemed to him that the policy must be read with the certificate. The net result was that a jumble of clauses had been put before the Court and they were asked to say that one particular clause constituted a condition precedent. He was not satisfied that in this particular case a condition precedent had been established. Upon the question of the illegibility of the small print he agreed with what had been said by the other members of the Court. In his judgment the appeal failed and must be dismissed.

BEHNKE v. BEDE SHIPPING COMPANY, LIMITED.*

Ship—Sale—Goods—Specific performance—Sale of Goods Act, 1893 (56 and 57 Vict., c. 71), ss. 4, 62 (1).

A ship comes within the description of "goods" in the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, since by s. 62 (1) "'goods' include all chattels personal other than things in action and money." Under s. 52 of the Act the Court may direct specific performance of the sale of a ship.

In this action the plaintiff, Mr. Behnke, a German residing at Rostock, claimed specific performance of an alleged contract made on behalf of the defendants for the sale of a steamer to the plaintiff. Alternatively, he claimed an injunction restraining the defendants from parting with the steamer to anyone but himself; and in the further alternative he claimed damages for breach of contract.

Mr. Langton, K.C., and Mr. Carpmael appeared for the plaintiff; and Mr. Miller, K.C., and Sir Robert Aske for the defendants.

Mr. Langton, in opening, said that in the autumn of 1926 the defendants wished to dispose of a steamer called the City. The steamer had been built in 1892, but the boilers and machinery had been renewed in 1921. The plaintiff was looking out for an old vessel which could be acquired at a low price; but such a vessel would be useless to him unless its boilers would pass the German classification authorities.

The defendant company was managed by a firm, Messrs. Frew, Elder, and Co., and that firm had informed various shipbrokers that the City was for sale. A firm of brokers, Messrs. Sloan and Jackson, of Glasgow, brought the vessel to the notice of the plaintiff. A number of letters and telegrams passed between the plaintiff, Sloan and Jackson, and Frew, Elder, and Co., the effect of which was, in the plaintiff's contention, that a definite contract to sell the City to the plaintiff was entered into. Frew, Elder, and Co. denied that a binding contract had been reached, and in the end they sold the steamer to other buyers at a price higher than that offered by the plaintiff.

The plaintiff wanted specific performance of the contract rather than damages. The fact that the boilers and machinery of the City were comparatively new would enable him to satisfy the German authorities, and the steamer was just what he required for the purposes of his business.

Mr. LANGTON called evidence to prove the making of the contract, and to prove that the age of the City made her a cheap ship, while the fact that her boilers would pass the German authorities made her valuable to a German purchaser. It would be difficult to find another ship at the price which combined these advantages.

Mr. LANGTON submitted that the case raised three questions : first, was there ever a concluded contract ; secondly, if there was, could specific performance of it be decreed ; and, thirdly, did a ship come within the provisions of section 4 and section 52 of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893 ? He referred to Fry on Specific Performance (6th edition, p. 36) ; Halsbury's Laws of England (Vol. XXVII., p. 14) ; Chalmers on the Sale of Goods Act, 1893 (10th edition, p. 150), on the question whether a ship was within the Act ; Claringbould v. Curtis (21 L.J., Ch. 541) ; Hart v. Herwig (L.R., 8 Ch., 860) ; Jones v. Tankerville (25 The Times L.R., 714 ; [1909] 2 Ch., 440, at p. 445) ; and In re Wait ([1926] Ch., 962, since reversed by the Court of Appeal, 43 The Times L.R., 150). As to the point that the letters constituted a binding contract, he referred to Lewis v. Brass (3 Q.B.D., 667) and Bonnewell v. Jenkins (8 Ch.D., 70).

Mr. MILLER, for the defendants, called Mr. Frew, a partner in the firm of Frew, Elder, and Co., managers of the Bede Steamship Company. The City had been for sale for five or six years before this case began. He first met Mr. Sloan, of Sloan and Jackson, when Mr. Sloan called on him in the ordinary way of business and said that he had buyers for steamers, and asked for prices. In the negotiations with Mr. Sloan he (the witness) made it quite clear that his offer was open only until the following Saturday, and as it was not accepted by the stipulated time he considered that it had lapsed and that he was free to deal with other buyers.

On the Monday, however, Mr. Sloan asked for further time, which was refused ; and Mr. Sloan then asked him to put the other buyers off, if possible, and he promised to do his best. But on the same day the other buyers called for an immediate answer to their offer, and he put his final conditions before them and said that he must have an answer by 3 o'clock. He telephoned to Mr. Sloan that if the other buyers did not conclude a contract by 3 o'clock he would continue negotiations with him ; but at ten minutes to 3 the other buyers called and bought the steamer. He then telephoned to Mr. Sloan and told him that the matter was finished.

Cross-examined by Mr. LANGTON, he denied that Mr. Sloan was his agent for the purpose of making an offer to Mr. Behnke.

Mr. MILLER said that one party or the other must have made a mistake. The burden was on the plaintiff to prove his case. The plaintiff must show that there was a contract—an offer and an acceptance covering the whole of the ground.

Mr. MILLER then dealt with the documents, interviews, and telephone conversations in detail, and submitted that no contract had been concluded. Mr. Sloan, he submitted, was a broker acting as an intermediary between the parties, desiring to earn a commission for himself. He was not employed by the defendants as agent.

Even if the plaintiff succeeded in establishing a contract, the case would still be only one for damages and not one for specific performance. There was a doubt whether a ship was or was not within the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, but if it was, then the only power to order specific performance must be found in section 52 of the Act. That section gave the Court a discretion to order specific performance, but, so far as he could find, specific performance of the sale of a ship had never been ordered.

The ordinary rule was that specific performance was never ordered where damages would be an adequate remedy, and that principle would apply to this case. Moreover, this contract, if there was a contract, was not a mere contract for the sale and delivery of a chattel ; for it contained provisions, inter alia, that repairs should be carried out to the satisfaction of Lloyd's surveyor, and the Court would never order specific performance of such matters. And section 52 only gave a claim to specific performance where the seller wished to retain the goods for himself.

Mr. LANGTON, in reply, pointed out that the plaintiff had paid a deposit to Sloan and Jackson, and this indicated that Sloan and Jackson were acting as agents for both parties.

He submitted that there was a concluded contract and that the letters constituted a sufficient note or memorandum in writing of it to satisfy section 4 of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893 (Buxton v. Rust, L.R., 7 Ex., 279).

On the question whether a ship was within the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, there was no authority to show that it was. All the cases which were material were cases dealing with ships under construction and not with complete ships.

As to specific performance, the evidence showed that at the time of this contract there was in the market only one other steamer which would suit the plaintiff's purposes, and that steamer would have cost him £2,000 more. The City therefore had a particular value to the plaintiff, and specific performance of the contract should be decreed.

MR. JUSTICE WRIGHT delivered the following considered judgment :—This is an action tried before me on January 12, 1927, without pleadings under an order of the Vacation Judge dated January 5, 1927. The plaintiff, a German shipowner, claims against the defendants, the owners of the British steamship City, a declaration that he purchased the City by contract from the defendants, and an order for specific performance of that contract, and an injunction ; and, in the alternative, damages. The defendants deny the contract, and in the alternative say that it is not enforceable by reason of section 4 of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893 ; and in any event say that it is not a case in which specific performance ought to be decreed.

The negotiations between the plaintiff and defendants were conducted through the intermediation of a Mr. Sloan, of Sloan and Jackson, Limited. I find that he acted throughout in his capacity of a broker for sale and purchase, and that he was not specifically or peculiarly the agent of either party, with any authority to bind either party or to accept a communication for either party. He was in turn the agent of either party "for the purpose of receiving and transmitting propositions." (See Storey on Sale, section 87.) This is the true position of such a broker, whose duty and interest are to do his best to bring the parties together. In the events which happened it is important to define this position. Commission would be paid by the sellers out of the gross price. The deposit was to be paid to the brokers as stakeholders. The plaintiff, who was at Rostock, communicated by letter or telegram with Mr. Sloan, who, in turn, communicated with the plaintiff in the same manner. Mr. Frew, on behalf of the defendants, whose office was at Newcastle-on-Tyne, spoke on the telephone with Mr. Sloan, who was at Glasgow, and letters and telegrams also passed between them. On November 17, 1926, the plaintiff wrote to the brokers with a firm offer of £7,650 for the City, but he made it a condition that the design of the boilers should be such as to satisfy the German boiler authorities; he also stated other conditions. On November 19 the brokers wrote in reply, after a long conversation with the defendants, that the business might be considered as a fixed sale, subject to the boilers being in accordance with German law requirements, and to the adjustment of details of the contract. It was contended by Mr. Langton that the contract was complete at that date, subject to the question of the boilers and to the preparation of a formal contract. I decide against this contention. In my judgment the agreement of the precise terms of the contract was no formality, but an essential part of the bargain, so that no contract could be concluded till the terms had been adjusted and agreed between both parties.

On November 27 (a Saturday) the plaintiff, who had obtained the design and plan of the boilers and submitted them to the German authorities, who were satisfied, telegraphed to the brokers: "City confirmed send contracts." Mr. Langton contended that this closed the bargain and concluded the contract. For the same reasons as stated above, I do not accept this contention. The final stage—namely, the submitting of the contract by the defendants as sellers, and its approval by the plaintiff as buyer—was still not reached. The preparation of the contract had been proceeding.

On November 19 the brokers, after a telephone conversation with the defendants, wrote to them enclosing a pro forma contract for the defendants to amend so that a clean copy could be drafted and sent to Rostock. The defendants replied with various suggestions, all of substance, such as amount of deposit, inspection, &c., and on November 23 the brokers, having sought to embody these suggestions on a clean draft, sent it by letter to the defendants for their approval. On November 24 the defendants, having made various amendments, returned it to the brokers. On the following day they telegraphed to the brokers referring to the doubt that the German authorities would pass the boilers, and added: "We cannot allow later than noon, Saturday, for definite acceptance of steamer on terms of contract posted yesterday." They confirmed this by letter. Mr. Sloan, on receipt of this telegram, telegraphed and spoke to Mr. Frew pointing out that the contract could not reach the plaintiff till Saturday afternoon and suggested further time, say, till Monday afternoon. There was some dispute in the evidence as to what was actually said. I find that Mr. Frew said he would do nothing till Monday, and suggested the contract should be sent by air mail, as indeed it was sent by Mr. Sloan. The reason of Mr. Frew's urgency was that another set of brokers, Wait and Dodds, had approached him with offers from another buyer, which were not indeed at that stage very satisfactory. Mr. Sloan sent a clean copy of the contract as altered by Mr. Frew to the plaintiff with a letter saying that he was only allowed till Saturday to say whether he accepted the steamer on the enclosed form of contract. He also sent another copy of the contract to the defendants. On the same day Wait and Dodds wrote offering on behalf of their clients to buy the steamer for £8,000, paid in certain instalments, or £7,700 cash; and the defendants replied that a meeting of directors would be held on the Monday, November 29.

The plaintiff did not receive the brokers' letter sent on November 25 till the morning of Sunday, November 28. Having regard to the early date fixed for the trial he was not present at the trial, but there is no ground for suggesting that he was not anxious to buy the steamer if the boilers would satisfy the German authorities, and he wired on November 26, as already stated, as soon as he ascertained that fact. He may have been puzzled to receive on the Sunday a letter limiting his time to reply to the previous Saturday, and seems to have waited till the Monday to hear further. The position on the Monday morning, November 29, was that the offer, whether open for Saturday or up to noon Saturday, had lapsed. About 10.30 a.m. Mr. Sloan spoke to Mr. Frew on the telephone and told him of the telegram from the plaintiff, "City confirmed send contracts." Mr. Frew was willing to close with the plaintiff if it appeared that the plaintiff accepted the contract sent to him, but it was obvious that he had not received it. What was said at the conversation is disputed, and I have to decide what version to accept. I have seen both Mr. Sloan and Mr. Frew in the witness-box, and I am satisfied I ought to prefer the evidence of Mr. Sloan. I do not question the honesty of either witness, but Mr. Sloan appears to me to be more accurate and precise in recollection. Immediately after the interview he sent a telegram to the plaintiff, "Owners must have your telegraphic acceptance of contract sent our letter 25th before 4 o'clock to-day otherwise will accept an offer by others who are waiting your reply telegraph instantly whether you agree contract which please sign and post to-day sure to us along with deposit." The telegram was signed with the brokers' telegraphic name. I find that that telegram was dispatched by Mr. Sloan with the authority of Mr. Frew given on the telephone. Mr. Frew denies that he gave any such authority, but apart from the personal impression I have formed of the two witnesses I cannot think that so careful a person as Mr. Sloan would have sent such a telegram without clear authority to do so. The telegram reached the plaintiff at 1.40 p.m. German time, and he at once sent in reply the following telegram to Mr. Sloan, "City accepted contract deposit posted," and he in fact the same day sent by post the contract signed and a cheque for the deposit of £1,500. Mr. Sloan passed on to Mr. Frew by telephone, about 2.50 p.m., the contents of the telegram. I hold that the contract was thereby concluded. I do not think that this result is affected by certain intervening circumstances. Mr. Frew saw Mr. Dodds at 11 a.m., just before his directors' meeting, and after the directors' meeting informed Mr. Dodds (about 11.30) that he could have till 3 p.m. to conclude the purchase of the City on the proposed cash basis. At the same time he telegraphed to Mr. Sloan that as other buyers were insisting on an immediate reply therefore negotiations with the plaintiff must be subject to steamer being free. The latter phrase means, I think, not being under firm offer elsewhere. Mr. Sloan at once telegraphed this to the plaintiff and at the same time telegraphed in reply to Mr. Frew protesting that he was entitled to 5 o'clock as arranged. Mr. Frew, I think, realized, after the firm offer was given to Mr. Dodds, that he had put himself in a difficult position, and sought to revoke his offer to the plaintiff, as he might have done if the revocation had reached the plaintiff before the plaintiff sent off his acceptance. It did not, however, do so. Having regard to the view I have expressed as to the position of the brokers, it seems to me upon well-known principles applying to contract by correspondence that the revocation did not affect the plaintiff till it actually reached him, whereas his acceptance was effective when it was dispatched. Mr. Dodds, for the other buyers, accepted the firm offer before 3 p.m. Some excited and strained passages occurred on the telephone between Mr. Sloan and Mr. Frew. There was still in law no contract between the other buyers and the defendants because various terms of the contract had to be settled, but this was done a few days later. The defendants refused to give any instructions as regards the deposit of £1,500 received by Mr. Sloan from the plaintiff, and repudiated any contract with the plaintiff, who on December 24, 1926, issued the writ in the action.

I have found that a contract for the sale and purchase of the City was concluded between the defendants and the plaintiff, but it is contended that it is not enforceable by reason of section 4 of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893. It is curious that it has not been decided whether a ship comes within the description of goods under that section. Section 62 of the Act defines goods as "All chattels personal other than things in action and money." A ship is clearly a chattel personal. It is true that some provisions of the Act do not apply to it, for example, the rule as to market overt. A British ship is also a chattel which is subject to special rules as to registration and transfer under the Merchant Shipping Acts, though a British ship sold to a foreigner would come in a different category. But section 4 of the Act relates to the antecedent contract, not the actual transfer, and ought logically to apply to so valuable a chattel as a ship. A contract for the building of a ship was held by Mr. Justice Romer to be a contract for the sale of goods within the Act in the case of In re Blyth Shipbuilding and Dry Docks Company, Limited ([1926] Ch., 494). (Compare Sir James Laing and Sons, Limited v. Barclay, Curle, and Co., Limited [1908] A.C., 35.) I hold that section 4 of the Act applies.

Mr. Langton contended that the section was satisfied by the payment of the deposit which was sent by the plaintiff to the brokers. But to constitute part payment not only must the money be sent by the buyer but must also be either accepted or in some way acknowledged by the sellers so as to constitute a recognition by the sellers that there is a contract. (Davis v. Phillips, Mills, and Company, 24 The Times L.R., 4. Parker v. Crisp and Company, 35 The Times L.R., 112; [1919] 1 K.B., 481.) The contract here provided that the deposit was to be held by the brokers pending completion of the contract; hence the brokers received it, not as agents for the defendants, but as stakeholders, and the defendants expressly declined to give any instructions with reference to it. I hold that there was no part payment within the section.

But I hold that there was such a note or memorandum in writing of the contract as the statute requires. The form of contract which the defendants altered in order that it (or a clean copy) should be sent to the plaintiff as the final offer for his acceptance was headed with their name as sellers. They instructed the broker (by letter dated November 25, 1926) to inform the buyer that he must accept the vessel on the terms of the pro forma contract which they had prepared or altered: the brokers sent on a copy under these instructions. I think it must be held that either the pro forma contract, so headed and adopted and altered by the defendants, or the letter in terms referring to it as their offer, or both, constitute an offer in writing, which, if accepted either orally or in writing, would constitute a written note or memorandum. But Mr. Miller contended that the offer of November 25 lapsed and is immaterial. I have, however, found that the first telegram sent to the plaintiff on November 29 was sent with the defendants' authority, and thereby the offer was reinstated. The telegram is signed by the brokers, who at this stage in my opinion were the defendants' agents and signed the telegram which in terms refers to the pro forma contract. Indeed, I think the mere delivery of the pro forma contract created or recognized by the defendants in the way which I have indicated would constitute delivery of a note or memorandum in writing signed by the defendants. The signature may be constituted by a written or printed heading if adopted or recognized by the party to be charged (Schneider v. Norris, 2 M. and S., 286, and Evans v. Hoare, 8 The Times L.R., 441; [1892] 1 Q.B., 593). I think the contract is enforceable.

It remains to consider what is the proper remedy. The plaintiff claims a decree of specific performance. This claim is strongly contested on behalf of the defendants. It is curious how little guidance there is on the question whether specific performance should be granted of a contract for the sale of a ship. Section 52 of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, gives the Court a discretion, if it think fit, in any action for breach of contract to deliver specific or ascertained goods, to direct that the contract shall be performed specifically. I think a ship is a specific chattel within the Act. In Fry on Specific Performance, page 37, note 4, it is said that a ship is probably within the general principle. (See Claringbould v. Curtis, 21 L.J., Ch., 541), which, however, is the case of a barge and contains no distinction of principle. Hart v. Herwig (L.R., 8 Ch., 860) seems to imply that a man who has contracted to purchase a ship is prima facie entitled to have it—that is, by an order for specific performance.

In the present case there is evidence that the City was of peculiar and practically unique value to the plaintiff. She was a cheap vessel, and was built in 1892, but her engines and boilers were practically new and such as to satisfy the German regulations, and hence the plaintiff could, as a German shipowner, have her at once put on the German register. A very experienced ship-valuer has said that he knew of only one other comparable ship, but that may now have been sold. The plaintiff wants the ship for immediate use, and I do not think damages would be an adequate compensation. I think he is entitled to the ship and a decree of specific performance in order that justice may be done. What is the position between the defendants and the other buyers, whose contract was later in time than that of the plaintiff, is irrelevant in this action.

I have not overlooked the argument of Mr. Miller, based on the clauses in the contract which provide that before completion of payment of the balance of the purchase price the buyer was to have the option of inspecting the vessel afloat and of requiring the sellers to place her in dry dock for inspection, and of requiring the sellers to repair certain damage if any were found. Mr. Miller contended that, as the Court will not decree specific performance of a contract to do work or perform services, these clauses constitute a bar to a decree here. But I think this contention is not sound.

The defendants are neither dry dock owners nor ship repairers. All they could be required to do would be to give the appropriate orders to a dry dock owner or ship repairer if necessary. But the plaintiff may not require inspection or dry-docking (which, if no damage be found, will be at his own expense), and no damage requiring repairs may be discovered. Thinking, as I do, that justice can only be satisfied by an order for specific performance, I do not find in the clauses referred to, the only ones relied on by Mr. Miller, any ground why I should not make the decree. There will be judgment, therefore, for the plaintiff, with a declaration that he purchased the City from the defendants and a decree that the contract shall be specifically performed, and an injunction as prayed, and costs.

On the application of Sir Robert Aske a stay of execution was granted.

WELTON v. WELTON.*

Divorce—Wife's petition—Previous petition by husband—Finding of adultery by wife—Husband's conduct conducing—Dismissal of husband's petition—Alimony pending wife's petition—Jurisdiction of Court to order—Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925 (15 and 16 Geo. V., c. 49), s. 190 (3).

Where a wife has been found guilty of adultery on the petition of her husband for dissolution of marriage but the petition has been dismissed because the husband was found guilty of conduct conducing, and where the wife subsequently petitions for dissolution of marriage, the Court has jurisdiction to award her alimony pendente lite.

Decision of Lord Merrivale, P. (43 The Times L.R., 161), affirmed.

This was an appeal by a husband from a decision of the President of the Divorce Division (43 The Times L.R., 161) refusing to discharge an order of the Registrar for the payment of alimony pendente lite to a wife, who was petitioning for a divorce, although she had in previous proceedings by the husband been found to have been guilty of adultery. The husband was, in those previous proceedings, refused a decree on the ground that he had been guilty of cruelty and of conduct conducing to his wife's adultery.

The President refused leave to appeal, but the Court of Appeal granted leave on December 21.

Mr. Acton Pile and Mr. Rewcastle (Mr. Hutchinson with them) appeared for the husband; Mr. Merriman, K.C., and Mr. T. J. O'Connor for the wife.

The MASTER OF THE ROLLS, in giving judgment, said that the argument had raised a somewhat interesting point. The President had given a considered judgment on it, and had refused leave to appeal, probably because the amount involved was only 10s. a week and would not amount altogether to more than £13, assuming a decree to be given within six months. But the Court thought it right to give leave to appeal on the terms that the appellant should make himself liable for the costs of the appeal in any event. The appellant claimed that the order of the President was wrong.

The facts were that the petitioner was married to the respondent on March 9, 1909, and two children were born. In 1918 the husband petitioned for divorce on the ground of his wife's adultery. At the hearing it was proved that the wife had committed adultery, but Lord Coleridge dismissed the petition because the husband had been guilty of cruelty and conduct conducing to the wife's adultery. As early as February, 1917, an order had been made against the husband in the police court for maintenance of his wife under section 5 of the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, but after the decision in the Divorce Division an application was made to the magistrate, the late Mr. Waddy, to revoke the order, and he revoked it on the ground that the wife's adultery had been proved. Therefore, by March, 1919, there had been decisions both in the High Court and in the police court that the wife had committed adultery.

On June 29, 1926, the wife filed a petition charging her husband with adultery. He admitted the charge, but made a counter-charge against his wife. The wife then filed a petition for alimony. The husband's sworn answer was that his means were not so great as they had been represented to be, and that because of her adultery the wife was not entitled to alimony. The petitioner, in her affidavit, said that she was only just able to earn enough to support herself and her two children, one of whom was an invalid, and to pay the rent of a single room; and that the man with whom she had been living had died some 18 months before. The Registrar ordered the payment of 10s. a week alimony, and the President affirmed his decision. The husband appealed.

Two points were raised by counsel for the appellant—(1) that where the wife had been guilty of adultery there was no power in the Court to grant her alimony; and (2) that where the spouses had in fact been separated for some years, and the wife had been able to maintain and support herself and her children, the Court ought not to order alimony pendente lite.

The first point depended on the interpretation to be given to the statutes. Under section 190, subsection (3), of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, it was provided as follows:—

"On any petition for divorce or nullity of marriage the Court shall have the same power to make interim orders for the payment of money by way of alimony or otherwise to the wife as the Court has in proceedings for judicial separation."

The argument was that the power was only given to the same extent as in proceedings for judicial separation, and no more, and that that power depended on section 22 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, which was as follows:—

"In all suits and proceedings, other than proceedings to dissolve any marriage, the said Court shall proceed and act and give relief on principles and rules which in the opinion of the said Court shall be as nearly as may be conformable to the principles and rules on which the Ecclesiastical Courts have heretofore acted, but subject to the provisions herein contained and to the rules and orders under this Act."

It was important to notice the proviso at the end of the section, "subject to the provisions herein contained. . . ." One of the new principles laid down by the Act, and found in section 31, was that the Court was not bound to pronounce a decree for dissolution if the petitioner had been guilty of wilful neglect or misconduct conducing to the respondent's adultery.

It was said that, according to the cases such as

* Reported by H. LANGFORD LEWIS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Otway v. Otway (4 The Times L.R., 523, 534; 13 P.D., 141) and Everett v. Everett (35 The Times L.R., 613; [1919] P., 298), a judicial separation could be granted only where the wife had been free from all matrimonial misconduct, and that, as the present petitioner came into Court with a decree against her finding that she had been guilty of adultery, she must fail if the Court were to test her position by the question whether she would be able to get a decree for judicial separation. But the cases referred to were cases where the adultery was considered simpliciter and without any question of a disability on the part of the other spouse by reason of his conduct having conduced to it. In Everett v. Everett (supra) the Court refused a decree on the ground that the petitioner was in fact still living in adultery. Neither of the cases dealt with the position of persons applying for an order for alimony pendente lite. In Holt v. Holt (28 L.J., P. and M., 12) the Judge Ordinary said that a husband was no longer bound to support a wife who was guilty of adultery, and that she was not entitled to ask for alimony. But whether, as it was said, the right to alimony depended on the wife's right to pledge her husband's credit for necessaries or not, that point, in his Lordship's opinion, did not arise in the present case. There were several kinds of cases where a husband was not entitled to impute adultery to his wife, such as connivance and condonation, and under the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, conduct conducing to adultery.

Here there was a case in which adultery simpliciter could not be charged against the wife, as it was plain from the order of Lord Colcridge that he did not regard the husband as free from fault. Therefore the cases which had been cited by counsel for the appellant were not really in point, and did not restrict the power of the Divorce Court in the matter of ordering the payment of alimony pendente lite. The Court could not hold that it could not grant alimony merely because of the fact that the wife was guilty of adultery. The President spoke of the wife as a competent suitor, and her husband could not rely on her previous adultery as preventing her from taking proceedings herself. It appeared, therefore, that section 190, subsection 3, of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, operated, and there was power in the Court to make an order for alimony pendente lite.

On the second point, the Court again could not neglect the effect of the conduct of the husband in conducing to his wife's adultery. The evidence was not sufficient to oust the jurisdiction of the Court, which could not be considered solely from the point of view whether the wife could have pledged her husband's credit for necessaries. The Registrar had abundant material upon which to make the order, and the appeal must be dismissed, with costs.

Lord Justice Sargant said that he was of the same opinion and would compress his remarks into a very short space. The appellant wanted to read section 190 (3) of the Act as if the words were "the Court shall have power to make the same kind of interim orders as the Ecclesiastical Courts could have made in proceedings for judicial separation." That argument was quite ill-founded; there was a general power given by the language of the subsection. The President stated the point quite succinctly. The appellant's argument, if acceded to, would have the effect of unduly crippling the powers of the Court. As the President said, the wife had a right to bring the suit, and, though she had committed adultery, she might succeed in getting a decree. That summed up the reasons upon which the President considered that he had power to grant the alimony in question. Then came the second question. It was said that alimony was never granted where it was shown that the wife was maintaining herself, and cases were cited, but those decisions depended upon their own facts. In the present case the wife had made a distinct statement that she was incapable of maintaining herself. There was sufficient evidence upon which the Registrar could make the order, and he had fixed the alimony payable at a very moderate amount.

Lord Justice Lawrence agreed. He thought that section 190 (3) of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, conferred on the Court a general power to make such an order. He agreed that the wife was a competent suitor, and he had nothing to add on the second point.

Justices — Summary jurisdiction—Conviction—Particularity—Betting Act, 1853 (16 and 17 Vict., c. 119), ss. 1, 3—Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910 (10 Edw. VII. and 1 Geo. V., c. 24), s. 79 (1) (b).

The licensee of a public-house was convicted under s. 79 (1) (b) of the Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910, for that he ". . . unlawfully did suffer to be used his premises . . . in contravention of the Betting Act, 1853."

Held, that the conviction was bad on the face of it, because it did not specify the particular contravention of the Betting Act, 1853. The defendant was entitled to demand the same particularity in proceedings under s. 79 (1) (b) of the Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910, as he would have been entitled to in a prosecution under the Betting Act, 1853, itself.

This was a case stated by Warwickshire Quarter Sessions.

An appeal by Thomas Pointon (hereinafter called the appellant) against a certain conviction, as hereinafter stated, came on for hearing at the general quarter sessions of the peace in and for the county of Warwick on July 2, 1926, when the Court allowed the said appeal subject to the opinion of the King's Bench Division of his Majesty's High Court of Justice on the following case:—

On the hearing of the said appeal the following facts were proved or admitted:—

On April 24, 1926, at the court of summary jurisdiction held at Coventry, an information under the Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910, section 79 (1) (b), was preferred by Henry Cox, a police inspector (hereinafter called the respondent), against the appellant for that he "At the said city on divers dates between March 26, 1926, and April 17, 1926 (both dates inclusive), then being the holder of a justices' licence, unlawfully did suffer to be used his premises, situate at New-street there and known by the sign of the 'Livery Stables,' in contravention of the Betting Act, 1853." The said information was heard and determined by the court of summary jurisdiction on April 29, 1926, when the said court convicted the appellant of the said offence and fined him the sum of £10. A copy of the said conviction accompanied this case.

* Reported by J. W. Hall, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The appellant duly appealed against the said conviction to the quarter sessions for the county of Warwick. The notice of appeal contained five grounds of appeal, one of which was as follows :— "That the said conviction is bad on the face of it."

On the hearing of the said appeal before the deputy-chairman of quarter sessions it was argued by counsel on behalf of the appellant that the said conviction was bad on the face thereof on the ground that the alleged contravention of the Betting Act, 1853, was not set out, nor was the section of that Act of Parliament a contravention of which was alleged referred to, and that the conviction was indefinite and ambiguous.

After hearing arguments by counsel on both sides the deputy-chairman came to the conclusion, and held, that the appeal must be allowed on the ground that the conviction was bad on the face thereof. In the course of the argument counsel for the respondent applied to him to amend the said conviction if he was of opinion that the conviction in its original form was insufficient. Having considered the said application and the several cases to which he was referred by counsel, the deputy-chairman refused in the exercise of his discretion to amend the conviction. His reasons for refusing to amend the said conviction were stated by him as follows : "The long course of decisions on this point has established this principle, that, when a Court of quarter sessions is asked to amend a conviction of this kind, though the Court can and in a proper case ought to make a correction, where the only defect is a clerical mistake—an accident—in the court below, the Court here ought not to exercise its power to amend and has no right to make an amendment if what it is asked to do is to write into a conviction something which involves an alteration in the judgment—the judgment which is appealed from, and which has been pronounced and is supposed to be recorded in the document itself. This Court cannot write with any safety into this conviction what ought to be there—namely, a clear statement of the actual offence for which this man was convicted—and the reason why it cannot write that in is because it has not before it any material for deciding which of the possible offences that might be written in is the proper one that should be written in, and this Court is not going to investigate the case with the idea of finding out what the proper charge was, and what the actual decision of the justices was, and how it ought to be entered, and how this document ought to have been made definite and clear. The Court does not exercise its jurisdiction to amend in this case." The deputy-chairman offered to state a case upon the question of law raised, if so desired.

The question for the opinion of the High Court was whether the deputy-chairman, being the Court of quarter sessions as aforesaid, was right in holding that the said conviction was bad upon the face thereof and in allowing the said appeal.

The material parts of the conviction are set out in the judgment of the Lord Chief Justice.

Mr. Birkett, K.C., and Sir Travers Humphreys appeared for the respondent ; Sir Henry Maddocks, K.C., and Mr. J. F. Eales for the appellant.

The Lord Chief Justice.—I desire to preface the very few observations that I have to make by repeating the words which were employed by Lord Coleridge, then Chief Justice, in the case of Cotterill v. Lemprière (6 The Times L.R., 262 ; 24 Q.B.D., 634), where he said, at page 636 : "I yield to this objection with extreme reluctance, because, as Lord Tenterden, C.J., said in Rex v. Pain (7 D. and R., at p. 684), 'It is a very nice and subtle objection, and quite beside the merits.'"

The conviction is set out as part of the case ; and the important words are the following : "Thomas Pointon, of the Livery Stables Publichouse, Newstreet, Coventry (hereinafter called the defendant), is this day convicted before this Court for that he at the said city on divers dates between March 26, 1926, and April 17, 1926 (both dates inclusive), then being the holder of a justices' licence, unlawfully did suffer to be used his premises, situate at New-street there and known by the sign of the 'Livery Stables,' in contravention of the Betting Act, 1853, contrary to the form of the statute in such case made and provided." There is, as is obvious, no little particularity in that form of conviction. It is not complained that the dates are not present, or that the defendant is not accurately described as being the holder of the particular justices' licence which is referred to, or that the premises are not accurately described. The complaint is that in one particular respect there is a lack of that precision which is required, namely, in the phrase, "Did suffer to be used his premises . . . in contravention of the Betting Act, 1853," no more exact description being given of the section or the part of the section which the defendant was found to have contravened.

Now, by section 79 (1) of the Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910, it is provided, among other things, that the holder of a justices' licence shall not "suffer his premises to be . . . used in contravention of" the Betting Act, 1853 ; and when one looks to see in what different ways such a person occupying such premises could be guilty of a contravention of the Betting Act, 1853, in the sense of suffering his licensed premises to be used in some unlawful way, it is apparent from section 1 of the Betting Act, 1853, that he may suffer his premises so to be used in one or other or both of two ways : he may suffer his premises to be used for the purposes of a ready-money betting establishment, or he may suffer his premises to be used for the purposes of a credit betting establishment ; and undoubtedly this form of conviction, like the form of the information, does not allege in which of those two contrasted ways the defendant is said to have infringed the law.

Is it sufficient that the conviction should record, and record merely, that the defendant has suffered his premises to be used in contravention of the Betting Act, 1853 ? In support of the proposition that the conviction as it stands is sufficient Mr. Norman Birkett, if I may say so, has urged a very ingenious argument, and an argument which for some time I at any rate was disposed very much to entertain. The argument may be stated quite shortly in this way : It is quite true that the Betting Act of 1853 by the section already referred to constitutes at least two quite different offences, and, if the prosecution in this case had been launched under the Betting Act, 1853, it would have been right and necessary to state in the information which of the two offences exactly was alleged ; and more than that, it was conceded that, if that element of particularity was in fact missing from the information, it would have been right for the defendant to apply for and to obtain the requisite particulars. But it was said : This was not a prosecution under the Betting Act, 1853. It was a prosecution under the Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910 ; and what is done in section 79 (1) (b) in the words already cited is to make a different offence, which consists of the infringement of the Betting Act, 1853, in either of the ways referred to. It is as if these words in section 79 (1) (b) of the Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910, "To be . . . used in contravention of that Act," were a combined verb, every pair of words in the expression being notionally united by a hyphen, and so the offence is that the premises were suffered to be used in contravention of the Betting Act, 1853, and that is true, whether the business there carried on is a ready-money betting business or is a credit betting business.

It is, as I have said, an attractive argument, but upon further consideration I cannot perceive any good and sufficient reason why, when the offence is under the Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910, there should be an omission in this respect to afford the defendant the precise information to which, ex concessis, he would have been entitled if the prosecution had been under the Betting Act, 1853.

Now, in order to see how exacting are the requirements of the law in that respect, one need only turn to one case. There are many other cases to the same effect, but this case exhibits the point of the matter with remarkable clearness. It is the case of Cotterill v. Lemprière (supra). In that case what was being dealt with was a statute or by-law which created two distinct offences and provided the same penalty for both. It provided that "No smoke or steam shall be emitted from the engines"—that is, the engines attached to certain tramcars—"so as to constitute any reasonable ground of complaint to the passengers or the public," and the penalty was the same whichever class of persons had a ground of complaint. The information and conviction stated that the defendant permitted smoke to escape contrary to the by-law, without stating in terms any reasonable ground of complaint to the passengers or the public or either of them ; and it was held that that statement was insufficient and that the conviction must be quashed. There the matter which was left vague, and the only matter which was left vague, was whether it was the passengers on the one hand or the public on the other hand who suffered from the emission of the smoke. And in giving judgment Lord Coleridge, having referred to the words of Lord Tenterden already mentioned, said : "Probably it is true that the principles of construction have been to a certain extent relaxed in formality in modern days ; yet at the same time strictness of statement is still valuable, especially in a case where the result may be highly penal. Where the result of a conviction is to inflict a heavy penalty on the person accused, it lies on the prosecution to prove the case strictly. In the present case the by-law on which the conviction is founded provides that 'No smoke or steam shall be emitted from the engines so as to constitute any reasonable ground of complaint to the passengers or the public.' This provides for the case of smoke being emitted so as to cause a nuisance both to the passengers and to the public, or to one only of these two classes of persons, while in either case the penalty provided is the same. It does not follow that the cause of complaint is to the two classes together, for it may be to one and not to the other. It has long since been decided that where a man is convicted on a statute creating an alternative offence, and the same penalty is imposed in either case, the information and conviction must state which offence is intended to be charged. In the present case the information stated simply that the appellant permitted smoke to escape from his engine contrary to the by-laws of the Board of Trade, and the conviction followed the words of the information. Both the information and the conviction stated a general offence against the by-laws, whereas the by-law creates two separate and distinct offences in the alternative. I think that even now, if the point arose for the first time, I should hold that the information and conviction must point out which offence is intended to be charged, but the point is not open, being concluded by authority." And Lord Esher, giving judgment to the like effect, said, at page 639 : "This case, like the old cases which have been referred to, is to be decided on the governing rule and principle of English criminal law, which is, that the question in this country is not, as it is in many countries abroad, simply whether the person charged is guilty or not guilty, but whether the prosecution proves the case strictly and in form. If the cases which have been referred to did not exist, I should still be of opinion that the offence in the present case was not distinctly and properly charged. Take the information. It may be that the smoke annoyed the passengers ; whether it did or not is a question of evidence ; or, on the other hand, it may be that it annoyed the public. It is important that the defendant should know which of these two offences is intended to be proved against him. Something is wanting the want of which might cause injustice. But if we look at the cases we find that they are distinct authorities for the contention that this conviction cannot be supported."

In like manner, to refer only to one of the many other relevant cases, in Smith v. Moody (19 The Times L.R., 7 ; [1903] 1 K.B., 56, at p. 63), Mr. Justice Channell said this : "The principle . . . seems to be that, subject to statutory provisions making certain things unnecessary in certain cases, the conviction must be as precise as the summons"—that means as precise as a properly drawn summons —"and if there were a charge against a man—either by an indictment or by summons, made in the vague way in which this conviction is drawn up—a charge against a man of injuring the property of another, without specifying what property or giving any further information, it does seem to me that that would be insufficient. Therefore, following the rule that the conviction must be as precise as an indictment, I think that this conviction is wrong in form unless it is met by some statutory provision on the point. Section 39 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, is the one relied on ; but that seems to be rather a repetition of previous enactments, and, although section 39 provides that it shall be sufficient, so far as regards the description of the offence, to follow the statute, I do not think the section in any way dispenses with the usual necessity for specifying time and place and matter in the way in which it has been hitherto specified. It could not possibly suffice in a case of larceny simply to specify the name of the person whose property was stolen. There must be facts relating to the particular matter, such as the time when, and the manner in which, the offence was committed, which would have to be inserted in the charge, and the omission of which cannot be cured by stating the offence in the words of the statute." In the same case Lord Alverstone, on page 60, having explained that he had for a time entertained the contrary view, said : "On further considering the question, which is undoubtedly one of importance, it seems to me that it could not have been intended by that section"—that is to say, by section 39 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879—"to do away with the old rule of criminal practice which requires that fair information and reasonable particularity as to the nature of the offence must be given in indictments and convictions." Then he added, a little later: "In my opinion, section 39 does not cure the omission from a conviction of such particularity in the description and details of the offence as has always been required."

The attention of the Court was directed in the course of the argument in the present case to the provisions (which, however, at the relevant date had not yet come into operation) of the Criminal Justice Act, 1925. If one contrasts and compares the provisions of that Act with the provisions of section 39 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act of 1879, it is apparent that in the later legislation there is a change in the direction of greater latitude. But even under the Criminal Justice Act, 1925, section 32, there are still important matters to be observed. By subsection (1) of section 32 it is provided that "Every information, complaint, summons, warrant or other document laid, issued, or made for the purpose of or in connexion with any proceedings before examining justices or a court of summary jurisdiction for an offence, shall be sufficient if it contains a statement of the specific offence with which the accused person is charged, together with such particulars as may be necessary for giving reasonable information"—"reasonable information"—"as to the nature of the charge." Then, subsection (2) more particularly adds: "The statement of the offence shall describe the offence shortly in ordinary language, avoiding as far as possible the use of technical terms, and without necessarily stating all the essential elements of the offence, and, if the offence charged is one created by statute, shall contain a reference to the section of the statute creating the offence."

Now, in the present case it seems to me that the argument which was urged at quarter sessions was right, that the conviction was bad on its face, because the alleged contravention of the Betting Act, 1853, was not set out, nor was the section of that Act of Parliament referred to. It is, as I said, conceded that if the prosecution had been under the Betting Act, 1853, itself, those matters which this conviction omits would have been necessary. I cannot accept the argument that, because the prosecution is not under the Betting Act, 1853, but is under a different Act referring to that Act, a less degree of precision is permissible.

In these circumstances, and for these reasons, I think that the Court of quarter sessions came to a correct conclusion in point of law, and that this appeal must be dismissed.

Mr. Justice Salter.—I am of the same opinion. The conviction must be as precise as the information or summons or other document formulating the accusation. This does not, of course, mean that, if the accusation is insufficient, a conviction which follows the accusation is good. The conviction must be as precise as a proper and sufficient information or summons. The question, therefore, is whether the information here was sufficient.

The question whether a conviction is or is not sufficiently precise seems rather a technical point; but, inasmuch as it appears to involve the question whether the accusation is sufficiently precise, I think it contains elements of substance. In my opinion, an accused person is entitled to information in two respects: he is entitled first of all to be told what law, statutory or other, he is alleged to have broken; and in addition he is entitled to be told with reasonable particularity how he is alleged to have broken that law.

The Indictments Act, 1915, section 3 (1), provides that "Every indictment shall contain, and shall be sufficient if it contains, a statement of the specific offence or offences with which the accused person is charged, together with such particulars as may be necessary for giving reasonable information as to the nature of the charge." The same provision, in substance, is contained in section 32 of the Criminal Justice Act, 1925, to which my Lord has already referred. If that Act had come into force in time to govern this case, I think Mr. Birkett's case would have been unarguable. The section which governs this case is section 39 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879. That section was considered in the case of Smith v. Moody (19 The Times L.R., 7; [1903] 1 K.B., 56), to which my Lord has already referred. He has referred to the observations of Lord Alverstone in that case; and similar observations were made by Mr. Justice Channell, who said, on page 63: "Section 39 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, is the one relied on; but that seems to be rather a repetition of previous enactments, and, although section 39 provides that it shall be sufficient so far as regards the description of the offence to follow the statute, I do not think the section in any way dispenses with the usual necessity for specifying time and place and matter in the way in which it has been hitherto specified."

Now, here the information alleges, and alleges only, that the accused person, being a licensed person, suffered the premises in respect of which he was licensed to be used in contravention of the Betting Act, 1853, within a certain period of time. The time is defined, and the place is defined, but nothing more. The material sections, sections 1 and 3, of the Betting Act, 1853, appear to me to create a large number of offences. It is unnecessary to go into the matter in any detail; but it is an offence to use a place for the owner to bet there; it is an offence to use a place for the occupier to bet there, or for the keeper to bet there, and so on. There is a series of offences in connexion with ready-money betting, and a corresponding series of offences in respect of credit betting; and all that this man is told is that it is alleged that he has suffered one or more or all of those offences to be committed at that place during this period.

I have some doubt whether this is even a sufficient description of the offence, to use the expression of section 39 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, or a sufficient statement of the specific offence, within the meaning of section 32 of the Criminal Justice Act, 1925. But, whether that be so or not, I am quite clearly of opinion that it is not sufficient to give him the particulars to which he is entitled. The conviction followed this information, and it is therefore equally bad, and it should be set aside.

Mr. Justice Talbot.—I am of the same opinion. The appellant was convicted of suffering his licensed premises to be used in contravention of the Betting Act, 1853. There are at least two ways in which premises can be used in contravention of that Act, and they are specified in the first section of the Act. The rule stated, for example, by Mr. Justice Channell, in the case of Smith v. Moody (19 The Times L.R., 7; [1903] 1 K.B., 56), that a conviction must be as precise as a summons or indictment, and described by Lord Alverstone, C.J., in Rex v. Hankey (21 The Times L.R., 409 ; [1905] 2 K.B., 687), as an important and salutary rule, was not disputed by the learned counsel for the respondent ; and it was accordingly admitted that a conviction under the Betting Act, 1853, would be bad if it did not specify the particular use of the premises which had been charged and proved. But it was said that in a conviction under section 79 of the Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910, it was enough to state that the defendant suffered his premises to be used in contravention of the Betting Act, 1853 ; that that is a separate statutory offence created by the Act of 1910, and not the same as that created by the Betting Act, 1853—permitting premises to be used in the way described by that statute. This distinction, though highly technical, is sound according to the decision in the case of Bannister v. Clarke (36 The Times L.R., 778 ; [1920] 3 K.B., 598) ; and it is also true that by section 39 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, which appears to be merely declaratory of the law as previously understood, it is enough, in the description of the offence and the conviction, to use the words of the statute which creates it.

Assuming that this is satisfied by the present conviction, it does not make it the less necessary, as was held in Smith v. Moody (supra), to specify the particulars of the offence so described ; nor is that obligation removed by the fact that the offence under the Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910, is technically distinct from the offence under the Betting Act, 1853. It would be quite contrary, in my opinion, to the settled rule which governs this matter to hold that a conviction, stating that the appellant suffered the use of his licensed premises in contravention of the Betting Act, 1853, is good without specifying the manner in which that Act was contravened.

In my opinion, therefore, the Court of quarter sessions came to a right conclusion, and the question which is asked of this Court must therefore be answered in the affirmative.

SMITH v. WOOD.*

Emergency Regulations—Supply of fuel—Publication of statement calculated to restrict—Distribution—Emergency Regulations, 1926, reg. 21.

During a strike it was agreed between the colliery owners and the miners that the safety men should remain at work. Some owners posted up offers of work to miners, and certain miners, not safety men, returned to work. A board of enginemen, deputies, and miners, of which the appellant was secretary, then passed a resolution that if coal were raised for other than safety purposes all the safety men would be withdrawn ; and the appellant, by direction of the board, sent copies of the resolution to the secretary of the owners' association and to the managers of certain collieries. The appellant was convicted of distributing a document containing a statement the publication of which was calculated to impede, delay, or restrict the supply or distribution of fuel, contrary to reg. 21 of the Emergency Regulations, 1926.

Held, per Lord Hewart, C.J., that the document was not calculated to restrict the supply of fuel, but was merely a complaint that the agreement for preserving the pits was being broken, that it was not "distributed" by the appellant, but merely communicated, and that the matter came within the proviso to reg. 21 (1) ; per Salter, J., that there was a publication, and that it was calculated to stop the supply of fuel, but that the communication was "taking part in a strike" within the proviso ; and per Talbot, J., that the regulation did not apply to an official communication sent by one party in a dispute to the other party. The conviction was accordingly quashed.

This was a case stated by Derbyshire justices.

The appellant, William Knight Smith, was the agent of the South Derbyshire Miners' Association. He was convicted on August 24, 1926, by a Court of summary jurisdiction at Swadlincote, of an offence against Regulation 21 of the Emergency Regulations, 1926, which provided :—

"(1) If any person attempts or does any act calculated or likely . . . to impede, delay, or restrict the supply or distribution of . . . fuel he shall be guilty of an offence against these regulations : Provided that a person shall not be guilty of an offence under this regulation by reason only of his taking part in a strike or peacefully persuading any other person to take part in a strike.

"(2) If any person prints, produces, publishes, or distributes any document containing any report or statement the publication of which would be a contravention of the foregoing provisions of this regulation . . . he shall be guilty of an offence against these regulations."

Sir Henry Maddocks, K.C., and Mr. H. H. Maddocks appeared for the appellant ; Mr. H. H. Joy, K.C., and Miss Campbell (Mr. T. N. Winning with them) for the respondent.

Smith was charged on five informations for that on August 13, 1926, at the parish of Church Gresley, he did unlawfully distribute a certain document containing a report or statement the publication of which was a contravention of Regulation 21 (1), to wit, by signing and distributing a copy of a resolution of the Joint Board of Enginemen, Deputies, and Miners of South Derbyshire, passed at their meeting held on August 11, 1926, which was calculated or likely to impede, delay, or restrict the supply or distribution of fuel.

The case stated that at all material times the members of the South Derbyshire Miners' Association (hereinafter called the miners' association) and the members of the South Derbyshire Coal Owners' Association (hereinafter called the owners' association) were taking part in a strike. The appellant was the agent for the miners' association, and the secretary of the Joint Board of Enginemen, Deputies, and Miners, which was formed for the purpose of advising the members of the miners' association upon matters arising during the strike.

It was agreed between the owners' association and the miners' association that the safety men (members of the miners' association) should be advised to remain at work during the strike for the preservation of the pits only.

* Reported by J. W. Hall, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The Joint Board of Enginemen, Deputies, and Miners met on August 11, 1926, to discuss the position of the safety men, and the following resolution was passed :—

"That this meeting of the Joint Board of Enginemen, Deputies, and Miners decides that each manager in the district be notified forthwith that no coal shall be raised for other than safety purposes, and that there shall be no raising or lowering of men other than those granted permits by the joint board. It must be noted that permits will only be granted where pre-stoppage conditions are observed. Any violation of this decision will be met by the withdrawal of the whole of the safety men in the district."

The appellant, as secretary of the joint board, was directed by the board to sign and send a copy of this resolution to the secretary of the owners' association and to the certified managers of a number of collieries which belonged to members of the owners' association. The appellant signed and sent by post copies of the resolution accordingly, and such signing and sending by post were the offences charged against him.

The secretary of the owners' association had been invited to attend the meeting at which the resolution was passed, but had declined to do so. At the collieries belonging to members of the owners' association there had, subsequently to the agreement as to safety men above referred to, been posted offers of work to miners upon terms not approved by the National Federation of Miners and the miners' association, and in consequence of these offers certain miners (other than safety men) had returned to work and had been and were engaged in getting coal for other than safety purposes.

It was contended on behalf of the respondent that the document, on the face of it, was within the words and meaning of the said regulation, and was calculated and likely to impede, delay, or restrict the supply of coal.

It was contended on behalf of the appellant :—(a) That the act of the appellant in signing and posting the copy of the resolution was not within the meaning of the regulations ; and (b) that the appellant was engaged only as secretary of the board in taking part in a strike and was within the proviso to paragraph (1) of Regulation 21.

It was contended on behalf of the respondent that the document on the face of it was within the words and meaning of the said regulation, and was calculated and likely to impede, delay, or restrict the supply of coal.

The justices accepted the respondent's contention. They convicted the appellant and fined him £46 on the first summons, and £1 on each of the four other summonses.

The Lord Chief Justice recapitulated the facts and observed, with reference to the agreement for the safety men to remain at work, that it was just as much open in the beginning to the safety men as to other persons employed in the mines to withdraw their labour. Such a withdrawal would undoubtedly have had very serious results to the mines themselves. To prevent that disastrous result and preserve the pits, this agreement was entered into, and the safety men remained solely for the purpose of preserving the pits. Sir Henry Maddocks had submitted that the history might be divided into three stages :—(1) At the outset the safety men were perfectly entitled to decline to work. (2) For the safety of the pits the safety men agreed to remain. (3) It was found that that concession was being employed not only for safety, but to allow other men to get coal. Sir Henry Maddocks had argued that the resolution had for its object the preservation of the beneficial arrangement for the safety of the mines, and was not a destructive scheme, but a complaint that a beneficial agreement was being broken, and that, if the breaches continued, the agreement would be brought to an end, and this the makers of the resolution would deplore.

At first sight the resolution might be thought calculated or likely to impede, delay, or restrict the production of fuel. That was an exceedingly short-sighted view. When looked at with the other facts of the case, this letter was a complaint that an agreement for preserving the pits was being broken. It must be viewed not as an isolated fragment of history, but as a step in a considerable series, which was not within Regulation 21.

More than that, this appellant was charged with distributing. He could not think that that word was applicable to such an act as was done by the appellant in this case. If the owners' secretary had attended the meeting, as he was invited to do, he could have communicated the result to his own organization himself. He did not attend, and the other organization communicated the resolution through their secretary.

So far did this differ from distribution that it belonged to the class of communications which in the law of defamation would have a qualified privilege, as being published to persons having a common interest.

But even if his view on those two points were wrong he thought that the matter fell within the proviso, which saved the acts of those who did what was naturally and ordinarily involved in taking part in a strike, or peacefully persuading others to do so, and he did not think the regulation was intended to fetter the liberty of the persons engaged in a strike to endeavour to increase it in a direction where it had hitherto been diminished.

For these reasons he thought that the appeal should be allowed.

Mr. Justice Salter thought that there was a publication, and that that publication was clearly calculated to restrict and, indeed, to stop altogether, the supply of fuel at the pits in question. But he agreed that the proviso applied. He thought that the resolution was a communication sent by one organization through its secretary to inform the other that unless the agreement was kept the safety men would lawfully terminate their engagements. He thought that that was "taking part in a strike," and on this ground the appeal succeeded.

Mr. Justice Talbot thought that "publish" and "distribute" must have their ordinary meaning of dissemination to an indefinite number of people. The regulation, in his view, did not apply to an official communication by one party to the dispute to the other. He thought that the appellant had neither published not distributed any document calculated to impede, restrict, or delay the supply of fuel, and without expressing any opinion on the other points, he agreed that the appeal succeeded.

1926. Dec. 16.

THOMAS AND OTHERS v. NEWINGTON LICENSING JUSTICES.*

Intoxicating Liquors — Licence — Renewal — Application — Adjournment till after licence due to expire—Whether a refusal of renewal — Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910 (10 Edw. VII. and 1 Geo. V., c. 24), s. 16 (1).

The appellants, the licensee and the owners of licensed premises, applied to the respondent licensing justices on March 1, 1926, for a renewal of the licence, which was due to expire on April 4, 1926. The justices, on the ground that summonses were pending against the licensee for supplying intoxicating liquor during non-permitted hours, adjourned the application to April 12, 1926, and the appellants gave notice of appeal to quarter sessions. On March 4, 1926, the licensee was convicted, and on April 12, 1926, the licensing justices refused the renewal. At quarter sessions the appellants contended that the licensing justices had no power to adjourn the application for renewal to a date after the expiry of the licence, that the adjournment amounted to a refusal to renew the licence, and that on March 1, 1926, they had no evidence on which they could refuse the renewal. Quarter sessions held that the decision to adjourn the application to April 12, 1926, was not a refusal to renew the licence, and they dismissed the appeal but stated a case.

Held, that the decision of quarter sessions was right, as the application was made within the licensing year and the licence remained in force by virtue of s. 16 (1) of the Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910.

These were two appeals, by way of cases stated, from the County of London Quarter Sessions, and arose out of the same facts.

Mr. Richard William Thomas, as licensee, and Meux's Brewery, Limited, as owners, of the Peacock public-house, Holland-street, Blackfriars, appealed to the quarter sessions against what was stated by their notices of appeal to have been the refusal of the respondent licensing justices on March 1, 1926, to renew the licence of the premises. Quarter sessions dismissed the appeals subject to these cases.

The following facts were admitted: The licence of the premises was transferred to the appellant Thomas in February, 1924, as tenant of the premises, and was duly renewed to him in February, 1925. On February 11, 1926, certain summonses were issued from the Tower Bridge Police Court, returnable on February 25, 1926, charging that Thomas on certain dates in December, 1925, and January, 1926, at the said premises during other than permitted hours unlawfully did supply to divers persons intoxicating liquor to be consumed on the premises. On February 19, 1926, a notice was served on Thomas by the respondent justices requiring his attendance before them on March 1, 1926, on account of there being summonses pending against him. On February 25 an application was made on behalf of the said Thomas for the adjournment of the summonses, it being alleged that, owing to pressure of licensing business, it was found impossible to present properly the case of the said Thomas by that date, and with the consent of the Commissioner of Police the summonses were adjourned by the magistrate to March 4, 1926.

On March 1, 1926, at an adjournment of the general annual meeting of the respondent justices, an application was duly made for the renewal of the licence. Both the licensee, Thomas, and the appellant owners appeared by their separate legal representatives. As the police court summonses had not at that date come on for hearing, the respondent justices were, on grounds both of fact and law, strongly pressed to renew the licence, and were referred to the various provisions of the Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910, relating to the matter.

Undertakings were unreservedly offered on behalf both of Thomas and of the owners that, whatever might be the result of the summonses, Thomas, if called on by the justices, would attend at the then next transfer sessions on April 12, 1926, and that the whole facts would then be brought before them and a new tenant would be found for the premises if they desired it.

The justices retired to consider their decision. They refused to adjudicate finally upon the application for renewal, and, notwithstanding the objection raised that they had no power so to do, they adjourned or purported to adjourn the consideration of the renewal to the then next transfer sessions on April 12, 1926, a date subsequent to the expiration of the existing justices' licence.

At the hearing no evidence was given upon which the renewal of the licence could have been refused.

The renewal of the licence not having been granted before it expired, both Thomas and the owners gave notice of appeal to quarter sessions. On an application under section 89 of the Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910, the Commissioners of Customs and Excise granted permission to carry on the business during the pendency of the appeal.

On March 4, 1926, the police court summonses were heard. Thomas pleaded guilty and was convicted upon three summonses for offences which took place on January 16, 1926, and was fined ten guineas and ordered to pay ten guineas costs.

On April 12, 1926, the justices purported to refuse the renewal of the licence.

It was contended for the appellants before quarter sessions that, as the respondent justices had abstained from granting the renewal of the licence either on March 1, 1926, or subsequently during its currency, they had in law and in fact refused the renewal of the licence; that they were wrong in law in so refusing, as there was no evidence before them upon which they could in law refuse; that they had no power to adjourn the consideration of the renewal to April 12, on which date the licence would be no longer in existence and there would, consequently, be nothing in respect of which they could grant a renewal; and that a renewal of a licence must be either granted or refused within the licensing year, which expired on April 4. The appellants relied on sections 10, 16, 41, and 89 of the Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910, and cited Webber v. Birkenhead Justices (61 J.P., 664); Reg. v. Denbigh Justices—Ex parte Fisher (59 J.P., 708); and Rex v. Tower Justices (unreported, January 16, 1920).

It was contended for the respondents that they had jurisdiction to act as they did, and that, in any case, an appeal to quarter sessions was not the proper remedy. It was submitted that on March 1, 1926, there had been no refusal but merely an adjournment. Webber v. Birkenhead Justices (supra) was relied on as showing that the appeal to quarter sessions was wrong. Reference was also made (in addition to the cases mentioned above) to Reg. v. Anglesey Licensing Justices (12 The Times L.R., 4).

The Court of Quarter Sessions was of opinion that the decision of the justices on March 1, 1926, to adjourn the application to April 12, 1926, did not amount to a refusal to renew the licence, and that, even if the justices were wrong in refusing to adjudicate on March 1, 1926, the proper remedy was by application to the High Court for a mandamus. The appeals to quarter sessions were accordingly dismissed.

Mr. Cecil Whiteley, K.C., and Mr. S. H. Lamb appeared for Thomas; and Mr. R. O. B. Lane for Meux's Brewery, Limited; and Mr. H. H. Joy, K.C., and Mr. Harold Murphy for the justices.

Mr. Whiteley said that it was hoped at last to get a decision on the question, which was always arising in licensing matters, whether justices had power to adjourn an application for renewal beyond April 4. He contended that the power, under section 16 (4) of the Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910, to adjourn an opposed renewal to a date "whether more or less than one month from the date of the original general annual licensing meeting" must be so limited that the adjourned hearing should take place while there was still a licence in existence. The usual course, if there were summonses pending, was to grant a formal renewal, without prejudice to dealing with the matter on its merits if a transfer was applied for.

He submitted that if the justices could insist on an adjournment beyond April 4, there was no limit to the date to which the matter might be postponed, and such an adjournment amounted to a refusal of the renewal, entitling the licensee to appeal to quarter sessions. Mandamus, in his submission, was not the proper remedy; for even if a rule could be obtained it was doubtful whether it could be heard in time to be effective.

He referred to Webber v. Birkenhead Justices (supra), Reg. v. Denbigh Justices—Ex parte Fisher (supra). With those two conflicting decisions before them, both the justices and the applicants had great difficulty in knowing the law, and both sides would welcome a decision. If the Court were of opinion that mandamus was the proper remedy, he submitted that the Court, having all the materials before them, could deal with that matter.

Mr. Lane, for the owners, adopted Mr. Whiteley's legal arguments, and said that the Bench were unequivocally asked by the owners on March 1 to renew the licence, but they refused to do so. The Court ought to adopt the more convenient of two possible constructions of section 16.

Mr. Joy submitted that the question of the power of the licensing justices to adjourn beyond April 5 did not emerge from this special case. The mention of the undertakings offered to the justices was inserted to make it appear that the justices had acted harshly or arbitrarily. But there was no suggestion of an undertaking to close the house, and the undertaking to apply for a transfer left the justices in the difficulty that, if they objected to the proposed transferee, they might be left with the person whose misconduct had made the transfer desirable.

Counsel referred to Roberts v. Aizlewood (5 The Times L.R., 181), and submitted that in any event the remedy was mandamus. A refusal, in order to give rise to an appeal to quarter sessions, must be a refusal on the merits; a refusal to hear the application—if such there was—was a refusal to exercise jurisdiction for which the party aggrieved must seek a mandamus.

Adjournment over April 5 did not involve the extinction of the licence, for a renewal could be granted under the express words of the statute if the licence was in force at the date of the application. He cited Reg. v. Belton (17 L.J.M.C., 70). The tendency of legislation was to do away with those rigid rules as to time. See Rex v. Bristol Licensing Justices—Ex parte Whiting (19 The Times L.R., 596), where the remedy sought was mandamus.

In answer to the Lord Chief Justice, Mr. Joy said that he thought that the existence of the licence beyond April 4 was, in a sense, preserved by section 16. With regard to the licensed premises, the licensee must either apply for a mandamus to fix an earlier date, or probably the matter could be dealt with by a protection order under section 88 of the Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910. It seemed to be a casus omissus that a case such as this was not within section 89, which empowered the Commissioners of Customs and Excise to grant a permit during the pendency of an appeal.

He admitted that it was not the normal practice to adjourn cases beyond April 4: it was a power which should only be exercised in case of emergency.

He was stopped.

The Lord Chief Justice, in giving judgment, said that in the course of an extremely interesting discussion various questions had been raised which it did not seem necessary to determine. It was sufficient to say that, in his opinion, the Court of Quarter Sessions rightly held that the decision of the justices to adjourn the application for renewal was not a refusal to renew. It clearly was not in terms a refusal; but it was said that because the date fixed was after April 5 it was, in effect, a refusal. That view did not seem to him correct, because by section 16 of the Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910, a renewal of a licence meant "the grant of a justices' licence at a general annual licensing meeting by way of renewal of a similar licence which is in force in respect of the premises at the date of the application." The application having been made within the licensing year, the licence remained in force.

Attention had been directed to various cases. It was not contended on behalf of the licensing justices that an adjournment beyond April 5 was part of the normal jurisdiction of justices. It was admitted that the power, though it existed, was a power only to be exercised in emergency—he would add in real and urgent emergency. Among the inconveniences resulting from the exercise of that power might be mentioned that it had the effect of involving the licensee, and possibly other persons, in expense. But upon the question raised in the case—whether the adjournment amounted to a refusal of the renewal—quarter sessions were right, and the appeal must be dismissed.

Mr. Justice Salter.—I entirely agree. I think there has been some confusion about the sense of "refusal to renew." A refusal to renew, to give rise to an appeal to quarter sessions, must be a refusal on the merits, and a decision in favour of the objector.

Mr. Justice Talbot.—I am of the same opinion. If the adjournment had been such that the application would have had to be for a new licence, I think the justices would have been wrong, but in view of section 16 of the Act the application in this case would have been for a renewal.

I desire expressly to agree with what my Lord has said as to the exposure of an applicant to what must necessarily be an embarrassment and may involve inconvenience and expense.

REX v. LEICESTER JUSTICES—EX PARTE ALLBRIGHTON.*

Intoxicating Liquors—Licence—Old on-licence—Renewal—Objection by licensing justices—Ground of redundancy—Reference to compensation authority — Right of objecting justices to sit on compensation authority—Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910 (10 Edw. VII. and 1 Geo. V., c. 24), s. 19.

Where licensing justices object to the renewal of an old on-licence on the ground of redundancy and refer the matter to the compensation authority under s. 19 of the Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910, they are not, by the mere fact of their objection, disqualified from sitting as members of the compensation authority and adjudicating on the question of renewal.

This was a rule nisi for a writ of certiorari directed to the justices of the City of Leicester, acting as the compensation authority, to quash certain orders refusing the renewal of the licence of the Hen and Chickens, Halford-street, Leicester. The rule was obtained upon the ground that the proceedings of the compensation authority were vitiated by reason of the fact that four of the justices sitting were disqualified by interest.

The case raised the question whether justices who had taken objection to the renewal of a licence could sit as members of the compensation authority.

It appeared from the affidavit of Mr. John Thomas Allbrighton, the applicant, that on February 10, 1926, he received notice that the application for renewal of his licence had been adjourned to March 10, 1926, as objection had been made thereto on the ground that it was unnecessary. At the hearing on March 10 before the licensing committee the following justices, among others, were present :—Messrs. F. S. Brice (in the chair), J. E. Faire, G. Sedgwick, and G. E. Hubbard. The application was referred to the compensation authority. The justices issued a report signed by their clerk recommending that the licence should not be renewed.

At the meeting of the compensation authority on May 19, 1926, the same four justices proceeded to sit as members of the compensation authority. Their presence was objected to by counsel for the applicant on the ground that they had committed themselves to a decision adverse to the applicant and were biased.

The objection was overruled, the decision being given not by the chairman of the compensation authority, but by Mr. F. S. Brice, who had sat as chairman of the licensing committee. The renewal was refused.

Mr. Montgomery, K.C., and Mr. Douglas Jenkins showed cause ; Sir Henry Maddocks, K.C., and Mr. C. E. Loseby supported the rule.

The Lord Chief Justice delivered the following considered judgment :—This is a rule nisi for a writ of certiorari to remove into this Court to be quashed an order made by the justices for the city of Leicester, acting as the compensation authority for that city, on May 19, 1926, whereby the renewal of the licence of the Hen and Chickens inn in the said city was refused subject to the payment of compensation under the Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910. The only ground relied upon in support of the rule was that the proceedings of the compensation authority were vitiated for the reason that four of the justices sitting were, it was said, disqualified by interest.

The facts are shortly as follows. At the general annual licensing meeting held on February 10, 1926, the four justices in question, as the licensing committee for the said city, orally objected to the renewal of four old on-licences, including that of the Hen and Chickens inn, on the grounds, in the case of each house :—

1. That having regard to the character and necessities of the neighbourhood and the number of licensed houses in the immediate vicinity the licence which is now held in respect of the said premises is unnecessary.

2. That in the interests of the public the renewal of the licence is not desirable.

These applications were accordingly adjourned, and the applicants were duly notified of the objection, and at the adjourned meeting on March 10, 1926, the said licensing committee, after hearing evidence on oath, and being of the opinion that the question of the renewal of the licences required consideration on the above-mentioned grounds, being grounds other than those on which the renewal of an old on-licence could be refused by them, decided to refer the matter to the compensation authority under section 19 of the Act, and duly made their report to that authority, suggesting that the renewals of the licences should be refused.

At the principal meeting of the compensation authority held on May 19, 1926, fourteen justices, including the four justices who had sat as the licensing committee, attended, and ten of them, including the said four justices, finally adjudicated upon the applications referred to them. After having heard evidence on oath, and counsel having addressed them on behalf of the applicant, the compensation authority refused the renewal of the licence of the Hen and Chickens subject to the payment of compensation.

In these circumstances, it is contended on behalf of the applicant that the mere fact of the four justices who sat on the licensing committee having originated the objection to the renewal of the licence disqualified them from sitting as members of the compensation authority, and that the principle that the same person cannot act as prosecutor and judge applies. It is not suggested that the justices objected to took any other part in opposing the renewal of the licence, except by sitting and voting as members of the licensing committee and of the compensation authority.

In my opinion, the case is concluded by the decision in Rex v. Howard (18 The Times L.R., 690 ; [1902] 2 K.B., 363), where it was treated as settled law that justices were entitled to take objection to the renewal of licences, and afterwards to take part in hearing the applications and deciding on the question of renewal. Lord Justice Cozens-Hardy, at pages 382 and 383, said : "The view has been repeatedly expressed and acted upon since 1874 that the justices may themselves start an objection. This conclusion seems to me necessary to enable the magistrates to perform their duty. The House of Lords held in Boulter v. Kent Justices (13 The Times L.R., 538 ; [1897] A.C., 556) that there is no lis between an objector and a licence-holder, and no right to recover the costs occasioned by an unsuccessful objection. In short, I regard the objection as merely a mode of informing the licence-holder that his case will be considered and that he must be prepared to deal with certain specified points. . . . The justices . . . were not adjudicating upon any rights. They were not prosecutors. In truth, there was no prosecution. They were only determining whether in the public interest a lucrative privilege should or should not be conferred."

* Reported by J. W. Hall, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The recent decision of the House of Lords in Frome United Breweries Company v. Bath Justices (42 The Times L.R., 571 ; [1926] A.C., 586) was based on the fact that three of the justices who sat and voted as members of the compensation authority had been parties to a resolution of the licensing justices authorizing a solicitor to appear before the compensation authority and oppose the renewal of a licence on their behalf, and that such solicitor had appeared and opposed the renewal, and there is in the decision nothing which is inconsistent with the view that a justice who originates an objection is not, for that reason alone, disqualified from afterwards sitting as a member of the licensing authority which deals with the application for renewal, and, if the question of renewal is referred for decision to the compensation authority, from sitting as a member of that authority. In doing so he is merely carrying out his duties in accordance with the scheme prescribed by the Legislature.

In my opinion, therefore, the rule should be discharged, with costs.

Mr. Justice Avory.—This is an application for a writ of certiorari to remove into this Court, with a view to its being quashed, an order of the justices in and for the city of Leicester acting as the compensation authority under and pursuant to section 19 of the Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910, whereby the licence of the Hen and Chickens inn in the said city was refused subject to the payment of compensation under the said Act.

The only ground relied upon in support of the rule on behalf of the applicant was that the proceedings of the said compensation authority were vitiated by reason of the fact that four of the justices sitting were disqualified by interest.

The licence in question was an old on-licence within the meaning of section 18 of the said Act, the renewal of which could not be refused by the licensing justices except upon one or more of the grounds specified in the second part of the second Schedule to the Act. The four justices who are suggested to have been disqualified from sitting on the compensation authority had sat as the licensing committee for the said city at the general annual licensing meeting on February 10, 1926, for the purpose of considering, inter alia, applications for renewal of licences, and, being of opinion that the question of the renewal of the licences of the Hen and Chickens and of three other licensed houses required consideration on grounds other than those on which the licences could be refused by them, adjourned these four applications to March 10, 1926, and gave notice, through the Chief Constable, in compliance with section 16 of the Act, of the objection to the renewal of these licences, and required the applicants to attend personally on the adjourned date —the grounds of objection being in each case :—

(1) That having regard to the character and necessities of the neighbourhood and the number of licensed houses in the immediate vicinity, the licence which is now held in respect of the said premises is unnecessary.

(2) That in the interests of the public the renewal of the licence is not desirable.

At the adjourned meeting on March 10, 1926, these four justices, sitting as the licensing committee, decided, after hearing evidence on oath, to refer the matter of the renewal of these licences to the compensation authority under section 19 of the Act, and made their report in which they set out the evidence that had been given in respect of each of the houses and the grounds of objection as hereinbefore stated, and suggested that these licences should be refused on these grounds, by which I understand them to mean that in their opinion a prima facie case had been made before them for the refusal.

On May 19, 1926, the four justices who were objected to sat with ten others at the principal meeting of the compensation authority, and, evidence on oath having been given, and counsel on behalf of the owners and a solicitor on behalf of the tenant having been heard, the licence of the Hen and Chickens was refused, subject to compensation.

It is not suggested that the licensing justices who had referred the matter to the compensation authority were represented by counsel or solicitor at the hearing, or that they did anything more than sit and vote upon the question of the renewal ; but the contention on behalf of the applicant is that the fact of the objection to the renewal having been initiated by the justices themselves of itself disqualified them from taking part in the decision of the compensation authority.

The right of the justices themselves to start an objection, particularly of the nature of the objections in this case, has been recognized ever since the decision in Rex v. Howard (18 The Times L.R., 690 ; [1902] 2 K.B., 363), and, as was said in that case : "In starting an objection justices do not take sides or assume the position of parties, but are merely taking the steps which the Legislature has prescribed for the better discharge of their licensing duties, which are administrative in character, but have to be performed in a quasi-judicial manner." If the applicant were right in his contention it would follow that the licensing committee would be disqualified from referring the matter to the compensation authority or from sitting as members of the compensation authority. It is suggested that this contention of the applicant is supported by the recent decision of the House of Lords in Frome United Breweries Company v. Bath Justices (42 The Times L.R., 571 ; [1926] A.C., 586), but the ground of the decision in that case was that the licensing justices had themselves actively opposed the renewal of the licence before the compensation authority and instructed a solicitor to do so on their behalf, and in the opinions delivered by the Lord Chancellor and Lord Sumner the right of the licensing justices, who have referred the matter, to sit as members of the compensation authority and to take part in the argument and if necessary to be represented, is expressly recognized ; and, although the case of Rex v. Howard (supra) was cited in the argument, there is no trace of any dissent from that decision, which has been followed in practice ever since 1902.

If it is conceded that the licensing justices have the right to initiate the objection and to refer the matter to the compensation authority, and if it is further conceded that the same justices have the right to sit and vote on the matter at the meeting of the compensation authority, it appears to be a contradiction in terms to say that they are disqualified because they initiated the objection.

It is suggested in the applicant's affidavit that the clerk to the licensing justices gave some promise that if alterations were made in the premises the licensing justices would not oppose the renewal at the meeting of the compensation authority. In view of the affidavit of the clerk to the justices I do not think any such promise was made, but if it had been made with the authority of the justices it would negative any idea of bias on their part against the applicant.

I think there is no ground for the contention that in the circumstances of this case these justices were disqualified by reason of interest ; and the rule should be discharged with costs.

MR. JUSTICE SALTER.—I agree. As this appeal raises a point of much practical importance, I will give my reasons.

So far as bias and likelihood of bias are concerned, I can see little difference between those who give notice of intention to oppose the renewal of a particular licence and those who give notice that they object to the renewal of that licence. There may be some difference in degree, but I can see none in kind. Neither an objector nor an opponent is a "party" to any "litigation," but each is a person who has publicly expressed an opinion that the particular licence should not be renewed and a desire that it shall not be renewed. If he is then called upon to decide, on evidence, whether that licence shall be renewed or not, it seems to me that he must approach his task with a mind definitely predisposed to non-renewal.

In the case of the Bath Justices (41 The Times L.R., 346 ; [1925] 1 K.B., 685, and 42 The Times L.R., 571 ; [1926] A.C., 586) the licensing justices had a right as citizens (a right recognized but not conferred by the statute) to appear before the compensation authority and be heard as supporters or opponents of the renewal of the licence under consideration. They also had a statutory right to sit as members of the compensation authority. But, inasmuch as there was likelihood of bias, the House of Lords held that both these rights should not be exercised in the same matter. In the present case also the licensing justices as a body have a right, like any other body of citizens, to object to the renewal of the licence now in question, and they have a statutory right to sit on the compensation authority. Since there is in this case, as I think, a clear likelihood of bias, it follows that they are not qualified to sit on the compensation authority, if the principle of the Bath Justices case (supra) is applicable to this case. I think it is not applicable. In my opinion this case cannot be distinguished from the Bath Justices case (supra) on the ground that the likelihood of bias is stronger in one case than the other. The distinction is that, in that case, Parliament had not sanctioned what was done ; in this case it has. This case is governed by the reasoning in Rex v. Howard (18 The Times L.R., 690 ; [1902] 2 K.B., 363). That case was relied on and cited at length by Lord Justice Bankes in the Court of Appeal in the Bath Justices case (supra), and there is nothing in the judgments in the House of Lords to suggest that it was not rightly decided. It is true that there is a difference—I think a great difference—between the objection in that case and the objection in this. The course taken by the justices in that case was carefully calculated to avoid any suggestion of discrimination or of a view unfavourable to any particular licence. That is very different from selecting a particular licence for objection. That case was partly decided, and, I think, might have been wholly decided, on the ground that there was no evidence whatever of any likelihood of bias. The justices had been careful to avoid it. But it was also decided on the ground applicable here—namely, that some risk of bias is inseparable from the machinery which Parliament has set up.

The Master of the Rolls, in Rex v. Howard (supra), after dealing with the practice of the licensing justices to initiate objections to renewals, says, at page 377 :—"I think, therefore, that the practice is not only inveterate but is founded on a true view of the function of justices in relation to the matter. If that be so, the standard to be applied in considering the question of bias must be one which admits the right of the justices to be at one and the same time objectors and judges, in the sense in which they are judges in such matters, and therefore the standard laid down in such cases as Leeson v. General Council of Medical Education and Registration (43 Ch.D., 366) and Allinson v. General Council of Medical Education and Registration (10 The Times L.R., 304 ; [1894] 1 Q.B., 750) is not applicable to them. They fall outside their principle for two reasons—first, that they are empowered by law to fill the two capacities ; and secondly that, rightly understood, the two capacities are not incompatible in the sense in which in those two cases they were assumed to be incompatible, because, as has already been pointed out, in making the objection they do not in any sense become parties to the litigation or anything analogous thereto. They are simply taking the only or the best available course to enable matters vital to the exercise of their discretion to be formally and fairly considered openly before them."

The second ground is not so fully applicable to this case as it was to the facts of that case, but the first ground is, I think, decisive of the present case. The right of licensing justices "to be at one and the same time objectors and judges, in the sense in which they are judges in such matters," is recognized by Parliament. It was there held that the licensing justices who have initiated objections to the renewal of licences are qualified to determine finally, on evidence, whether those licences shall be renewed or not. If they were so qualified before the Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910, they cannot have lost the qualification because the renewal of old on-licences is now determined in two stages by a preliminary tribunal and a final tribunal, of both of which they are members.

I think this rule should be discharged, not because there was no likelihood of bias, but because this decision was reached in a manner contemplated and sanctioned by Parliament, and cannot, therefore, be set aside.

BROADBENT v. BROADBENT.*

Husband and Wife—Maintenance—Jurisdiction of justices—Order—Discharge—Adultery of wife—Proof—Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895 (58 and 59 Vict., c. 39), s. 7—Summary Jurisdiction (Separation and Maintenance) Act, 1925 (15 and 16 Geo. V., c. 51), s. 2.

Observations upon the administration of the jurisdiction conferred on justices by s. 7 of the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, as amended by s. 2 of the Summary Jurisdiction (Separation and Maintenance) Act, 1925, to discharge a maintenance order on proof of the wife's adultery.

This was an appeal from an order of the justices of the City and County of Kingston-upon-Hull, made on November 22, 1926.

The appellant, Hilda May Broadbent, appealed from an order of the justices discharging a maintenance order made in her favour on August 15, 1919. The ground of the discharge was that since the date of that order she had committed an act of adultery. The grounds of appeal were, (1) that particulars of the date and place when and where the act of adultery was alleged to have been committed were not furnished to the appellant in time to enable her to meet the charge; and (2) that the appellant had a complete answer to the charge, in that she could have produced evidence to show that on September 5, 1926, the date on which the act of adultery was alleged to have been committed in a lane near Skelton, in Cleveland, she was on duty as a telephone operator at the post office in Skelton.

One of the witnesses called by the respondent, Harold Broadbent, before the justices in support of the charge of adultery, admitted that he knew the name of the man with whom the respondent was alleged to have committed adultery, but refused to disclose it.

By section 7 of the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, ". . . If any married woman upon whose application an order shall have been made under this Act . . . shall . . . commit an act of adultery, such order shall upon proof thereof be discharged." The section was amended by s. 2 of the Summary Jurisdiction (Separation and Maintenance) Act, 1925, but the amendment did not affect the subject-matter of this report.

The Hon. Victor Russell appeared for the appellant; and Mr. R. F. Burnand for the respondent.

The PRESIDENT said:—This case raises questions and presents points which illustrate the difficulty in which justices are placed in dealing with the jurisdiction which is given them under the Summary Jurisdiction (Separation and Maintenance) Acts, 1895 to 1925, under which, for the purpose of discharging a maintenance order, they may proceed to try a charge of adultery. Hardly a sitting of this Court occurs in which there is not grave reason shown for doubting whether the present procedure is satisfactory.

The statutory effect of adultery under the Summary Jurisdiction (Separation and Maintenance) Acts is to enable justices, if they are satisfied that adultery has taken place, to discharge an order for payment of money. The parties are then left in a most anomalous position. The wife in the present case is found guilty of adultery. My own view of the matter is that that does not preclude her from taking proceedings in a Court of Record—in this Court—to try the question whether she has been guilty of adultery. Likewise, it does not preclude the husband from taking proceedings in a Court of Record in which he can assert and newly establish his charge of adultery.

The situation is that, for a limited purpose, a woman may be found guilty of adultery by justices. In this Court and in every Court which has exercised in this country a jurisdiction such as this Court exercises, the utmost care has been taken to secure that so grave a matter as a conviction of adultery shall not take place without full compliance with all the ordinary requirements of the administration of justice. The first of them is that the accused party shall have notice of the charge. The charge here was a charge against a woman, separated from her husband for 12 years, that since the separation order she had been guilty of adultery.

The evidence is that the only notice which the incriminated party, the wife, had of what the charge really was, was a notice communicated to her by a letter addressed to her solicitors dated November 20, 1926, a Saturday, received on November 22, the Monday, and communicated to her when she was actually in the Court of Summary Jurisdiction for the Division of Hull—80 miles away from her home and from the place where, as I understand, it is alleged that adultery had been committed. The communication stated a date, and that the alleged adultery was at Skelton, which is at least a township—it seems to be a fairly extensive place—and was adultery with a man unknown.

When one considers a case of that kind with the experience which those who sit in this Court or practise in this Court necessarily have, it seems impossible that there should have been a satisfactory trial of that charge, if the facts are as they are said to have been. If it had been clear that the wife's solicitors, upon going into Court, had applied for an adjournment, or if at any period of the case the wife's solicitors had applied for an adjournment, it seems to me a refusal to adjourn would have been a failure in the administration of justice, and would have necessitated the discharge of an order made without adjournment.

As the case has proceeded, those who are in charge of the husband's interests have realized that something ought to be done to secure that the elementary requirements of justice should be observed. The time, place, and the person concerned are now ascertained, and, with the means of investigation and of the production of evidence to deal with the matter fully, it cannot be said that upon a re-hearing before the justices it is not practicable to do justice.

It is a grave difficulty when a case of this kind has been once heard and a decision has been arrived at, even by one of the ordinary tribunals of the land, that the same Court should come to a contrary decision; but the justices have reposed in them by the statute the duty, in proper cases, of re-hearing and considering anew upon all the facts before them the charge upon which they have to decide. It would be desirable, I think, upon the re-hearing of this case, that there should be a reconstituted Court. Professional persons who understand the administration of justice from experience will see the value of that. If there is a re-hearing upon the charge as it has now been formulated, and if it takes place before a newly constituted Court, in the division in which this jurisdiction lies, I trust that justice may be done between these parties.

I think that the proper course will be to set aside the order with a view to the re-hearing of the husband's summons before a petty sessional court of the division in which the summons was issued.

MR. JUSTICE HILL.—I agree with every word that my Lord has said, and I only want to emphasize that, in my judgment, this case will not be properly re-heard until the preliminary particulars of the time, the place of adultery, and the alleged adulterer have been given to the wife, because his name is now known to one of the witnesses.

Practice—Interpleader—Trial of action or issue—Appeal—Common Law Procedure Act, 1860 (23 and 24 Vict., c. 106), s. 17—Appellate Jurisdiction Act, 1876 (39 and 40 Vict., c. 59), s. 20—Rules of the Supreme Court, Order LVII., Rules 11, 13.

Although no appeal lies in an interpleader matter where a decision has been given by a Judge in a summary manner, yet where, instead of deciding the matter summarily, the Judge directs the trial of an action or issue, an appeal lies from the judgment given on the trial, whether such trial has been held with or without a jury.

In 1906 the defendant's father, when President of the Republic of Guatemala, deposited a sum of money with London bankers. The President was afterwards deposed and imprisoned, and by letters written in prison in the year 1921 he admitted that the money belonged to the Republic, and he ordered the bankers to place the amount at the exclusive disposal of the Government of Guatemala. The defendant gave notice to the bankers that his father had assigned the money to him by a letter written in 1919 during the defendant's infancy, and, when a demand was also made upon them on behalf of the Republic of Guatemala, they declined to hand over the money. The Republic then brought an action against the bankers, and they brought the money into Court, and an interpleader issue was directed between the Republic as plaintiffs and the ex-President's son as defendant. The plaintiffs alleged that the money had been misappropriated from the Republic by the defendant's father, and that the assignment to the defendant in 1919 was invalid by the law of Guatemala owing to non-compliance with the formalities requisite in the case of an infant donee. The defendant pleaded that the assignment to him in 1919 was valid by the law of England, and that the letters of 1921 had been written by his father under duress.

Held, that the plaintiffs had failed to prove that the money had been misappropriated from the Republic, and that, although the assignment of 1919 to the defendant was valid by the law of England, yet, as the law applicable was that of Guatemala, the claims of both parties failed.

Decision of Greer, J. (42 The Times L.R., 625), affirmed.

This was an appeal by the defendant from a decision of Mr. Justice Greer (42 The Times L.R., 625). There was also a cross-appeal.

The claim, which was in the nature of an interpleader, was by the Republic of Guatemala to recover a sum of £22,096 9s. 10d. which was deposited in or about 1906 by Don Manuel Estrada Cabrera, then President of the Republic of Guatemala, in his own name with Messrs. Lazard Brothers and Co., Limited, bankers, in London. By letters dated July 12 and October 11, 1921, addressed to Messrs. Lazard Brothers and Co., Limited, Don Manuel Estrada Cabrera, who had been deposed in 1920, ordered Messrs. Lazard Brothers and Co., Limited, to place the total amount standing to the credit of his account with them at the exclusive disposal of the Government of Guatemala. When, however, a demand was made for the moneys by the Guatemalan Consul in London, Messrs. Lazard Brothers and Co., Limited, declined to hand over the fund, as a claim had been made to it by Don Manuel Estrada Cajas Nunez, the son of Cabrera, who relied on a letter from his father dated July 24, 1919, and alleged that the letters of July 12 and October 11, 1921, were obtained by duress while his father was in prison, where he ultimately died.

The plaintiff Republic issued a writ against Messrs. Lazard Brothers and Co., Limited, who brought the money into Court, and Don Manuel Estrada Cajas Nunez was substituted as defendant.

Mr. Justice Greer dismissed the claims of both parties in the action.

The defendant appealed, and there was a cross-appeal by the plaintiff.

Mr. Comyns Carr, K.C., and Mr. Percy Handcock appeared for the plaintiff Republic ; Mr. Birkett, K.C., and Mr. Harold Murphy for the defendant ; and Mr. J. Douglas Young held a watching brief for an interested party.

A preliminary objection taken on behalf of the plaintiffs that no appeal would lie from the decision of a Judge in an interpleader matter was overruled.

The Court gave judgment at the close of the arguments, dismissing the cross-appeal.

LORD JUSTICE BANKES said that, without going into the evidence at length, certain broad points emerged. The issue raised was whether the Republic of Guatemala had established enough to justify the Court in finding in their favour that the money lodged in Court was the property of the Republic in an issue between the Republic and the ex-President. There were a great many difficulties in the case due to the fact that there was a want of evidence upon a number of points which in themselves were suspicious. His Lordship then referred to the evidence in detail as to the deposit of the money with Messrs. Lazard and Co., and to the facts and correspondence dealing with the assignment of the moneys by the ex-President to his son. Taking the evidence as a whole, he agreed with Mr. Justice Greer that the case made by the plaintiffs did not cross the boundary that divided strong suspicion from convincing proof, and he was of opinion that the cross-appeal failed.

* Reported by E. J. M. CHAPLIN and T. W. MORGAN, Esqs., Barristers-at-Law.

Lord Justice Scrutton and Lord Justice Lawrence agreed.

The Court reserved judgment on the main appeal.

Lord Justice Bankes delivered the following considered judgment :—In this case both parties appeal from a decision of Mr. Justice Greer. As originally commenced, the action was brought on behalf of the Republic of Guatemala against Lazard Brothers and Co., Limited, a company carrying on business as bankers in the city of London, to recover a sum of £22,000 odd, which was alleged to be the property of the Republic and to have been wrongfully misappropriated by a former President of the Republic, and deposited by him with Lazard Brothers and Co. in London. As Lazard Brothers and Co. had, before the action was commenced, received notice of an assignment of the money by the President to a son of his, Manuel Estrada Cajas Nunez, they took out an interpleader summons, and eventually an order was made under which the Republic became plaintiffs in the action and Nunez was substituted for Lazard Brothers and Co. as defendant, and each party was ordered to deliver points of claim. As a part of the order, Lazard Brothers and Co. were ordered to pay the money into Court, and this was done, and they ceased to have any interest in the matter.

From the points of claim as delivered, it appeared that the parties were agreed that the President referred to, Don Manuel Estrada Cabrera, had, in or about 1906, deposited a sum of money with Lazard Brothers and Co. which, with interest, amounted to the sum claimed in this action.

The claim of the Republic to the money rested upon the allegation that it was the Republic's money and that it had been misappropriated by the then President, and reliance was placed on two documents dated respectively July 12 and October 11, 1921, in which the President, in the most formal manner, acknowledged that fact and directed Lazard Brothers and Co. to pay the money to the Republic.

The answer of the defendant to this case was that the money was the President's money, and that the documents relied on were signed by the President after he had been deposed and when he was in prison and while under duress, and that in such circumstances no Court would give any effect to them. The defendant's claim rested upon a document bearing the date July 24, 1919, which was addressed to Lazard Brothers and Co. by President Cabrera, and which was relied on as being a good assignment by the President to the defendant, of which notice had been given by the defendant to Messrs. Lazard Brothers and Co.

The answer of the Republic to this was that the so-called assignment was a nullity according to the law of the Republic of Guatemala, and further, that the document was a forgery in the sense that it had come into existence at some date much later than the date which it bore ; and that it had been antedated with an intention to deceive and to defeat the effect of one or both of the two documents relied upon by the Republic.

These were the issues, on the one side and on the other, which the learned Judge had to try. He decided against both claimants, and both claimants appealed. On the appeal of the defendant Nunez being called on, a preliminary objection was taken, that no appeal lay from the decision of a Judge in an interpleader matter. The objection was founded upon the provisions of section 17 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1860, and section 20 of the Appellate Jurisdiction Act, 1876, and the decision of this Court in Van Laun and Co. v. Baring Brothers and Co., Limited ([1903] 2 K.B., 277). After hearing counsel in support of the objection, we overruled it, and gave our reasons shortly. As the matter is of some importance, I think it better to put my judgment into writing. In this judgment the other members of the Court concur.

There is no doubt that upon the law as it at present stands there is no appeal in an interpleader matter where there has been a decision of the Court or a Judge in a summary manner, and that the provisions of Order LVII., Rule 11, do not confer upon a Judge any power to give leave to appeal in such a case. See Van Laun and Co. v. Baring Brothers and Co., Limited (supra) ; Waterhouse v. Gilbert (1 The Times L.R., 540 ; 15 Q.B.D., 569) ; In re Tarn (9 The Times L.R., 366 ; [1893] 2 Ch., 280). Section 17 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1860, deals, however, not only with cases disposed of in a summary manner, but also with judgments "in any such action or issue as may be directed by the Court or Judge in any interpleader proceedings." The law with regard to this class of cases is undoubtedly not in a satisfactory state.

Section 17 is taken literally from the Interpleader Act of 1831 when, so far as actions were concerned, the trial would always be before a Judge and jury, and the practice treated the trial merely as the decision of an issue upon which final judgment could only be pronounced on reference back to the Judge at Chambers. Under such a system as this, in spite of the provision in section 17 negativing any right of appeal, the right of challenging the verdict of the jury on any of the accepted grounds was recognized, the trial of the issue being treated as an intermediate stage between the order for the trial and final judgment.

The practice up to the passing of the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1873, is fully discussed by Mr. Justice Pickford (as he then was) in Cox v. Bowen ([1911] 2 K.B., 611), and he also refers to the changes made by that Act and by the rules made thereunder. He points out that under the present practice a trial by a Judge alone is just as possible as trial by a Judge and jury, and that, with the object of doing away with the necessity of going back to the Judge at Chambers, Order LVII., Rule 13, was introduced. That enables the Court or a Judge finally to dispose of the whole matter of the interpleader proceedings.

What effect these changes have had upon the right to challenge the decision of a Judge in an interpleader matter who tries an action or issue without a jury has never been satisfactorily determined. Two cases were decided in the Court of Appeal in 1884, Robinson v. Tucker (14 Q.B.D., 371) and Dawson v. Fox (14 Q.B.D., 377). In both of them the issue had been tried by a Judge and jury, and in both, therefore, the question of the right of appeal where the issue had been tried by a Judge alone did not arise. In both cases, however, the Lords Justices composing the Court treated the question as if no distinction existed between a trial by a Judge with a jury and a Judge alone, and held that, in spite of there no longer being any necessity to go back to the Judge, who had directed the issue, for a final judgment, an appeal lay. The first Court consisted of Sir Baliol Brett, Master of the Rolls, and Lords Justices Bowen and Fry, and the second of Sir Baliol Brett, Master of the Rolls, and Lords Justices Cotton and Lindley.

An opportunity occurred in the following year when, in Waterhouse v. Gilbert (supra) the full Court, consisting of Sir Baliol Brett, Master of the Rolls, and Lords Justices Baggallay, Cotton, Lindley, Bowen, and Fry, sat to deal with the question of the right of appeal from a summary decision in an interpleader proceeding, to put the matter right, if the dicta in Robinson v. Tucker (supra) and Dawson v. Fox (supra) did not meet with their approval. Nothing, however, was said upon the point, and I think, therefore, that this Court should act upon the views expressed in these two cases and hold that an appeal lies. The objection, therefore, fails, and the appeal must proceed. I think it highly desirable that the difficulty occasioned by the retention of section 17 in its present form should be got rid of as speedily as possible.

In the course of the hearing of the defendant's case counsel for the Republic endeavoured to introduce the question of possible claims to the money by creditors under the bankruptcy of President Cabrera on the ground that in an interpleader matter it was permissible to rely upon a jus tertii to defeat the defendant's claim. Upon objection being taken by the defendant's counsel the learned Judge ruled that in view of the state of the pleadings the Republic ought not to be allowed to go into this question in this action. He was quite right, in my opinion, in so ruling, and the matter was not proceeded with, and the necessary evidence to support any such claim was not given. No notice of appeal against this ruling was given, and I merely mention the point because at one time Mr. Comyns Carr seemed inclined to rely on it before this Court, though I gathered that the claim to the right to do so was not persisted in.

The question which formed the main portion of the arguments addressed to us was whether it was the law of the Republic of Guatemala or the law of this country which was to be applied in order to decide the questions in issue between the parties. Upon the question whether the moneys referred to were always the property of the Republic and never the property of President Cabrera, it was apparently accepted by both parties that the law to be applied was the law of Guatemala, and in the absence of evidence to the contrary it was assumed that the law of that Republic was the same as the law of this country.

Mr. Justice Greer, in a very careful judgment, deals fully with the matters which were brought before him in the Court below in support of the claim of the Republic. He decided against the claim, and we have dismissed the appeal from that judgment, and have given our reasons for so deciding. Upon the appeal of the defendant Nunez the question what law is to prevail is all important, because according to the law of Guatemala the document upon which the defendant relies as an assignment is null and void, whereas according to English law it is valid. Upon this point the appellant's counsel relied upon the statement of the law in Dicey's Conflict of Laws, Rule 153, that "An assignment of a movable which cannot be touched, i.e., of a debt, giving a good title thereto according to the lex situs of the debt (in so far as by analogy a situs can be attributed to a debt) is valid. . . ." A number of authorities were quoted to us in support of the proposition that a chose in action has a location or a quasi-location which determines the law applicable to the contract, and it was contended that the dictum of Mr. Justice Day in Lee v. Abdy (17 Q.B.D., 309, at p. 312) that a chose in action has no locality is not well founded. So far as the rule laid down in Mr. Dicey's book is concerned, Mr. Justice Greer points out in his judgment, as Mr. Justice Cozens-Hardy had done already in In re Maudslay, Sons, and Field (16 The Times L.R., 228 ; [1900] 1 Ch., 602) that the authorities quoted in support of the rule do not bear out the statement, although Mr. Justice Cozens-Hardy said that he agreed with it. I am quite prepared to assent to the argument of the appellant's counsel that the weight of authority is that a chose in action has a locality or quasi-locality which may determine the law applicable to the contract (see Commissioner of Stamps v. Hope (7 The Times L.R., 710 ; [1891] A.C., 476 ; In re Maudslay, Sons, and Field (supra) ; Embiricos v. Anglo-Austrian Bank (21 The Times L.R., 268 ; [1905] 1 K.B., 677, at p. 685) ; Clare and Co. v. Dresdner Bank (31 The Times L.R., 278 ; [1915] 2 K.B., 576, at p. 578) ; and New York Life Insurance Company v. Public Trustee (40 The Times L.R., 430 ; [1924] 2 Ch., 101)). It is unnecessary, in my opinion, to discuss the question whether the rule laid down in Mr. Dicey's book can ever apply. It finds support in some circumstances and cases, of which Lebel v. Tucker (L.R., 3 Q.B., 77) may be an example, and in cases where the dispute arises upon the original contract itself. Where the appellant's argument fails, in my opinion, is in not appreciating the distinction which, I think, exists between cases where the dispute arises on the original contract and where, as here, the dispute is not in reference to the original contract at all but is one of priorities. Chief Justice Marshall draws pointed attention to the distinction between the two cases in a passage in his judgment in Harrison v. Sterry (5 Cranch, 289, at p. 298), where he says :—

"The law of the place where a contract is made is, generally speaking, the law of the contract ; i.e., it is the law by which the contract is expounded. But the right of priority forms no part of the contract itself. It is extrinsic."

One branch of this dispute illustrates this distinction very clearly. It seems to be accepted that the claim of the Republic to the money must be governed by the law of Guatemala. There is plenty of authority that this is so. In Hooper v. Gumm (L.R., 2 Ch., 282) the rival claimants were American mortgagees of a vessel when she was in America and subsequent purchasers, for value without notice, of the vessel when she was in England. Lord Chelmsford, the Lord Chancellor, at p. 286, says :—

"As the Edward Everitt was built expressly for sale in this country, and the plaintiff Hooper advanced his money upon her, knowing the object, and for the express purpose of furthering it, he may fairly be considered to be in the same situation as a vendor. His legal title to the ship would, of course, be determined by American law ; but the contract of sale and the effect of the interruption of the title of a bona fide purchaser for valuable consideration must be governed by the law of England, where the contract was made."

"Some question was raised in the course of the argument before us as to the law by which this case ought to be decided ; and though this point was not much gone into on either side on this occasion, it was more fully discussed when the case was argued before the late Lord Justice" [Lord Justice Knight Bruce] "and myself ; and it may be right for me therefore to say that, in my opinion, the law of this country ought to govern the decision of the case, for the purchase of the ship, on which the rights of the question depend, was made and completed in this country. In saying this, however, I must not be understood to mean that the shipping law of America is not to be regarded in deciding the case ; on the contrary, I think that great regard must be paid to it. In order to determine what the rights of these parties now are, it must be ascertained what their rights were at the time when the purchase in question was made, and in order to ascertain this, resort must be had to the American shipping law. The rights of the parties stood upon that law at the time when this purchase was made, and I apprehend that where rights are acquired under the laws of foreign states, the law of this country recognizes and gives effect to those rights, unless it is contrary to the law and policy of this country to do so."

In concluding his judgment the Lord Chancellor says :—

"In the competition between the parties, the plaintiff had disabled himself from standing merely on his legal title, and the claim of the defendant as a purchaser for valuable consideration without notice must prevail."

In Liverpool Marine Credit Company v. Hunter (L.R., 3 Ch., 479) Lord Chelmsford, L.C., at p. 483, says this :—

"The transfer of personal property must be regulated by the law of the owner's domicile, and if valid by that law ought to be so regarded by the Courts of every other country where it is brought into question."

There are other authorities to a like effect. In North Western Bank v. Poynter, Son, and Macdonalds ([1895] A.C., 56, at p. 75), Lord Watson says :—

"When a movable fund, situated in Scotland, admittedly belongs to one or other of two domiciled Englishmen, the question to which of them it belongs is prima facie one of English law, and ought to be so treated by the Courts of Scotland. In this case the respective rights of Page and Co. and the appellant bank depend on transactions which took place between them in England. I see no reason to doubt that had there been any conflict between the laws of Scotland and England upon the questions arising in this case, it would have been proper for your Lordships to consider and apply the law of England."

I also refer to the judgment of Mr. Justice North in In re Queensland Mercantile and Agency Company, Limited (7 The Times L.R., 10, 194 ; [1891] 1 Ch., 536). In that case there were rival claimants to a sum of money which, if the contract between the Queensland Company and the debenture holders was the only matter to be considered, belonged clearly, according to the law of Queensland, to the debenture holders, yet it was held as between the rival claimants to belong to a company which, according to the law of Scotland, had acquired a prior title to it.

In the present case two rival claimants are, by our interpleader procedure, brought face to face. The original debtor has dropped out. There is no dispute on the original contract. It is a question as between two persons who, for present purposes, must be considered as resident and domiciled in Guatemala at the time when their respective titles are alleged to have accrued. So far as the claim of the Republic is concerned, it does not appear to be disputed that that must be ascertained according to the law of Guatemala. What difference in principle is there for the present purpose between that claim and the claim of the defendant ? If, instead of claiming as assignee of his father, he was claiming as beneficiary under his father's will, the case would be unarguable. I do not think that the alleged distinction between the two cases is established. Both on principle and on authority I consider that the judgment of Mr. Justice Greer on the point is correct. The defendant's appeal must be dismissed, with costs. There must be a set off of costs. The money in Court must remain in Court to abide the order of the King's Bench Division.

Lord Justice Scrutton.—This appeal raises a question of some difficulty. Freed from the picturesque facts which do not assist the Court to determine the dry question of law, the problem which emerges is this. One Cabrera, domiciled in Guatemala, and being in Guatemala at the time, deposited in an English bank in England a sum of money, thus creating a debt due by an English debtor, which must be demanded in England, but which having been demanded in England could be recovered by suit against the debtor in whatever jurisdiction he could be found. (See Clare and Co. v. Dresdner Bank (31 The Times L.R., 278 ; [1915] 2 K.B., 576) and Leader, Plunkett and Leader v. Direction der Disconto-Gesellschaft (31 The Times L.R., 83), cited therein.)

Some years afterwards one Nunez, also a Guatemalan subject, claimed the deposit from the English bank. On being asked on what title he claimed, he produced a document passing between himself and Cabrera in Guatemala, both parties being then domiciled in Guatemala, purporting to be an assignment or a donation from Cabrera to Nunez of the right to recover the debt from the English debtor. It was proved that if the effect of this document was to be determined by the law of Guatemala the document was invalid. It was practically certain that if the effect of the document was to be determined by English law, apart from the question whether English law would determine the question by the law of Guatemala, the document was a valid assignment.

Mr. Justice Greer held that English Courts should decide the question according to the law of Guatemala, and therefore held that Nunez had no claim to the money. Nunez appeals.

The nature of the invalidity by the law of Guatemala is stated by Mr. Justice Greer at page 12 of his judgment, summarizing the evidence of Echevarria, the only witness called on Guatemalan law. It is this, that a donation or assignment without consideration can by the law of Guatemala only be made by a public document, that is, by a written contract or document made before a Notary on stamped paper, both parties being present and both signing the document. If not so made the donation is a nullity. Further, where the donee is an infant he cannot accept the donation, which must be made to and accepted by a next friend appointed by the Judge on the infant's behalf.

In the present case there was no public document, stamp or notary, but only a plain writing signed by the donor and not by the donee. At the time of the donation Nunez was an infant both by Guatemalan and English law, and there was no next friend.

It will be seen therefore that if Guatemalan law, being both the law of the domicil of both parties and the lex loci actus, is to be applied, the document was a nullity. If English law, as the law of the situs of the debt assigned, or the lex loci solutionis of the contract to pay, is to be followed, the document was effective.

It is to be observed, however, that in any case it is English law which the English Courts enforce ; the question is whether English law directs them to ascertain the validity of the assignment by the law of Guatemala, or by the law of England applicable to such documents.

On the question of the law applicable to an assignment of personal property invalid by the law of the country where the transaction takes place, or by the lex domicilii of the parties to the transaction but valid by the law of the country where the property is, or is deemed to be situate, the English authorities are scanty and unsatisfactory. Mr. Justice Channell in Dulaney v. Merry and Son (17 The Times L.R., 253 ; [1901] 1 K.B., 536) said that he had not found " any clear case of a transfer, good according to the law of the domicil of the owner, and made there, but held bad for not conforming to the law of the country where the goods are situate." Mr. Dicey (5th ed., p. 569) has not found any clear case in reference to individual assignments by gift or sale as to the validity of an assignment good by the lex domicilii of the owner but bad in the country where the goods are situate. Conversely, I have not been able to find nor could counsel refer me to any clear statement of the principles governing the question whether a transaction in personal property, as distinct from land, invalid by the law of the country where the transaction takes place, may be valid by the law of the place where the property is situate. Mr. Foote points out at page 293 of his Private International Law that in most of the judgments where general statements are made the transaction took place in the country where the property was, and a conflict between the lex loci actus and the lex loci rei sitae was not dealt with.

There seem to me, however, in this case to be two clear matters which help to a conclusion.

First, in cases of personal property the capacity of the parties to a transaction has always been determined either by the lex domicilii or the law of the place of the transaction ; and where, as here, the two laws are the same it is not necessary to decide between them. In Lee v. Abdy (17 Q.B.D., 309) an assignment was made in Cape Colony by husband and wife of a policy issued by an English company, and it was assumed for the purposes of the case that such an assignment was invalid by the law of the Colony, husband and wife not being capable of entering into such a transaction. A Divisional Court, composed of Mr. Justice Day and Mr. Justice Wills, held that on that assumption the assignment, though valid by the law of England, could not be enforced against the company in England. Neither Judge draws a distinction between the lex domicilii and the lex loci actus. The Court of Appeal in Sottomayor v. de Barros (3 P.D., 1), a case of marriage, laid down in general terms : " It is a well-recognized principle of law that the question of personal capacity to enter into any contract is to be decided by the law of domicile " ; and Lord Halsbury says in Cooper v. Cooper (13 App. Cas., 88, at p. 99) that incapacity to contract by reason of minority is regulated by the law of domicil. Lord Macnaghten (p. 108) in the same case is more doubtful, treating the question as not finally settled, but with a preponderance of opinion in favour of the lex domicilii. " But," he says, " when the contract is made in the place where the person whose capacity is in question is domiciled there can be no room for dispute. It is difficult to suppose that Mrs. Cooper " (the infant) " could confer capacity on herself by contemplating a different country as the place where the contract was to be fulfilled." Lord Watson (p. 105) declines to decide the point as the two laws are the same. The opinion of the Court of Appeal in Sottomayor v. de Barros (supra) in favour of the lex domicilii was criticized by the same Court in Ogden v. Ogden (24 The Times L.R., 94 ; [1908] P., 46) and by Sir James Hannen in the later Sottomayor case (5 P.D., 94). But most of the authorities seem to agree that capacity to contract depends either on the lex domicilii or the lex loci actus, and here they are the same. (See also Lord Eldon in Male v. Roberts (3 Esp., 163) as to infancy.)

It seems to me, therefore, that Nunez being a minor, incapable by the law of his domicil or the law of the place where the transaction takes place, of receiving a valid donation, so that a gift to him, without the intervention of a next friend judicially appointed to receive it, would be void and a nullity in Guatemala, cannot claim that he has received a good title to the deposit by such an invalid donation.

This view would support the judgment of Mr. Justice Greer, but is not the express ground on which he puts his decision, which is, I think, that a contract void in the place where it is made by reason of the omission of formalities required by the law of that place, is void elsewhere, the case of void contracts being distinguished from that of contracts merely inadmissible in evidence by reason of the absence of formalities, such as the requirements of stamp laws, not invalidating the contract itself.

This seems to me a second point on which the authorities are fairly clear ; namely, that where a transaction is invalid or a nullity by the law of the place where the transaction takes place owing to the omission of formalities or stamp, it will not be recognized in England. In Bristow v. Sequeville (5 Ex., at p. 279) Baron Rolfe agrees " that if for want of a stamp a contract made in a foreign country is void, it cannot be enforced here," distinguishing that from a case where the contract is not void, but only not admissible in evidence. To a similar effect are the judgments of Lord Ellenborough in Clegg v. Levy (3 Camp., 166) and of Lord Kenyon in Alves v. Hodgson (7 T.R., 241), which is explained by Chief Baron Pollock and Baron Rolfe in Bristow v. Sequeville (supra) as being a decision that if the transaction be not a valid contract at the place where it is made it is no contract at all. It seems to me that the principle laid down in Colonial Bank v. Cady (6 The Times L.R., 329 ; 15 App. Cas., at p. 283) that the effect of a transaction must be determined by the law of the place where it was effected has the same result. The negotiable instrument cases of Alcock v. Smith (8 The Times L.R., 222 ; [1892] 1 Ch., 238) and Embiricos v. Anglo-Austrian Bank, Limited (21 The Times L.R., 268 ; [1905] 1 K.B., 677) appear to proceed on the same principle. In each case a bill of exchange accepted and payable in England and therefore representing an English debt was dealt with in another country ; in Alcock's case (supra) by execution in Norway ; in Embiricos' case (supra) by purchase for valuable consideration in Vienna after theft and forgery of endorsement. In each case the foreign transaction would not have legal effect in England, but in each case it was held that being valid by the lex loci actus the English law would give effect to it. I cannot think the suggested difference between the piece of paper and the chose in action represented by it is satisfactory. I refer to the judgment of Mr. Justice Romer in the former case at page 255, and to that of Lord Justice Kay at page 267.

In the present case the private unstamped donation made in Guatemala from one Guatemalan subject to another was a nullity by the law of Guatemala. I think it was therefore a nullity by the law of England.

Reliance was, however, placed on the opinion of Mr. Dicey as stated in Rule 153 of his work on the Conflict of Laws, to which great weight is, of course, added by the opinion of Mr. Justice Cozens-Hardy in In re Maudslay, Sons and Field (16 The Times L.R., 228 ; [1900] 1 Ch., at p. 610) that it is right. That rule says : "An assignment of a movable which cannot be touched, i.e., of a debt, giving a good title thereto according to the lex situs of the debt (in so far as by analogy a situs can be attributed to a debt), is valid. . . ."

It is to be observed, however, firstly, that in that case the question was whether the English Courts would give effect to seizure in France of a French debt as against English debenture holders administering an English company's affairs ; that is to say, the lex loci actus, and, if debts have a situs, the lex loci rei sitae were the same, and the learned Judge's opinion was therefore not necessary for the decision. Secondly, while Mr. Justice Cozens-Hardy thinks the opinion of Mr. Dicey right, he also thinks that the authorities cited by the author for that opinion do not support it, and Mr. Justice Greer, after consideration, has come to the same conclusion. It is therefore necessary to consider how far decided cases support the rule. As quoted by Mr. Dicey they are :

(1) Innes v. Dunlop (8 T.R., 595). This was a Scotch assignment of a Scotch bond on which the assignee sued in his own name in England, and not in the name of the obligee. The defendant demurred and, it was held, thereby admitted the assumpsit and the consideration, the action not being on the bond, but in assumpsit. The defendant therefore failed. This appears merely to decide a pleading point.

(2) O'Callaghan v. Thomond (3 Taunt., 82), where an assignee of an Irish judgment sued in his own name in England by virtue of Irish proceedings under an Irish statute. Here the law of the place of the debt and of the transaction were the same, and no principle favouring either was stated. The assignee was allowed to sue.

(3) In re Queensland Mercantile and Agency Company, Limited (7 The Times L.R. 194 ; [1891] 1 Ch., 536; 8 The Times L.R., 177; [1892] 1 Ch., 219). Here a Queensland company had Scotch shareholders who owed unpaid calls. An English company held debentures of the Queensland company charging the unpaid calls. A creditor of the Queensland company sued it in Scotland and arrested the unpaid calls. The law of Scotland gave such arrestment the effect of an assignment, taking priority over the claim of debenture holders without intimation. The English Court gave effect to the Scotch law. Here it will be seen that the law of the situs of the debt, the unpaid calls, and the law of the place of the transaction the effect of which was being considered, the arrestment, were the same, and it was therefore unnecessary to decide which would prevail in case of difference. Mr. Justice North treated the law of the place where the debt was situate as overriding the law of the domicil of the creditor. He did not deal with the lex loci actus, which was also the lex loci rei sitae. The Court of Appeal did not deal with the case on these lines at all, but on the lines that the Scotch Court was administering the jus gentium and the English Court would not interfere. This appears to have no relevance to the point under discussion here.

(4) Alcock v. Smith (supra). This case I have already referred to, and in it a transaction valid by the lex loci actus was given an effect which it would not have in the country where the debt was situate.

We were also referred to Kelly v. Selwyn ([1905] 2 Ch., 117), where, in the administration in England of the English estate of an English testator, priority was given to an English assignment, later in date but prior in notice, over an earlier New York assignment for which the law of New York did not require notice. Priorities have been said to be questions for the lex fori, The Colorado (39 The Times L.R. 216; [1923] P., 102), and I think this is the ground of decision.

It seems to me, therefore, that the authorities cited by Mr. Dicey do not support the proposition that a transaction as to an English debt, void by the law of the country where it takes place, and by the law of the domicil of the parties to it, will be treated as valid in the country where the debt is deemed to be situated. In my opinion, both the capacity of the parties to enter into such a transaction and the validity and effect of such a transaction in form and results must be determined by one or other of these laws ; and in this case they are the same. For these reasons I think the judgment of Mr. Justice Greer dismissing the claim of Nunez should be affirmed on the grounds (1) that Nunez as an infant was not by the law of Guatemala capable of himself receiving a valid donation, and (2) that the transaction, apart from infancy, was void as not carried out in the way required by the law of Guatemala.

I should add, though I do not decide the case on this ground, that I am not satisfied that the same result would not be obtained by treating the document containing the donation as a fraudulent document, and declining to enforce it. It is dated July 24, 1919, and Nunez swore that it was executed on that day. Mr. Justice Greer has not accepted his evidence. I think he was right, for I can see no reason why Cabrera, who was a competent lawyer, should, when President in July, 1919, execute a document in a way which he must have known to be invalid by the law of his country ; and I think his letter to the bank in February, 1920, when he was still President, is inconsistent with his having assigned the debt six months before. I also agree with the Judge's view that the date when the document was put forward in New York shows that it must have come into existence before the earliest assignment to the Republic, which the Judge has very properly held to be invalid as made under duress. I imagine that the donation to Nunez was made while Cabrera was in captivity, informally, because he could not get at a notary, but with the genuine intention of assigning to Nunez. But the fact remains that it was wrongly dated, and I think that early date must have been intended to deceive some person or Court, and to represent the document to be what in fact it was not, a document executed on July 24, 1919. I doubt whether any Court should enforce such a document, but I do not decide against the claim of Nunez on that ground.

The result is that both claims on the fund in Court fail ; the Court has notice that the trustee in bankruptcy of Cabrera claims the fund, and the fund must remain in Court till that or any other claim made to the Court is disposed of.

Lord Justice Lawrence.—I concur in the judgment delivered by Lord Justice Bankes on the question of the right to appeal. I have already given my judgment concurring with the other members of the Court that the plaintiffs' appeal fails and ought to be dismissed.

The effect of the dismissal of the plaintiffs' appeal, in my opinion, is that the money on deposit at Lazard's Bank in London must, at the date of the purported gift to the defendant, be taken to have been the property of his father, and that the only question to be determined on the defendant's appeal is whether such gift was valid. Mr. Justice Greer, after seeing the defendant in the witness-box, has found as a fact that the letter of July 24, 1919, is a genuine document, and in my judgment there is no valid ground for disturbing that finding. In these circumstances I am of opinion that the learned Judge was right in deciding that, if the defendant's claim is to be determined according to the law of England (using that expression in its local or territorial sense), the letter of which express notice in writing was given to the bank on August 4, 1921, operated as an absolute assignment of the bank's debt, effectual in law to pass the legal right to such debt, from the date of such notice, to the defendant by virtue of section 25 (6) of the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1873 (now replaced by section 136 of the Law of Property Act, 1925), notwithstanding that the assignment was not made for valuable consideration.

The case of In re Westerton ([1919] 2 Ch., 104), to which the learned Judge referred in support of his decision, is directly in point, and was, in my opinion, rightly decided.

The defendant contended that his claim ought to be determined according to the law of England and not according to the law of Guatemala, basing his contention on Rule 153 of Dicey, and the main questions which were debated before this Court were, firstly, whether that rule correctly states the law, and, secondly, whether, on the facts, the defendant's case falls within it.

In considering this rule in connexion with the defendant's claim it is, I think, important to bear in mind that the rule does not purport to deal with contracts to assign, testamentary dispositions, or so-called universal or general assignments, to each of which cases different rules are applicable.

Although I have not been able to discover any direct decision affirming the correctness of the rule, I am of opinion that the weight of judicial opinion in England is in favour of the view that it expresses the true principle when applied to a particular assignment inter vivos, such as the one in question here.

There are many cases—some of which have been cited at the Bar—which show that a debt may have, and frequently has been recognised by the Court as having, a local situation or quasi-situation ; as an example I need only refer to the recent case of New York Life Insurance v. Public Trustee (40 The Times L.R., 430 ; [1924] 2 Ch., 101).

Whenever a local situation can properly be attributed to a debt it seems to me logically to follow that the same principle should be applied to its assignment as is applicable to the transfer of goods, and I concur in the opinion expressed by Mr. Justice Cozens-Hardy in In re Maudslay, Sons and Field (16 The Times L.R., 228 ; [1900] 1 Ch., 602), that rule 153 is correct and is a necessary consequence from the admission that a debt has a locality or quasi-locality.

The principle that a transfer of goods made according to the lex situs is valid is, in my opinion, well established (see rule 152 of Dicey and the cases referred to in the comments on such rule).

Mr. Justice North, in In re Queensland Mercantile and Agency Company, Limited (7 The Times L.R. 194 ; [1891] 1 Ch., 536), after stating that there is a well known rule of law " that a transfer of movable property, duly carried out according to the law of the place where the property is situated, is not rendered ineffectual by showing that such transfer as carried out is not in accordance with what would be required by law in the country where its owner is domiciled," applied that rule to an assignment (by legal process or arrestment) of debts. This case was affirmed on appeal (8 The Times L.R., 177 ; [1892] 1 Ch., 219) on a different ground, but no doubt seems to have been cast in the Court of Appeal either upon the correctness of the rule as stated by Mr. Justice North or upon its applicability to an assignment of a debt.

Mr. Justice Channell, in Dulaney v. Merry and Son (17 The Times L.R., 253 ; [1901] 1 K.B., at p. 541), states : " It seems clear that a transfer of movables here good by our law would here be held good, notwithstanding that it might not comply with formalities required by the law of the domicil of the owner, but there has not been quoted to me, nor have I found, any clear case of a transfer, good according to the law of the domicil of the owner, and made there, but held bad for not conforming to the law of the country where the goods are situate." That was a case of a general assignment to a representative of the assignor's creditors, and the learned Judge held that it was valid notwithstanding that it was not registered in accordance with the requirements of the law of England. I only cite that case (the decision in which does not, in my opinion, bear on the question here) for the purpose of showing that in arriving at his decision the learned Judge did not intend to cast any doubt on the applicability of the lex situs to the case of a particular assignment of movables.

The case of Alcock v. Smith (8 The Times L.R., 222 ; [1892] 1 Ch., 238) seems to me also to support the correctness of rule 153.

Mr. Justice Greer, however, held that rule 153 is too widely stated, and that it does not apply to a case like the present, where the assignment of the debt was made in the place where both parties to it were resident and domiciled. In so deciding the learned Judge relied upon the decision in Lee v. Abdy (17 Q.B.D., 309), and especially on the concluding words of the judgment of Mr. Justice Day on p. 313. In that case an assignment of an English policy of assurance in the Cape of Good Hope to the wife of the assignor was held invalid as being contrary to the law of the place where both the parties to it were domiciled. Mr. Justice Day apparently decided the case on the grounds that a chose in action has no locality, and that the assignment existed (if at all) only by virtue of a contract between the assignor and assignee and held that as there was no valid contract to assign there was no valid assignment. In my opinion the learned Judge was wrong both in stating as a general proposition of law that a chose in action has no locality and also in holding that the validity of the assignment (which, for all that appears in the report, may have been a voluntary assignment) depended upon the existence of a prior valid contract to assign, and then deciding the case as if it were one of contract. Mr. Justice Wills, on the other hand, based his judgment on the proper law of the original contract between the assignor and the assurance company, holding that in the special circumstances the parties to that contract must be presumed to have intended that if the contract were assigned it would be assigned according to the law of the Cape. In my opinion the reasons given by the learned Judges for their decision afford no assistance in determining the questions which have arisen in the present case, as it is clear that the Court declined to treat the debt of the assurance company as having a local situation in England, and apparently did not base their decision on the fact that the assignment was from a husband to his wife—a transaction which by the law of their matrimonial domicil they were disabled from carrying out.

In the present case the debt is connected in so many ways with England that there is no difficulty in arriving at the conclusion that it has its situation or quasi-situation in England. The contract with the bank was made in England—the nature and extent of the bank's obligations under the contract fall to be determined by English law—the debt is payable in England where the bank is resident and domiciled, and England is the place where the debt is properly recoverable.

In the case of a debt so situated I am unable to appreciate why, on principle, an assignment valid according to the lex situs should be rendered ineffectual merely because it was made in Guatemala, where the parties to it were domiciled, and because it did not comply with the requirements of the law of Guatemala. If intention has anything to do with it, I should have thought that the presumed intention of the parties to the assignment was that the assignment should be operative, and that, as it was to operate on a debt in England, it should be governed by the law of England and not by the law of Guatemala, according to which it was a nullity and passed nothing. The assignor must have contemplated that his written order to the bank to transfer the debt to the defendant would be obeyed.

If the case had been one of contract and the defendant was seeking to enforce here a contract to assign the debt made in Guatemala it may well be that he might have to establish that the contract was valid according to the law of Guatemala, but in my opinion that raises a different question from the one which has to be determined here.

Then it was contended that even if the assignment operated to transfer the legal right to the debt, yet the beneficial rights ought to be ascertained in accordance with the law of Guatemala, and as according to that law the beneficial interest in the debt did not pass out of the ownership of the assignor his representatives are not entitled to it.

In support of this contention the case of Colonial Bank v. Cady (6 The Times L.R., 329 ; 15 App. Cas., 267) was cited. In my opinion that case has no application to the facts of the present case: There the owners of the shares had never intended to part with them, and the sole question was whether they were estopped from saying that their broker had not their authority to dispose of the certificates. It was held, affirming the decision of the Court of Appeal. that in the circumstances they were not so estopped and that the bank had not acquired a title to the shares. It appears that on that point the principles of the American law did not differ in any material respect from those by which an English Court would be guided in similar circumstances. Lord Herschell. at page 283, says : "I agree that the question, what is necessary or effectual to transfer the shares in such a company, or to perfect the title to them, where there is or must be held to have been an intention to transfer them, must be answered by a reference to the law of the State of New York. But I think that the rights arising out of a transaction entered into by parties in this country, whether, for example, it operated to effect a binding sale or pledge as against the owner of the shares, must be determined by the law prevailing here."

In the present case there was a clear intention on the part of the assignor to transfer the debt to the defendant, and in those circumstances I am of opinion that so far from the Colonial Bank case (supra) being an authority in favour of the respondents it supports the defendant's case that the assignment, if it operated at all, operated to pass to the defendant both the legal right to and the beneficial interest in the debt (see also Westlake, 7th Ed., 153).

There remains to be considered the vital question whether the fact that the defendant was an infant at the date of the assignment renders it ineffectual.

The solution of this question, in my opinion, depends, first, upon whether the impediments placed by the law of Guatemala in the way of an infant's acceptance of a voluntary assignment are only matters of form, or whether they are matters of substance and demonstrate the infant's incapacity to accept such an assignment ; and secondly, upon whether the defendant's capacity to accept the assignment ought to be determined according to the law of England or according to the law of Guatemala.

In Cowell's Interpreter "capacity" is defined as "an ability or fitness to receive. In law it signifies when a man or body politick is able to give or take lands or other things, or to sue actions."

According to the law of Guatemala as found by the learned Judge, a voluntary assignment to an infant is a nullity unless his father or mother or some representative appointed by the Judge attends before the notary at the time of the assignment to notify to the assignor his or her acceptance of the assignment on behalf of the infant.

In my opinion this requirement of the law of Guatemala cannot properly be termed a mere formality. It seems to me to be a matter of substance. The assignment has no operation unless a third person over whom the infant has no control accepts it on his behalf. Unlike the case of an adult, the infant cannot himself go before a notary and accept ; he is powerless to compel anybody to accept on his behalf ; he has no voice in the question whether the assignment should be accepted or not ; it may be accepted or refused on his behalf without consulting him and even against his wishes.

In these circumstances I have come to the conclusion that according to the law of Guatemala the defendant was in the present case disabled from accepting the assignment of the debt, and therefore if his capacity to take is to be determined according to the law of Guatemala the assignment ought to be held to be invalid, whereas if the capacity to take is to be determined by the law of England the assignment ought to be held valid.

This brings me to the final point whether the capacity of the defendant is to be determined by the law of England or by the law of Guatemala.

Westlake in his Private International Law (see 7th Ed., para. 52) seems to favour the view that the weight of authority is in favour of the proposition that when the capacity of a person to act in any given way is questioned on the ground of his age the solution of the question will be referred in England to his personal law. Foote in his International Law (see 5th Ed., p. 100), on the other hand, seems to be of opinion that the better opinion is that in such a case the law of the place where the act is done is the proper law to decide all questions of capacity.

As in the present case the lex domicilii and the lex loci actus are the same, no useful purpose would be served in discussing which of these two views is the right one.

Dicey in his Conflict of Laws (see p. 560), on the other hand, seems to consider that rule 151, which states that a person's capacity to assign (and therefore, I assume, a person's capacity to take) a movable is governed by the law of his domicil, is in case of conflict subject to rule 153, and submits that where in fact a good title to a movable is acquired under the lex situs it will be treated as valid in England even though the person (e.g., a minor) conferring a title under the lex situs was incapable of giving a good title under his lex domicilii (see p. 561). If this principle be sound it would, in my opinion, apply to the converse case of a minor accepting an assignment under the lex situs although incapable of accepting under his lex domicilii, and would operate so as to confer a valid title to the debt on the defendant.

I have, however, been unable to find any authority, with the possible exception of the cases of Worms v. De Valdor (49 L.J., Ch., 261) and In re Selot's Trusts ([1902] 1 Ch., 488), which bears out Dicey's opinion upon this point. The two cases to which I have alluded, even if correctly decided, do not, in my opinion, touch the present case, where the incapacity was due to the minority of the defendant; at the most they tend to show that the Courts here will not recognize an incapacity unknown to the law of England.

In the absence of any binding authority I decline to accept as sound the proposition that the English Courts will treat as valid an assignment of a movable where the assignee is, owing to his minority, incapable of taking, both under his lex domicilii and under the lex loci actus.

In the result I have come to the conclusion that the gift to the defendant, who, by his personal law and by the law of the place where it was made, was disabled from accepting it, cannot properly be treated as valid in England, notwithstanding that the subject matter of the gift was situate here.

In my opinion, therefore, the appeal fails on the sole ground of the defendant's incapacity to accept the assignment.

Judicial Committee of the Privy Council.
(Viscount Haldane, Viscount Finlay, Lord Wrenbury, Lord Darling, and Lord Warrington of Clyffe.)
1927. Jan. 18.

BRITISH AMERICA NICKEL CORPORATION, LIMITED, AND OTHERS v. M. J. O'BRIEN, LIMITED.*

Companies—Debentures—Rights of debenture-holders—How far majority can bind minority.

The power of a majority of a special class, such as debenture-holders, to bind a minority must be exercised for the purpose of benefiting the class as a whole and not individual members only.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Supreme Court of Ontario (First Appellate Division) affirming a decision in favour of the respondents by the Trial Judge (Mr. Justice Kelly).

Mr. Maugham, K.C., and Mr. Glyn Osler, K.C. (of the Canadian Bar), appeared for the appellants; Mr. W. N. Tilley, K.C., and Mr. G. W. Hewitt (both of the Canadian Bar) for the respondents.

Viscount Haldane, in delivering their Lordships' judgment, said:—This is an appeal against a judgment of the Court of Appeal of Ontario, affirming the judgment of Mr. Justice Kelly, by which it was found in favour of the minority of a class of secured debenture-holders of the appellant corporation that the minority were not bound by resolutions passed by the majority of the class of such debenture-holders. The latter had purported to exercise a power conferred on such a majority by the terms of a trust deed. The resolutions in question sought to modify the rights of the debenture-holders as an entire class.

Before their Lordships proceed to consider the somewhat involved circumstances in which the question arises, it will be convenient that they should refer to the principle to be applied in weighing the outcome of these circumstances.

To give a power to modify the terms on which debentures in a company are secured is not uncommon in practice. The business interests of the company may render such a power expedient, even in the interests of the class of debenture-holders as a whole. The provision is usually made in the form of a power, conferred by the instrument constituting the debenture security, upon the majority of the class of holders. It often enables them to modify, by resolution properly passed, the security itself. The provision of such a power to a majority bears some analogy to such a power as that conferred by section 13 of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, which enables a majority of the shareholders by special resolution to alter the articles of association. There is, however, this restriction of such powers, when conferred on a majority of a special class, in order to enable that majority to bind a minority. They must be exercised subject to a general principle, which is applicable to all authorities conferred on majorities of classes enabling them to bind minorities. It is that the power given must be exercised for the purpose of benefiting the class as a whole, and not merely individual members only. Subject to this, the power may be unrestricted. It may be free from the general principle in question when the power arises not in connexion with a class, but only under a general title which confers the vote as a right of property attaching to a share. The distinction does not arise in this case, and it is not necessary to express an opinion as to its ground. What does arise is the question whether there is such a restriction on the right to vote of a creditor or member of an analogous class on whom is conferred a power to vote for the alteration of the title of a minority of the class to which he himself belongs.

It was decided by the Judicial Committee in 1887, in North-West Transportation Company, Limited v. Beatty (3 The Times L.R., 789; 12 App. Cas., 589) that where a contract, fair in its terms and within the powers of a company, had been entered into by the directors with one of their own number, as a vendor to them, and was therefore voidable, it could not be assailed. The reason was that it had been ratified by the shareholders at a general meeting. At this meeting the ratification was actually obtained by the aid of the votes of the vendor director himself and his nominees, which produced a majority of shareholders' votes at that general meeting. The vendor in exercising his votes had thus a direct personal interest. It was held that the affirmance of the voidable contract, being matter only of internal policy, was binding on the company, and further that every shareholder, including the vendor, had a right to vote on such a question, notwithstanding that he might have a personal interest in the subject matter in conflict with the interest of the company itself. As its constitution enabled the vendor individually to acquire shares freely he was entitled to the votes which these carried and to qualify a majority at the meeting. Having regard to the constitution of the company this could not be said to be oppressive so as to invalidate the voting. There the question arose, not as regarded a class of creditors, but of shareholders.

* Reported by Sir W. J. Soulsby, Barrister-at-Law.

In Burland v. Earle (18 The Times L.R., 41 ; [1902] A.C., 83) the question before the Judicial Committee was whether it was ultra vires for a company to carry its profits to reserve instead of dividing them, and to invest them in a manner which, although not ultra vires, was objectionable. It was also a question with shareholders only. A minority of shareholders sued the others, the company itself not being a plaintiff, to compel the company and its directors to distribute accumulated profits, and also to compel the appellant Burland to hand over certain funds invested in his sole name. It was held that the question, being in no way one of ultra vires action, was one of internal management only, and that any action that could be taken required that the company itself should be plaintiff. It would have been otherwise had the acts complained of been of an ultra vires or actually fraudulent character, as had been explained by Lords Justices James and Mellish in Menier v. Hooper's Telegraph Works (L.R., 9 Ch., 350), where the majority of the shareholders had improperly appropriated to themselves property which belonged to all the shareholders equally. It was laid down in Burland v. Earle (supra) that a shareholder is not debarred from using his voting power as a shareholder to carry a resolution by the circumstance of his having a particular interest in the subject matter of the vote, following in this the decision in North-West Transportation Company, Limited v. Beatty (supra).

It has been suggested that the decision in these two cases on the last point is difficult to reconcile with the restriction already referred to, where the power is conferred, not on shareholders generally, but on a special class, say, of debenture-holders, where a majority, in exercising a power to modify the rights of a minority, must exercise that power in the interests of the class as a whole. This is a principle which goes beyond that applied in Menier v. Hooper's Telegraph Works (supra) inasmuch as it does not depend on misappropriation or fraud being proved. But their Lordships do not think that there is any real difficulty in combining the principle that, while usually a holder of shares or debentures may vote as his interest directs, he is subject to the further principle that where his vote is conferred on him as a member of a class he must conform to the interest of the class itself when seeking to exercise the power conferred on him in his capacity of being a member. The second principle is a negative one, one which puts a restriction on the completeness of freedom under the first, without excluding such freedom wholly.

The distinction, which may prove a fine one, is well illustrated in the carefully worded judgment of Mr. Justice Parker in Goodfellow v. Nelson Line (Liverpool), Limited (28 The Times L.R., 461 ; [1912] 2 Ch., 324). It was there held that while the power conferred by a trust deed on a majority of debenture-holders to bind a minority must be exercised bona fide, and while the Court has power to prevent some sorts at least of unfairness or oppression, a debenture-holder may, subject to this, vote in accordance with his individual interests, though these may be peculiar to himself and not shared by the other members of the class. It was true that a secret bargain to secure his vote by special treatment might be treated as bribery, but where the scheme to be voted upon itself provides, as it did in that case, openly for special treatment of a debenture-holder with a special interest, he may vote, inasmuch as the other members of the class had themselves known from the first of the scheme. Their Lordships think that Mr. Justice Parker accurately applied in his judgment the law on this point.

Their Lordships now turn to the facts in the appeal before them. The appellant Nickel Corporation was constituted under the law of the Dominion of Canada. The corporation was the owner of valuable mining properties in the province of Ontario and of plant there and elsewhere. In 1913 the appellant corporation had bought from M. J. O'Brien, now represented by the respondent company, and from one John R. Booth, mining properties, and had given them, as part of the purchase price, bonds secured on these properties amounting to approximately $3,000,000. On a reorganization, to be presently referred to, these bonds were exchanged for bonds secured under a trust deed. The Nickel Corporation had an authorized capital of $20,000,000, divided into 200,000 ordinary shares of $100 each. Before the reorganization the Corporation had issued debenture stock to the amount of $10,000,000, secured by floating charges. The appellant Trust Company was the trustee of a deed which constituted the floating security, and is also trustee of the securities in question in this appeal.

By contract of March 10, 1916, the British Government had agreed to purchase the Nickel Corporation's output of nickel up to a large amount for a period of ten years. On March 15, 1916, the Nickel Corporation, being desirous of reorganizing its finances and of putting them on a more satisfactory footing, executed a mortgage deed of trust in favour of the second appellant as trustee, to enable it to issue bonds. These bonds were issued at 6 per cent. interest, in two series, A and B, of $3,000,000 each, specially secured on assets of the Nickel Corporation, and ranking pari passu, with a difference only in the period for redemption. The bonds were held substantially as follows:—

J. R. Booth, A Bonds .. .. .. (Mr. Booth had held bonds in the older form, which were now paid off.)	2,184,000
J. F. Booth, A Bonds	147,000
Frances D. Anderson, A Bonds ..	38,000
C. A. Masten, A Bonds..	6,000
M. J. O'Brien, Ltd., A Bonds	625,000
	$3,000,000
The British Government, B Bonds ..	3,000,000
	$6,000,000

The British Government had, as already stated, bought the output of nickel by the appellant corporation, and it appears to have been desirous to strengthen the position of the corporation by aiding it to raise a loan.

The trust deed of March 15, 1916, provided power to a majority of the bondholders, consisting of not less than three-fourths in value, to sanction a reconstruction of the corporation, to enter into a scheme for selling its assets, to sanction any modification of the rights of the bondholders against the corporation or its property, either under the trust deed or otherwise, to accept other securities of the corporation in lieu of the bonds, or to consent to an issue of securities constituting a prior charge, together with other powers.

The effect of the war was to disorganize the markets of the appellant corporation, so that it was mainly by the aid of purchases of its stock by a Norwegian nickel group, and by the cooperation of the British Government, that the appellant corporation carried on its business between 1916 and 1919. The Norwegian group purchased both debenture stock and ordinary stock in large amounts. As the corporation was indebted to its bankers in the end of 1920, at a meeting of the First Mortgage Bondholders authority was given for the creation of a prior lien bond for $500,000 having priority over the First Mortgage Bonds, and this was issued to the bank.

In February, 1921, the Nickel Corporation made default in payment of the half-year's interest due to the respondents on the First Mortgage Bonds. A scheme for reconstruction was prepared on behalf of the corporation and was laid before a meeting of the First Mortgage Bondholders on March 31, 1921. The object of this scheme was to compel the holders of the First Mortgage Bonds to exchange them for an amount of new "A" Income Bonds equal to the principal of the former bonds. The corporation was also to be at liberty to issue $6,000,000 of First Income Bonds at 10 per cent. interest and at 20 per cent. premium, to be a first charge on the property of the corporation. Provision was made for the issue of the "A" Income Bonds, already referred to, to rank subsequently to the First Income Bonds. The bank and the Norwegian creditors were, by means of these issues, to have their claims reduced. The corporation was also to be enabled to issue "B" Income Bonds to the amount of $12,500,000, ranking pari passu as to principal with the "A" Income Bonds. There was also given power by extraordinary resolution to sanction the exchange of the "A" Income Bonds into other securities, and the British Government was to be relieved of its obligation to purchase nickel.

It was further provided by the scheme that a committee of four persons (one appointed by the First Mortgage Bondholders other than the British Government; one by the Debenture Stockholders; one by the bank, the Canadian Bank of Commerce, and a certain Dr. Eyde, representing the Norwegian interests; and one by the British Government) should have power to modify the scheme without confirmation by extraordinary resolution of the bondholders.

Mr. John R. Booth's vote was necessary in order to gain the required majority of bondholders, and it was secured by a promise to give him $2,000,000 of the Ordinary stock of the Nickel Corporation. This stock was at the time of little value, but it was evident that if the price of nickel rose it might become of value. The promise to Mr. Booth was made some months before the new scheme was submitted to the bondholders.

The respondents protested against the adoption of the scheme, but it was carried by the prescribed majority at the meeting of March 31, 1921. The respondents then applied for an interim injunction, but the Court allowed the resolutions to be carried into effect, on the terms that if at the trial of the action it should be found that they ought not to have been carried into effect, the appellant Trust Company should pay to the respondents the amount of these bonds with interest.

At the trial in the Supreme Court of Ontario Mr. Justice Kelly held that what was really done was that the majority at the meeting did not act in the bona fide exercise of the rights which the majority might exercise, but in consideration of what would benefit the Nickel Corporation and the personal interests of those whose votes were to be secured. The vote had been influenced by special negotiations in advance of the meeting. He also thought that it was outside the powers of the majority to confer on a committee, not necessarily representing the interests of the First Mortgage Bondholders, powers which belonged to these bondholders alone, and to authorize the substitution for their security of something which was not a satisfactory security. He therefore gave judgment for the respondents, the plaintiffs.

There was an appeal to the Court of Appeal, where Mr. Justice Ferguson delivered the judgment. He agreed with Mr. Justice Kelly in holding that the votes neither of Mr. Booth nor of the British Government would have been given for the scheme had they been influenced only by what was most in the interest of the bondholders. Both of these may, he thought, have acted honestly if mistakenly. But what really moved them was not a legitimate consideration of the improvement of their security, but that they felt that a refusal to approve the scheme would result in serious loss to other persons who had lent to or invested in the corporation. They wished to give these persons a chance, even if a risk to the bondholders had to be taken in doing it. This the Court of Appeal held to have been improper. On that ground they affirmed the judgment of Mr. Justice Kelly, and they affirmed it also on the ground that there was no power in the majority of the bondholders to delegate their power of binding the minority.

Their Lordships are of opinion that judgment was rightly given for the respondents in this appeal. In the first place, it is plain, even from his own letters, that before Mr. J. R. Booth would agree to the scheme of 1921 his vote had to be secured by the promise of $2,000,000 Ordinary stock of the Nickel Corporation. No doubt he was entitled in giving his vote to consider his own interests. But as that vote had come to him as a member of a class he was bound to exercise it with the interests of the class itself kept in view as dominant. It may be that, as Mr. Justice Ferguson, of the Court of Appeal, thought, he and those with whom he was negotiating considered the scheme the best way out of the difficulties with which the corporation was beset. But they had something else to consider in the first place. Their duty was to look to the difficulties of the bondholders as a class, and not to give any one of these bondholders a special personal advantage, not forming part of the scheme to be voted for, in order to induce him to assent. On this ground by itself their Lordships are of opinion that the resolutions cannot stand. They think, in the second place, that the appointment of a committee of four persons, with power to modify in a very extensive fashion the security of the mortgage bondholders, was ultra vires. As has been pointed out, the appointment of the majority of this committee was not entrusted to the mortgage bondholders themselves. They might have acted together by a proper majority, but neither in form nor in substance was any power given to that majority to delegate. It was only under the provisions of the deed of mortgage and trust of March 15, 1916, that the scheme of May 31, 1921, could be made, and the former contained no provision authorizing it. Other points referred to in the judgments were raised in criticism of the scheme, but it is not necessary for their Lordships to enter on them.

For the reasons given they will humbly advise His Majesty that this appeal should be dismissed with costs.

GARDNER v. HIRAWANU AND OTHERS.*

Landlord and Tenant—Lease—Native uncleared land—Covenant by lessee to cultivate—Felling of trees—Alleged actionable waste.

A lease for 42 years of uncleared native land in New Zealand contained a covenant by the lessee to cultivate the land in a husband-like manner and to keep it clear of noxious weeds. About three years after the grant of the lease the lessee felled the timber and sold it and then sold the lease. The reversioners, alleging that to fell the timber so early was to fell it, not for the purposes of cultivation, but with a view to making money by its sale, sued the lessee for actionable waste.

Held, that as the covenant to cultivate imposed upon the lessee an obligation to cut the timber, and as the reversioners had no right to complain of the clearance being made at such an early period of the lease as was most to the benefit of the lessee, the action failed.

This was an appeal from New Zealand.

Mr. Michael Myers, K.C. (of the New Zealand Bar), appeared for the appellant; Mr. Farwell, K.C., and Mr. F. O. Langley for the respondents.

Lord Wrenbury, delivering their Lordships' judgment, said:—On August 26, 1921, the appellant became assignee and registered proprietor of a lease dated December 20, 1919. In the latter part of the year 1923 she sold and assigned the lease to one Wharawhara Topine, owner of an adjoining block. The reversioners in May, 1923, sued the appellant for damages for acts done by the appellant in January and February, 1923, whereby as they alleged the reversionary interest had been depreciated. The action was by order of July 7, 1925, removed into the Court of Appeal for argument. By order dated October 23, 1925, it was remitted to the Supreme Court, and on February 10, 1926, that Court gave judgment for the reversioners for £600 and costs. This is an appeal from that judgment.

The lease of December 20, 1919, was a lease of about 228 acres of native uncleared land in the Provincial District of Taranaki, in the North Island of New Zealand, for a term of 42 years from August 20, 1919, at a rent of 4s. 2d. an acre for the first 21 years, and afterwards at a yearly rent equal to 5 per cent. of the Government unimproved valuation to be made about July, 1940, with a further 5 per cent. of the rent for the costs and expenses of the Land Board. It contained covenants as follow:—

"3. The lessee will at all times during the said term repair and keep in good and tenantable repair and condition the said land and all improvements for the time being thereon and will at the end or sooner determination of the said term so deliver up the same (fair wear and tear and damage thereto by fire earthquake or tempest excepted).

"4. The lessee will during the said term cultivate manage and use the said land in a husband-like manner and will at all times keep the same free and clear of noxious weeds and will comply with the provisions of 'The Noxious Weeds Act, 1908,' or any amendment thereof to which an occupier is liable."

The land was unimproved and uncleared native land covered with bush, and as to about 40 acres contained millable trees (totara matai, white pine and rimu)—millable trees are hereinafter called timber. Early in 1923 the appellant sold the timber to a firm of saw millers. In January and February, they cut and removed it, and in payment for it gave the appellant sawn timber of the value of £600. The respondents alleged that the act of felling and removal was wrongful; that their reversionary interest was materially and injuriously affected thereby; and they sued for damages for its depreciation. The judgment under appeal upheld this contention and awarded £600 and £162 8s. costs.

The land, as has already been stated, was uncleared land. When cleared it was adapted for pasturage, but until cleared it could not be brought under cultivation. The reversioners are, no doubt, justified in saying that the timber is part of the land; that a lessee, by virtue of his lease, acquires only a special property in it; that he has not a general right to cut down and destroy it; that the general property remains in the reversioners; that the special property of the lessee is determined by severance; and that if the timber is severed from the land the property, in the absence of some further right contained in the lease, vests in the person entitled to the first estate of inheritance. The question is whether under this lease on the facts of this case the reversioners have not granted to the lessee a larger right of property—nay more, whether they have not imposed upon the lessee an obligation to cut the timber in pursuance of the lessee's covenant to "cultivate, manage and use the land in a husband-like manner."

In the case of In re Rotoiti, No. 5 Block ([1923] N.Z. L.R., 619), Mr. Justice Hosking pointed out that in New Zealand the clearing of bush country is well known as coming within the class of improvements for the purposes of the Land Acts and the legislation relating to the valuation of land, and drew attention also to the fact that a covenant to comply with the provisions of the Noxious Weeds Act, 1908 (a covenant which is contained in art. 4 of this lease), would be fanciful unless clearance of the surface of the land was contemplated. Their Lordships find that in the present case the acreage of the demised land was small; that upon the evidence it was capable of carrying only about 1½ sheep to the acre, and as a farming proposition was not practical unless all the land was cleared. Mr. Chas. Phillip Smith, a witness for the plaintiffs (the reversioners), said in re-examination: "The only reasonable way to enjoy the land is by felling the bush: by that I mean, the land as a whole. That is the only method in which you could enjoy the land." The plaintiffs' evidence, in fact, comes to this: not that it would have been wrong to fell the timber at some time, but that to fell it so early and before clearing the bush elsewhere was to fell it, not for the purpose of cultivation, but with a view to making money by its sale, and that this was not justifiable. In their Lordships' opinion this contention cannot be supported. The covenant to cultivate, manage and use in a husband-like manner imposed upon the lessee an obligation to cultivate, importing and creating an obligation to improve the land—that is to say the whole of the land—by clearance, with a view to cultivation. If the lessee unduly deferred the clearance of the land the lessors might, no doubt, complain of breach of covenant ; but they have no grievance if the lessee proceeds to perform his obligation to make clearance at such early time as is most to his own benefit. The right of the reversioners is that the demised land shall be so dealt with that all of it shall be brought under cultivation, and that at the expiration of 42 years they shall regain possession of the land not depreciated by any act which the tenant was not entitled to do upon the land. If the timber might legitimately be cut at some time during the 42 years the reversioners cannot complain of acceleration, although they might complain of delay in developing the land by clearance.

In their Lordships' opinion Article 4 of the lease "may be substantially described as that of a grant by implication arising from the nature of the subject matter in order to give effect to an evident intent that the tenant shall have the reasonable enjoyment of the subject matter." The quotation is from the judgment in In re Rotoiti (supra). It was the intention of the lease that the tenant should have the use of all the land for pastoral purposes, and clearing the land was a necessary act in order to achieve that intention. Indeed, their Lordships go further and say that Article 4 extends beyond the grant of a right, and creates in the lessee an obligation to make during the 42 years a clearance of the land, including the felling of the timber in dispute. The very detailed and careful judgment of Mr. Justice Hosking in In re Rotoiti (supra) is, in their Lordships' judgment, right. The majority in the Supreme Court do not dispute the correctness of that decision. They distinguish the present case on a ground which is, in their Lordships' opinion, erroneous. Chief Justice Stout says : "There were no circumstances in this case which showed that the tenant who became the assignee of a [quaere, meaning "the"] lease obtained the lease for the purpose of farming." Mr. Justice Sim, Mr. Justice Reed and Mr. Justice Adams say : "The evidence makes it clear, we think, that the cutting of the timber was not done for any such purpose" (viz., the purpose of securing the profitable enjoyment of the land), "but for the purpose of making an immediate benefit out of the timber." The learned Judges here fail to give effect to the covenant to cultivate. It was impossible to cultivate without clearing. The tenant owed the duty of clearing, and as has been pointed out acceleration of the date at which the clearing is done is a thing which affected the reversioners not at all, although delay in so doing might have been a breach of covenant. The tenant having a right or being under an obligation to fell the timber, is not bound to burn it, as according to the ordinary practice he would burn the bush. He may dispose of it in the best way which circumstances allow. If he cuts and sells the timber early in his occupation he does not thereby deprive the reversioners of 42 years later of anything. The act will, no doubt, affect the price which the lessee will obtain for the lease if he sells it, but that is a matter with which the reversioners are not concerned. It is unnecessary to consider whether the tenant would be entitled to cut and sell the timber upon the eve of the expiration of the term, say, when 41½ of the 42 years of the term had expired. The case suggested is one which could not arise if the tenant performed the obligation to "cultivate, manage and use the land in a husband-like manner." A compliance with that covenant necessarily involved that the timber should have been cut and removed from the land many years before that time, and, as their Lordships have already pointed out, the date of its removal is matter of indifference to the reversioners, provided that the date shall be such that the covenant to cultivate is performed. Their Lordships are of opinion that the judgment of the minority Judge, Mr. Justice Ostler, is right, and that this appeal succeeds. The action should be dismissed with costs here and below. Their Lordships will humbly advise His Majesty accordingly.

FORSTER v. NATIONAL AMALGAMATED UNION OF SHOP ASSISTANTS, WAREHOUSEMEN AND CLERKS.*

Trade Unions—Political objects—Expenditure of general funds on such objects—Statutory provision for making of rules—Alleged breach of statutory restrictions—Complaint to Registrar as to breach of rules—Cause of action—Trade Union Act, 1913 (2 and 3 Geo. V., c. 30), ss. 1, 3 (1) (3).

By s. 3 (1) of the Trade Union Act, 1913, restrictions are imposed on the application of the funds of a trade union for the political objects specified in subsection (3), unless the furtherance of those objects has been approved as an object of the union and by a resolution of the nature mentioned in subsection (1) and unless rules approved by the Registrar of Friendly Societies are in force providing that any payments in furtherance of those objects are to be made out of a particular fund, referred to in the Act as the political fund of the union. It is also provided that any member may, by appropriate notice, obtain exemption from any obligation to contribute to the political fund ; and no prejudice, disability, or disadvantage is to attach to the non-contributing member by reason of his claiming that exemption.

A valid resolution was passed by the defendant trade union under the section, and rules approved by the Registrar of Friendly Societies providing for the matters referred to in subsection (1) were in force.

In an action by a non-contributing member against the union for an alleged breach of the statutory restrictions by expending part of their general funds on the political objects to which the section applies,

Held, that as the conditions precedent imposed by the section had been complied with, the statutory restrictions had ceased to operate, and the action failed, the plaintiff's only cause of action (if any) being for a breach of the rules.

Semble, where a non-contributing member has made to the Registrar of Friendly Societies under s. 3 (2) a complaint of a breach of the rules and the Registrar has dismissed the complaint, such member has no cause of action for the breach of the rules which was the subject of the complaint to the Registrar.

This was an action brought by Mr. John Ferdinand Forster, of 67, Rattray-road, Brixton, S.W., against the National Amalgamated Union of Shop Assistants, Warehousemen and Clerks, of which he was a member, for an injunction "to restrain the defendants, their servants or agents, from applying directly, or in conjunction with any other trade union, association, or body, or otherwise indirectly, any of the general funds of the union in the furtherance of the political objects to which section 3 of the Trade Union Act, 1913, applies; and, in particular, from paying any contributions or sums to a body of persons known as the Trades Union Congress, so long as that body expends its funds, or part thereof, in the furtherance of such political objects or intends to do so."

The defence was a general denial of the allegations.

Mr. R. M. Montgomery, K.C., Mr. J. W. Manning, K.C., Mr. W. F. Swords, and Mr. W. H. Williams appeared for the plaintiff; Mr. Wilfrid Greene, K.C., Sir Henry Slesser, K.C., Mr. J. H. Stamp, and Mr. Arthur Henderson for the defendant union.

Mr. MONTGOMERY, in opening the case, said that the plaintiff had been a member of the union since February 6, 1905. His complaint was that the union, contrary to law, had applied in the years between 1921 and 1926, and, so far as was known, would continue to apply, unless restrained by the Court, some of its funds indirectly to political purposes to which only the separate political fund of the union could legally be applied. The general funds of the defendant union were, as the plaintiff alleged, applied indirectly to those political objects by means of affiliation fees paid to the Trades Union Congress, a body which had existed since 1872, or thereabouts, when, he (counsel) imagined, it was not very political in character. Since 1921, at any rate, it had been a political body. The money which had been paid in affiliation fees by the defendant union and by many other unions had been expended on political objects, to which objects, by law, only the political fund of the defendant union was applicable. There was, owing to the way in which the defence had been put forward, very little dispute about the main facts of the case, which were comparatively simple.

Broadly speaking, the plaintiff asked his Lordship to say that the defendant union was not entitled, under the present constitution of the Trades Union Congress, to pay affiliation fees out of its general funds to that congress; whereas the defendant union claimed the right to pay those fees to the congress out of its general funds. Of course, if the affiliation fees paid from the union to the congress had been paid out of the defendants' political fund no question would have arisen.

The distinction between the general fund and the political fund of a trade union arose owing to the enactments in the Trade Union Act, 1913.

In section 3, subsection (1), it was provided:—

"The funds of a trade union shall not be applied, either directly or in conjunction with any other trade union, association, or body, or otherwise indirectly, in the furtherance of the political objects to which this section applies. . . ."

The political objects to which the section applied were stated in subsection (3) to be the expenditure of money (inter alia)—

"(b) On the holding of any meeting or the distribution of any literature or documents in support of any . . . candidate or prospective candidate."

"(e) On the holding of political meetings of any kind, or on the distribution of political literature or political documents of any kind, unless the main purpose of the meetings or of the distribution of the literature or documents is the furtherance of statutory objects within the meaning of this Act."

Those statutory objects were to be discovered by going back to section 1, subsection (2), of the Act:—

"For the purposes of this Act the expression 'statutory objects' means the objects mentioned in section 16 of the Trade Union Act Amendment Act, 1876, namely, the regulation of the relations between workmen and masters, or between workmen and workmen, or between masters and masters, or the imposing of restrictive conditions on the conduct of any trade or business, and also the provision of benefits to members."

Counsel went on to say that the Trades Union Congress was an association or body of persons representing or constituted by some 200 trade unions, having a total membership, it was said, of over 4,000,000 persons. It met annually for a period of about a week, and the practice adopted by the affiliated unions, including the defendant union, was to send delegates to the annual general meeting of the congress. Those delegates appointed a general council which carried on the business of the congress for the year until its next annual meeting. The general council was, therefore, really the permanent executive of the congress.

The expenses incurred by the congress during the year were defrayed by means of affiliation fees paid by the trade unions out of their general funds.

The congress was a political body. It obtained certain fees from the delegates who attended, no doubt for the purpose of defraying the expense of the meeting which took place yearly. It also obtained money from the sale of various documents which it prepared and printed, but the great bulk of its income came from the affiliation fees of the constituent members, the trade unions.

From 1922 onwards in each year—at any rate until April 1, 1926, there being some question raised by the defence about the position after that date—the congress appointed, jointly with the Labour Party, another executive body. The Labour Party was the newest and at the present time, as represented in Parliament, the second in importance of the three great political parties of this country. The executive body appointed by the Trades Union Congress in conjunction with the Labour Party was known as the National Joint Departments, or National Joint Council.

The constitution and duties of the congress were stated in its 1922 report of the annual congress held at Southport. It would be seen that the matters dealt with were essentially political, and it was decided that the expenditure of the National Joint Departments was to be met equally by the general council of the Trades Union Congress and the executive committee of the Labour Party.

Large funds were expended by the general council, mostly through the agency of the National Joint Departments, in various ways, and those funds were obtained mainly from the affiliation fees.

A considerable amount of the expenditure of the general council—and from April, 1922, until April, 1926, of the National Joint Departments—had been upon the preparation and printing for circulation to the public, or to certain classes of the public, and in some cases upon the cost of the actual circulation to the public, of large quantities of year-books, pamphlets, booklets, and leaflets of a political character.

The Trades Union Congress also financed through the medium of a company, the Victoria House Printing and Publishing Company, Limited, formed in 1899, a political newspaper called the Daily Herald. It was the expenditure of money of the defendant union through the Trades Union Congress on political literature or documents which formed the gravamen of the charge against the defendant union in the present action.

When the defendant union paid affiliation fees to the Trades Union Congress it knew, or ought to have known—in fact it obviously did know—that there was the prospect, indeed the certainty, that the affiliation fees would be expended upon the production, for circulation to the public, of political literature. He proposed to show that various documents were political documents, the main purpose of which, in the great majority of cases, could not possibly be said to be the furtherance of statutory objects. He would also contend that money expended upon the preparation and printing of political documents was money expended upon the distribution of political documents within the meaning of the clause to which he had referred—namely, section 3, subsection (3), clause (e), of the Act of 1913.

He rather gathered from certain admissions which had been made that the Trades Union Congress had been inclined to proceed on the basis that money expended upon distribution did not include money expended upon the preparation of printing for circulation to the public, but merely included money expended upon actual physical circulation to the public. It would, of course, make sheer nonsense of the provision to say that money might be expended upon the preparation, the printing and the publishing of a document for the purpose of circulation, but must not be used to pay the newsboy who ran round and distributed it. That was what no Parliamentary legislation could possibly have been expected to enact. Money expended upon the distribution, he contended, included money expended upon the steps that took place before actual circulation. It might not include money expended upon printing a document not intended for circulation, but it must include the cost of preparation for circulation as well as the circulation itself. The Trades Union Congress had had the point in mind during certain of its activities in connexion with the circulation of literature to the public.

He referred to various documents as showing that it was clear to the defendant union that the affiliation fees which they paid would be expended upon political literature. The congress had resolved in 1922 that, in order to enable the Labour movement to acquire and run its own newspaper the annual affiliation fees should be increased from 1d. to 3d. per member. Counsel read the report of a speech by Mr. J. H. Thomas as showing that it was clearly contemplated that some of the money should be expended upon the Daily Herald.

Mr. GREENE said that he did not object to the report being read, but he was not responsible for Mr. Thomas's views, neither did they represent the facts.

Mr. MONTGOMERY also said that the report of the congress proceedings of 1924-1925 showed how closely the defendant union was in touch with the congress and knew what it did, for Mr. J. Turner, a member of the general council of the congress, was stated to be the representative of the defendant union.

Mr. GREENE said that Mr. Turner represented a group, including the defendant union.

Mr. MONTGOMERY referred to the defendants' annual report for 1922, which said that the organized Labour movement of the country, as represented by the general council of the congress, had taken over the responsibility of financing the Daily Herald, which was now the mouthpiece of the Labour movement, and recommended that it should be regularly taken by the members. The congress report for 1924 mentioned a resolution to institute a vigorous campaign on behalf of the Industrial Workers' Charter, which had for its object the nationalization of property and other matters of a political nature.

The "charter," said counsel, had stood ever since as defining the objects and purpose of the Trades Union Congress, and in recent years it was set out in what were called the "Standing Orders" of the congress.

Counsel read some of the measures which were to be taken to further the objects of the congress.

Mr. GREENE.—Would carrying litigation to the House of Lords be a political object?

Mr. MONTGOMERY.—It depends upon the case.

Counsel submitted that his first proposition was established—that some of the uses to which the affiliation fees would be put were known to the defendant union to be the expenditure of money upon literature in support of the objects of the general council of the Trades Union Congress. He then proceeded to deal with the spending of the money, and said that he was greatly assisted in that respect by the frank way in which the defence had dealt with the case. They had made a large number of admissions on matters which would otherwise have required a good deal of detailed evidence to prove. The defendant union admitted that the Labour Year-books, 1925-1926, were prepared by and at the expense of the National Joint Departments, and were distributed by way of sale to the public by and (except as mentioned) at the cost of the Labour Party at a commercial price calculated to cover carriage or postage. The gross proceeds of sale were paid to the National Joint Departments, who refunded to the Labour Party the amount disbursed by them for postage, carriage, and packing. It was admitted, said counsel, that the cost of preparing the year-books was borne as to half by the congress, whose funds were provided by the affiliation fees of the defendant union and other trade unions.

Referring to certain of the publications of the Trades Union Congress, Mr. MONTGOMERY read passages from a pamphlet entitled "From Nursery School to University," and said that it contained a foreword by Mr. Ramsay MacDonald, and in effect the pamphlet explained the policy of the Labour Party on educational questions. The hope was expressed that it would "put before the public ideas which would influence general opinion." A greatly increased expenditure on education was advocated with larger grants from the Treasury. Under "General Policy" it was stated, after referring to various municipal services, that the "best argument for socialism in this country is not that it can be based on abstract, economic principles, but that the experiments we have made in the direction of socialism have been successful."

In a leaflet headed "Mines for Nation Campaign" the nationalization of mines was advocated "to save the lives of men," the management of the mines being vested in pit committees. In the Trades Union Congress Report of 1920 the share of the congress in the expenses of the nationalization of the mines campaign was stated to be £1,500, although he (counsel) could not say that all that money had been spent on leaflets. That expenditure continued, and in the 1922 report reference was made to a balance of £249 in respect of the campaign. Another publication, entitled "Russia and International Unity," advocated the organization and union of the working classes as the only thing to prevent another war and to create an "insuperable barrier to capitalist oppression."

A report of a delegation to Russia to inquire into the Zinovieff letter stated that there "never was a Red letter." The whole publication was nothing but a political document. In another pamphlet Mr. George Lansbury wrote that if we could live on rice we could do without sleep. Another pamphlet was called "The Camera Cannot Lie."

MR. JUSTICE EVE.—That is not quite a truthful statement. You never found a lady who said that it didn't lie.

Mr. MONTGOMERY.—I think that perhaps it is meant to be sarcastic.

Counsel, continuing, said that those pamphlets were included in a list which was published at the expense of the Trades Union Congress to advertise leaflets which dealt with a number of subjects and were published by the Labour Party.

Another pamphlet, "Labour Exposes Pensions Scheme," set out a speech in the House of Commons by Mr. John Wheatley, M.P., in which he described the widows' pensions scheme as a "deceptive concoction." There were a number of other leaflets on the same subject by members of Parliament. Other publications dealt with the coal industry and advocated the nationalization of the mines, with the liquor trade, with the "Attack on Trade Unions," and with "Unemployment Insurance by Industry."

Counsel dealt with other admissions by the defence. One had reference to a number of "Weekly Notes for Speakers." A formidable bundle was produced, upon seeing which his LORDSHIP said: "I don't want to see those."

Mr. MONTGOMERY next referred to the Labour Magazine, which, it was admitted, had been printed and published down to March, 1926 (but not circulated), by the Trades Union Congress. From that date the congress had agreed to contribute to the cost of production and advertising (but not of distribution) based on the proportion of non-political matter to the whole publication. Counsel contended that the Trades Union Congress had been spending, since April, 1926, money upon the distribution of a political document, although, in fact, that document might contain advertising or non-political matter. He submitted that it did not make the least difference to its coming within the prohibition of the section that the expenditure was based upon a comparison between the two parts of the magazine. The document was political, and must be taken as a whole.

Counsel also referred to the "Labour Press Service," which, he explained, consisted of four newspaper pages, two of which were left blank. Those four pages, he said, were sent to various parts of the country and were there made up into local Labour newspapers.

Mr. GREENE.—Like a parish magazine.

Mr. MONTGOMERY.—Yes, if you like.

Turning to the subject of the Daily Herald, which was subsidized by the congress, counsel put in several copies of it and said that there could be no doubt that it was a political newspaper and, therefore, came within the prohibition of distribution of political literature or documents. He said that he could understand his friend denying that it was literature, but not that it was a document.

His LORDSHIP.—Am I to understand that the funds of the Trades Union Congress are made up of the affiliation fees of the unions, plus the contributions from the delegates?

Mr. MONTGOMERY.—Yes; and plus sales.

His LORDSHIP.—What is the amount of the defendant union's contribution?—About £450 a year.

At 3d. a member?—Yes.

Mr. MONTGOMERY, continuing, went into details in proof of the allegation in the statement of claim that part of the affiliation fees paid by the defendant union in 1924 and 1925 to the Trades Union Congress had gone to support the Daily Herald, which was conducted for the main purpose and object of furthering labour or socialistic political views; and that such moneys expended in supporting that newspaper were expended for political objects contrary to the provisions of the Trade Union Act, 1913.

During the year ending December 31, 1922, the Trades Union Congress paid £4,000 for grants to or for the Daily Herald. During the year ending July 31, 1923, £35,800, and during the following year £28,047 16s. 8d., were paid by the congress to the development fund of that newspaper. The congress paid to or for the Daily Herald in October, 1924, the sum of £2,500; in March, 1925, £1,000; in May, 1925, £2,000; and in July, 1925, £5,000. Moreover, during 1922 the congress, through the National Joint Departments, expended £536 7s., and during 1923 and 1924 £1,907 17s. 2d. to or for the support of the Labour Magazine in furtherance of defined political objects.

During 1924 the Trades Union Congress paid £520 towards "the Labour and Socialist International," an organization engaged in furtherance of the same objects. During the year ending July 31, 1922, the congress paid £1,749 19s. 2d., in addition to the sum paid by the Labour Party towards the cost of the "Mines for the Nation Campaign." In or about October, 1924, the congress paid considerable sums of money towards the Parliamentary General Election expenses of Labour Party candidates. In particular, £3 each was paid towards the General Election expenses of J. J. Lawson, the Labour Party candidate for the Chester-le-Street Division of Durham; of A. Shepherd, the Labour Party candidate for the Darlington Division; and of one Adams, the Labour Party candidate for the Brixton Division. The Trades Union Congress also paid large sums of money for the production and distribution of political literature in support of the candidature of the last-named candidate.

Calling attention to the financial statement of the congress for the year ending July 31, 1922, counsel said that on the income account side there was a large balance of £24,000; and that on the expenditure side there was, roughly speaking, the same. The affiliation fees for 1921 were £10,000; and for 1922 £22,000. In substance, there was no income for that year worth troubling about except the affiliation fees. In 1923 the affiliation fees amounted to £40,000.

His LORDSHIP.—That was after the rise in the levy?

Mr. MONTGOMERY.—I think the first account which I quoted was after the rise too.

Continuing, counsel said that in 1923 there was a Labour Party payment to the Daily Herald of £2,500. Again there was practically no income except the affiliation fees. In the following year there was a curious change in the accounts, and the congress affiliation fees were shown to be £20,000, as against £40,000, a very big drop indeed.

Mr. GREENE.—I am told that the reason for the drop in the fees was the fact that many unions had paid in advance, and therefore the subsequent annual contributions were very much smaller.

Mr. MONTGOMERY said that the plaintiff wrote to the general secretary of the Trades Union Congress on December 22, 1924, complaining of the grants made to the Labour candidates at Chester-le-Street and Darlington, and pointed out that the expenditure was political. He received a reply that if he desired to raise any matter with the general council he must do so through the head office of his own union. Accordingly he wrote to the secretary of the defendant union in January, 1925, stating that the expenditure in connexion with the Socialist candidates was not trade union but political. He also stated that further political expenditure for 1924 included the following grants:—Labour and Socialist International, £520; National Joint Departments, £6,050; and the Daily Herald, £28,047. Mr. Forster also wrote that the "Industrial Workers' Charter" was a Socialist programme, which meant, in effect, that in future the Trades Union Congress was to finance propaganda on behalf of the Socialist Labour Party. "Having signed an exemption form against all expenditure of this kind," he continued, "I should like to know whether I am to be allowed to deduct Trades Union Congress fees from my contribution."

In reply, he was informed that the letter would be placed before the National Executive Committee at their next meeting; and, later, he was told that that had been done and that the same was duly noted.

Mr. Forster then wrote stating that that meant that the committee had no intention of dealing with the matter, and that he must take other means of dealing with it. He again asked whether he could deduct Trades Union Congress fees from his contributions, because, in his opinion, the expenditure was political. He further said that they must grant him that right or pay the fees out of the political fund of the union.

In March, 1925, the plaintiff wrote to the Registrar of Friendly Societies asking for a decision on the point.

Mr. MANNING read the long judgment of the Chief Registrar, in which he said:—

"The words 'political objects' in the Trade Union Act have a very carefully defined meaning, and do not include many of the things that would be described as political in ordinary language. Thus, I do not find, in the items which you have marked in the report and statement of accounts of the Trades Union Congress, payment to anything which is a political object within the meaning of the Act."

The payment to the two candidates, the Registrar added, as part of their election expenses, was the supposed value, assessed he did not know how, of certain pamphlets of a trade union nature used during the election generally. He would not be prepared to hold that that was expenditure on a political object without a good deal more evidence.

The Registrar stated that it seemed to him that the definition of "political objects" in the Act ought to be viewed in the light of the decisions from which it sprang. To put it as shortly as possible "political," as it was used in the section, was not the adjectival form of "polity," but the adjectival form of "party politics." Section 3 (1) of the Act recognized that there were two batches of political objects, one of which had to be paid for out of the political fund, the other of which might be paid for out of the general fund. The first class, therefore, was a special class, and did not embrace everything which could be described in the ordinary way as "political." The definition dealt with the placing of the bundle of party political hay in front of the elector's nose.

Mr. MONTGOMERY.—He might have said "carrots."

His LORDSHIP.—The same thought occurred to me.

Mr. MANNING continued to read the judgment, in which the Registrar said that a trade union had, by section 1 of the Act, power to apply its funds for the purposes of the statutory objects and any other objects authorized by its constitution, subject to the provisions of the Act as to the furtherance of "political" objects; and that right, conferred by the Act itself, was not, in his opinion, cut down by the fact that a political party had adopted some or all of the statutory objects. The "political" objects, therefore, which were contrasted by the proviso with "statutory" objects must be those party-political objects which were not also statutory objects. In those, indeed, he thought that they had at last found those "other political objects" which, under section 3 (1) might be legally furthered by a trade union out of its general fund.

Dealing with the Daily Herald, the Registrar said that he found that out of its 50 columns only 11 concerned "statutory objects," and only 4½ "political objects"; while as regarded the campaign for the "Industrial Workers' Charter," the contents of the charter were almost entirely, if not entirely, statutory objects. On his findings he did not think that any order ought to be made. If it was desired to prevent the Trades Union Congress or its general council from intervening in elections or otherwise spending its funds on political objects on the ground that such intervention or expenditure was outside its objects as expressed in its standing orders, or on some other ground, this, he imagined, could be effected by another kind of proceeding.

Mr. MONTGOMERY, commenting on the Registrar's judgment, said that the Registrar was answered by the Act itself, which enacted in section 1 (1) that

"The fact that a combination has under its constitution objects or powers other than statutory objects within the meaning of this Act, shall not prevent the combination being a trade union for the purposes of the Trade Union Acts, 1871 to 1906, so long as the combination is a trade union as defined by this Act, and, subject to the provisions of this Act as to the furtherance of political objects, any such trade union shall have power to apply the funds of the union for any lawful objects or purposes for the time being authorized under its constitution."

Counsel pointed out that the combination must be for any lawful purpose if that purpose was authorized by the constitution of the trade union itself. With regard to the definition of "statutory objects," it did not have the wide sweep which the Registrar attached to it, and certainly as to the "Industrial Workers' Charter" he (counsel) would have thought that there was in it nothing relating to statutory objects.

His LORDSHIP.—By section 1 (1) there may be a combination, a trade union, notwithstanding that it has objects other than statutory objects?—Yes.

And those objects may include political objects?—Yes.

Mr. MONTGOMERY said that in section 3 (3), (a), (b), (c), (d), (e), of the Act were found the political objects to which the general funds of a trade union were not to be applied. There were many political objects which were lawful, and to which trade unions, if their constitution allowed them to do so, were entitled to apply their funds, but the Registrar of Friendly Societies had endeavoured to force the words to a use of which they were incapable.

Counsel next dealt with the pleading of the defence to the present action that, by reason of the Registrar's decision, the matter was res judicata. He submitted that that contention could not be upheld.

His LORDSHIP asked what would be the alternative to the affiliation of the defendant union with the Trades Union Congress. He did not see how the union could control the action of the congress.

Mr. MONTGOMERY replied that if the union paid affiliation fees to another body, which must be expected to spend its funds for political purposes, such money should be paid out of the political fund of the union.

Referring to the Daily Herald, counsel insisted that that newspaper was a political document, in spite of the fact that it published general news and advertisements of frocks, soap, and pickles.

In conclusion, Mr. MONTGOMERY said that he did not think that he could call any witness who would assist his Lordship about any fact which was not admitted.

Mr. MANNING went through the various items in the statement of claim and also in the defence. The defendant union denied that the effect of section 3 of the Trade Union Act, 1913, was accurately stated by the plaintiff. The furtherance of the political objects defined in section 3 (3) of the Act had been approved by the defendant union by a resolution now in force. The union also denied that it had made any payments in furtherance of those objects otherwise than out of its political fund, and that the Trades Union Congress was engaged in the furtherance of such objects.

The union did not admit the close association between the Labour Party or Parliamentary Labour Party and the congress, as was alleged. It did not admit that the Daily Herald was conducted for the main purpose or object of furthering Labour or Socialistic political views, or that moneys expended in supporting that newspaper were, in truth or in fact, being expended for political objects contrary to the provisions of the Act of 1913. The union said that the Daily Herald (so far as its objects were not those which were common to all daily newspapers) was conducted primarily for the purpose of furthering the general objects of the trade unions, and the contributions thereto of the Trades Union Congress were made in furtherance of such general objects. The union did not admit that the congress expended through the National Joint Departments, or at all, the sums of money mentioned in the statement of claim.

An amended defence stated that the National Joint Departments were absolutely discontinued on April 1, 1926; and that the services previously performed for the Trades Union Congress by those Departments were now performed by the separate staffs of the congress, except that the Labour Magazine was now published and distributed by the Labour Party. The Trades Union Congress contributed to the cost of producing and advertising it (but not of distributing it) on terms that had not been yet finally agreed upon further than that the contribution of the congress was to be based only upon non-political matter.

With reference to other allegations, the defendant union denied that the Labour and Socialist International was an organization engaged in the furtherance of the defined political objects. It added that the Trades Union Congress ceased in 1923 to be affiliated to that International, and the payment of £520 mentioned by the plaintiff was a final payment of fees in respect of the previous affiliation. No further payment to the International was contemplated. The defendant union did not admit that the "Mines for the Nation Campaign" was conducted in furtherance of the defined political objects, and it denied that £1,749 19s. 2d. paid by the congress towards the cost of that campaign was so paid.

The union admitted that in the course of the General Election in October, 1924, the congress expended £1,702 7s. 6d. in printing and distributing a political pamphlet, but it denied that the congress at any time paid any money for the production, publication, or distribution of political literature in support of the candidature of certain Labour candidates. The sums of £3 mentioned by the plaintiff were book entries representing the value of the copies of the publication supplied by the congress to the candidates named. It was no part of the objects of the Trades Union Congress to distribute political literature, and the defendant union did not contemplate that the congress would distribute any.

The defendant union claimed the right to pay its affiliation fees to the congress out of its general funds, and it denied that such moneys, if so paid, would be applied for the defined political objects contrary to the provisions of the Act of 1913, or at all.

Finally, the union pleaded that in 1925 the plaintiff complained to the Registrar of Friendly Societies, pursuant to section 3 (2) of the Act, of all matters complained of in the present action, and that the Registrar, after hearing the plaintiff by his counsel, determined that the defendant union had committed no breach of its approved rules. The union contended that the Registrar's determination was binding and conclusive on the plaintiff.

His LORDSHIP, referring to the pamphlet headed "If we could live on rice we could do without sleep," said that there seemed to be nothing political in that; it appeared to be a domestic matter.

Mr. MONTGOMERY said that the leaflet was, in fact, most political in character. The only thing non-political about the pamphlet was its title.

Mr. GREENE said that he was going to submit that the action was misconceived. It had been framed upon the Act and not upon the rules of the union.

His LORDSHIP said that counsel for the plaintiff should consider the point. If what was complained of was only a breach of the rules and not of the statute, it might be that he (his Lordship) had no jurisdiction.

Mr. MANNING said that section 3 (1) began with the prohibition against the funds of a trade union being applied, either directly or indirectly, in the furtherance of certain political objects, unless the furtherance of those objects had been approved by a certain resolution and unless rules were in force containing certain provisions. There must be implied in that a further condition that no moneys of the trade union, other than the political fund, should be expended in the furtherance of the specified political objects. That must have been the intention of the Legislature.

His LORDSHIP.—I agree. The Legislature, as a rule, discourages interference by the Court in domestic legislation, and the Legislature foresaw that there was a line between what is described as political and what is described as social, and it cut the knot by saying that if it was thought that the union was overstepping the mark and acting contrary to the rules one could go to the Registrar of Friendly Societies and he would decide whether it fell on one side of the line as a social matter or on the other side as a political matter. Otherwise it would take a week to go through these things and decide which, if any, of these matters was political and which non-political.

I cannot help thinking that the Legislature intended to make it a domestic matter and to leave it to a domestic tribunal to decide, because they left it so wide. But you say that I must treat this matter, notwithstanding that the conditions precedent have been complied with, as one in which there are these restrictions which should be enforced by injunction.

Mr. MANNING said that that was so. He pointed out that section 3 (2) of the Act said that if any member of a trade union alleged that he was aggrieved by a breach of any rule made in pursuance of the section he might complain to the Registrar of Friendly Societies. It might be that in many cases it would be only a breach of a rule, and in many cases a member of the trade union could only appeal to the Registrar. In this case, however, there was not only a breach of the rules made in pursuance of the section, but a violation of the prohibition in subsection 1.

His LORDSHIP.—Suppose there is a breach of any rule : a member must not complain of the rule, because that has been approved by the Registrar. Suppose the Registrar said that there was a breach in respect of the £3, and that the union must not, in future, contribute to the election expenses of any candidate : what step could be taken in this Court?

Mr. MANNING said that if the Registrar had made an order to remedy the breach of the rule the matter would have been at an end.

His LORDSHIP.—Here the Registrar said: "I make no order, because there has been no breach."

Mr. MANNING.—Many matters are brought before the Court other than those which were brought before the Registrar. I am endeavouring to establish that in certain cases what is complained of may be not only a breach of a rule, but also an infringement of the provisions in subsection 1. In one aspect, no doubt, there was a breach of the rules made by the defendant union, but in another aspect there was a breach of the provisions in the subsection. The complaint may be twofold.

His LORDSHIP.—Is not the only matter which is not provided for in this section the position of a man who wants to become a member of the union and who is met with this : that he must, as a condition of admission, agree to subscribe to the political fund? An action might lie on that part of the subject.

Mr. MANNING.—That is dealt with in section 3 (1) (b).

His LORDSHIP.—He has a statutory right to say that that is a breach which he can restrain by action, because it is not provided for by section 3 (2), which only deals with members. He is not a member, and recourse to this Court must be open to him.

Mr. MANNING said that, although the Registrar of Friendly Societies gave a reasoned judgment in the case in which the plaintiff complained, the Registrar was not bound to do so.

His LORDSHIP.—The Registrar could not compel anybody to come before him.

Mr. MANNING.—He determined the case as an arbitrator, with less powers than an arbitrator. Where you find a prohibition against the expenditure of funds, except political funds, that is a matter that this Court can deal with. A distinction can be drawn between the rules in many cases, breaches only being dealt with by the Registrar, but in this case infringements of the restrictions in section 3 (1) were involved.

His LORDSHIP.—That would be a matter of election, and the plaintiff did elect.

Mr. MANNING.—Only in regard to some of the matters taken before the Registrar. The scope of the case before your Lordship is much wider than that before the Registrar, and has to do with many documents which we say are political. It therefore covers fresh ground.

His LORDSHIP.—If you elect to go before one tribunal I do not see how you can go to another.

Mr. MANNING said that the general rule seemed to be clear that the jurisdiction of this Court was not taken away when a particular Act was silent on the subject or when the language was doubtful. The Registrar at the end of his judgment threw out the suggestion that the plaintiff could seek his remedy elsewhere, but that it was not his duty to advise him what course he should take.

Mr. MONTGOMERY here said that, in order to avoid any risk of the action being decided upon a point of pleading, he had come to the conclusion that he should ask his Lordship to give him leave to amend paragraph 6 of the statement of claim by adding some words after the word "indirectly."

The paragraph would then read:—

"The defendant union, contrary to the provisions of section 3 of the said Act, has, in conjunction with other trade unions, associations, or bodies, and indirectly, and contrary to the rules of the defendant union, made in pursuance of section 3 (1) (a), applied a part of its funds in the furtherance of the said defined political objects, and such payments have been made otherwise than out of the political fund of the defendant union."

His LORDSHIP.—That would show that the allegation was a breach of the rules, as well as a breach of the section. If that be so, and it is only a breach of the rules, it may be that I have no jurisdiction.

Mr. GREENE.—In ordinary circumstances I should not take an objection, but the circumstances of this case are not ordinary. Were it not for the fact that this action is being maintained in a particularly malignant manner by means of subscriptions raised through a newspaper of a distinctly political colour, I should not resist the application to amend, but in the circumstances I do resist it. On its merits it is an application which I submit ought to be refused. In the first case the plaintiff goes to the Registrar and says of the defendant union : "You have broken the rules." He fails in that, and then casts about to see what he can do. He says : "I will deliberately found my case on a different cause of action altogether," and, although it is pointed out in the defence what his cause of action ought to be, he deliberately does not amend, and now his counsel put in the forefront of their argument that his claim was not res judicata ; that it was not the same as before the Registrar. He (counsel) submitted that it was not open to his friends to amend after they had rejected and repudiated any suggestion that the plaintiff was suing on the rules.

Mr. MONTGOMERY said that he did not know what justification his friend had for the first statement he had made. In the interests of justice, and to prevent subsequent litigation and duplicate litigation, the amendment should be allowed, so that the case might be argued from both points of view.

His LORDSHIP.—Although the power to allow amendment is very wide, this amendment would set up an entirely new cause of action.

Mr. MONTGOMERY.—It is an additional cause of action. It is merely a point of law arising on identical facts, and it would be a pity to duplicate litigation, because that is what it means.

His LORDSHIP, in refusing the application to amend the statement of claim, said: I am very reluctant at any stage of the proceedings to refuse an application to amend, but in considering such an application the Court is bound to take into account the nature of the proposed amendment; the time at which the application is made, having regard to the antecedent steps in the action; and, in particular, the question whether the defendants may be materially prejudiced by allowing the amended matter to be introduced into the action and not into another action hereafter to be brought.

In this case the antecedent circumstances are such as to lead to the impression that the attitude which was adopted, and has been maintained down to the present moment, was not an attitude taken by inadvertence or through misapprehension.

The matter complained of in the action as it was constituted was a breach by the defendant union of the statutory restrictions alleged to be imposed upon the defendants, and still subsisting, in reference to the application of its funds; and the action was brought and has been conducted down to the present moment as an action to restrain the defendant union from committing, or continuing, a breach of those statutory restrictions. That is quite clear not only from the pleadings but also from the exhaustive argument addressed to me on the part of the plaintiff. Throughout, it has been maintained—and for that matter it is still maintained—that the plaintiff has a cause of action founded on a breach of statutory restrictions by the defendant union.

In the defence the pleader raised this case, that the statutory restrictions were no longer subsisting, and that such restrictions as were imposed on the union were not so imposed by statute, but by the rules adopted in pursuance of the requirements of the statute, and the plaintiff's only cause of action was founded on a breach of the rules.

It was quite obvious, continued his Lordship, that no one could have read the defence without appreciating that the line which the defendants were adopting was of that nature. Res judicata was argued on the footing that the relief sought here was not that sought before the Registrar of Friendly Societies; and it was only when the section came to be minutely examined that those acting on the part of the plaintiff applied for leave to make an amendment which would mean the substitution of another cause of action for the cause of action which the defendants in their pleading said was the only cause of action. I think that, in the face of those facts, it is difficult to say that the amendment is one which ought to be acceded to at this time.

With regard to the position of the defendants, the plaintiff, before he brought this action, elected to submit a substantial portion, but not the whole, of the matters upon which he relied to the adjudication of the Registrar of Friendly Societies. It is impossible to read the Act of 1913 without appreciating that if, in response to his application to the Registrar, the Registrar had come to the conclusion that there had been a breach of the particular rule, and had made an order for the remedying of that breach, the defendant union would have been compelled under the Act to obey that order. It would not have been open to them to take any proceedings in this Court to set the order aside, nor could the Court have entertained any application contrary to the decision of the Registrar. The plaintiff elected to take that course, and when he embarked on this action he had the advantage of knowing that, by the decision of the Registrar, there had not been a breach of the rules in question.

Having put the defendants in the position of possibly being subject to an order against which they could not appeal, the plaintiff, availing himself in this action of an alleged breach of the statute, has not framed his action so as to raise a question settled by the Registrar, and that has put the defendants in a very unfair position. They have had to run the risk of defending an application against which they could not appeal, and now have been brought to the Court to defend the action.

If I allowed the amendment they might again be put in peril in regard to many of the matters disposed of by the Registrar. I think, therefore, having regard to the circumstances that have taken place, to the matters which were within the knowledge of the plaintiff many months ago, and to the extent to which any amendment might prejudice the position of the defendants, that it is my duty not to allow the amendment.

His LORDSHIP then proceeded to give judgment on the case made by the pleadings.

He said: The plaintiff's claim to relief in this action is based on the alleged breach by the defendant union of the provisions of section 3 of the Trade Union Act, 1913. That this is so appears quite clear from paragraphs 4, 5, and 6 of the statement of claim. The first question which I have to decide is whether he has established any such breach. By subsection (1) of the section in question restrictions are imposed on the application of the funds of a trade union for the objects specified in subsection (3), unless the furtherance of those objects has been approved as an object of the union by a resolution of the nature mentioned in subsection (1) and unless rules approved by the Registrar of Friendly Societies are in force providing that any payments in furtherance of those objects are to be made out of a particular fund, referred to in the Act as the political fund of the union. It is also provided that any member may, by appropriate notice, claim and obtain exemption from any obligation to contribute to the political fund; and, putting it shortly, no prejudice, disability, or disadvantage is to attach to the non-contributing member, or any person intending to become a member, by reason of his claiming that exemption.

It is admitted that a valid resolution has been passed, and that rules approved by the Registrar of Friendly Societies providing for all and each of the matters referred to in paragraphs (a) and (b) of subsection (1) were, at the date of the writ, and still are, in force. In these circumstances all the conditions precedent have been complied with, and, in my opinion, the statutory restrictions have ceased to operate. I cannot accept the view that, by the wording of this section, any implication is raised that, after fulfilling all the conditions mentioned in the section, the restrictions still apply as statutory restrictions. On the contrary, it seems to be that from that time forward it was a question of the rules and not of the statute. The procedure adopted by the defendant union has been in accord with, and not in breach of, the Act, and no such cause of action as the plaintiff has advanced was subsisting when the writ was issued.

If the facts on which the plaintiff relies constitute a misapplication of the general funds of the defendant union, his cause of action is a breach of the rules, the rule in particular being rule 45, subrule 2. Now this appears to have been the plaintiff's own opinion when he first desired to raise the question, because, so soon as he became aware of the matters of which he complained, he availed himself of his statutory right under section 3 (2) of the Act and laid a complaint before the Registrar of Friendly Societies. In considering the case one must not omit to notice what was the effect of this procedure on the plaintiff's part so far as the defendant union was concerned. Had the complaint resulted in the Registrar's making an order for remedying the breach of which the plaintiff complained, the union would have had no alternative but to give effect to that order, the provisions of section 3 (2) making it quite clear that there would have been no appeal, and by no procedure in this Court could the union have evaded the duty statutorily imposed upon it of giving effect to that order.

Now the question, which is not really raised as the record stands in this action, except in so far as the plea of res judicata has been raised by the defence, is whether in these circumstances, even assuming that the plaintiff had brought this action on the footing that there had been a breach of the rules and not merely a breach of the Act, the plaintiff could have maintained this action. The Legislature has provided a remedy of which a member of a union may avail himself, and which, if he does avail himself of it, puts the union at the risk of being compelled to carry out, or to remedy, the matters of which he has complained. Did the Legislature contemplate that the complaining member, having carried in his complaint, and having failed to satisfy the Registrar that there was any proper foundation for it, was to be allowed to commence an action and seek relief in connexion with the same matters, exposing the union to further litigation? I very much doubt whether that is the position of the member.

According to the construction which I put on section 3 (2) of the Act, the Legislature contemplated that the matter, dealt with as it has now been dealt with by the rules, should be determined by the tribunal indicated in that subsection, and did not contemplate that it should be open to the member, after he had submitted the matter to the Registrar and had failed to convince the Registrar, to resort to the Courts. Whether the subsection left him entitled to elect whether he would go to the Registrar or to the Court has not been argued; but, assuming that there was such an option, it appears to me that this plaintiff adopted an attitude which showed what his election was, and that it is not open to him, having failed before the Registrar, to proceed by action in this Court. That does not arise on the pleadings as they stand.

The relief sought for in this action is not founded on any breach by the defendant union of the rules, but on an alleged breach of the statute; and, no such breach having been established, I have no alternative but to dismiss this action, and to dismiss it with costs.

DOUGHTY v. COMMISSIONER OF TAXES.*

Revenue—Income-tax—Capital sales and sales producing income—Distinction.

The appellant and a partner converted their partnership as drapers into a private limited company in which they were the sole shareholders. The Commissioner of Taxes claimed that the amount of £15,025, which was the difference between the value of their stock-in-trade as shown in their last balance-sheet and the value at which it was computed when the company took it over, was a profit assessable to income-tax.

Held, that if a business was one purely of buying and selling, a profit made by the sale of the whole of the stock, if it stood by itself, might well be assessable to income-tax, but that in the present case there was merely a slump transaction. The Crown was not entitled to take a bookkeeping entry as conclusive evidence of the existence of a profit, and the sum in question was not assessable to income-tax.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Appeal of New Zealand of March 31, 1926, reversing a decision of Chief Justice Stout.

Mr. A. M. Latter, K.C., Mr. Michael Myers, K.C. (of the New Zealand Bar), and Mr. Cyril L. King appeared for the appellant; Mr. Farwell, K.C., Mr. F. O. Langley, and Miss Joan Clarkson for the respondent.

Lord Phillimore, in delivering their Lordships' judgment, said:—This is an appeal from the judgment of the Court of Appeal of New Zealand reversing the decision of Chief Justice Stout on an application by the Commissioner of Taxes seeking to assess the appellant to income-tax in the sum of £6,010 in respect of income for the year ending March 31, 1921.

On the proceedings taken in respect of this assessment a case was stated by the Commissioner which, according to the practice in New Zealand, was traversable and was accordingly traversed by the present appellant in his answer, and the matter came in the first instance before a magistrate and was decided in favour of the Commissioner. His decision was, however, appealable both on grounds of fact and law to a Judge of the High Court, in this case Chief Justice Stout. The decision of the Chief Justice is final on fact, but not on a matter of law.

The circumstances are these. The appellant and one Arthur John George carried on business at Wellington as wholesale soft goods merchants and drapers in partnership. On June 25, 1920, they converted their partnership into a private limited company, of which they were the only two shareholders. The company had a nominal capital of £175,000 in £1 shares, 100,000 of which were ordinary, 25,000 were A preference shares, and 50,000 were B preference shares.

* Reported by Sir W. J. Soulsby, Barrister-at-Law.

The arrangement, which was embodied in an agreement dated June 25, 1920, was that the partners as vendors should sell to the company and the company should purchase as from January 20 then past, the goodwill of the business, the leaseholds, plant, machinery, book debts, the benefit of pending contracts, all cash bills and notes, and generally all property to which the vendors were entitled in connexion with the business.

Part of the consideration for the sale was the allotment to the vendors of £76,000 paid-up shares, £30,000 ordinary shares to George and £30,000 to the appellant, and £16,000 B preference shares to George. The residue of the consideration was the undertaking by the company to satisfy all the liabilities and engagements of the firm.

The vendors contracted not to carry on the business of a draper independently of the company, and they stated that they had in certain proportions subscribed the memorandum of association for all the 175,000 shares in the company, each thus according to his proportion rendering himself liable to that extent for the debts of the company.

The last balance-sheet of the old partnership stood as follows :—

Capital Account	48,774	12	0
Sundry creditors	10,366	17	5
Deposits at interest	2,238	7	6
Bills payable current ..	36,053	12	2
	£97,433	9	1

Furniture and fittings ..	513	18	4
Cash at bank	106	11	3
Cash on hand and customs	432	7	11
Sundry debtors	45,151	17	0
Bills receivable current ..	5,896	3	3
War loans	1,974	12	6
Stock in hand	43,357	18	10
	£97,433	9	1

This should be corrected in one respect, as £7,800 was due for unpaid income-tax, thereby reducing the capital account from £48,774 12s. 0d. to £40,974 12s. 0d.

The partners having fixed the price at which they sold, if it could be called a sale, their business to the company, it remained to adjust the figures on the last balance-sheet in accordance with this arrangement, £76,000 being evidently more than the sum standing to the credit of the capital account; and, in order to effect this, the item on the asset side "stock in hand £43,357 18s. 10d.," was replaced by an item "stock and goodwill £78,383 6s. 10d."

It appears from the evidence of the accountant who made out these accounts that he suggested that the figure for goodwill might be taken as £20,000, and that this view was accepted by the outgoing partners. This left as the residue of the item £58,383 6s. 10d., or £15,025 8s. 0d. as the difference between the value of the stock-in-trade as shown in the partners' last balance-sheet and the value of the stock-in-trade as it might be deemed to be taken over by the company; and the Commissioner for Taxes claimed that this was a profit and to levy income-tax upon it.

By the law of New Zealand each partner is severally liable to tax in respect of his share of the profits of a partnership, and the appellant Doughty's share of this supposed profit was fixed at £6,010, in respect of which he was assessed to income-tax as already stated.

The appellant puts his case in two ways. He says (1) that if the transaction is to be treated as a sale, there was no separate sale of the stock, and no valuation of the stock as an item forming part of the aggregate which was sold, and (2) that there was no sale at all but merely a readjustment of the business position of the two partners, and an application for their benefit of the law of New Zealand allowing the formation of private companies with limited liability.

Income-tax being a tax upon income, it is well established that the sale of a whole concern which can be shown to be a sale at a profit as compared with the price given for the business, or at which it stands in the books, does not give rise to a profit taxable to income-tax.

It is easy enough to follow out this doctrine where the business is one wholly or largely of production. In a dairy-farming business or a sheep-rearing business, where the principal objects are the production of milk and calves or wool and lambs, though there are also sales from time to time of the parent stock, a clearance or realization sale of all the stock in connexion with the sale and winding-up of the business gives no indication of the profit (if any) arising from income; and the same might be said of a manufacturing business which was sold with the leaseholds and plant, even if there were added to the sale the piece goods in stock, and even if those piece goods formed a very substantial part of the aggregate sold.

Where, however, a business consists, as in the present case, entirely in buying and selling, it is more difficult to distinguish between an ordinary and a realization sale, the object in either case being to dispose of goods at a higher price than that given for them, and thus to make a profit out of the business. The fact that large blocks of stock are sold does not render the profit obtained anything different in kind from the profit obtained by a series of gradual and smaller sales. This might even be the case if the whole stock was sold out in one sale. Even in the case of a realization sale, if there were an item which could be traced as representing the stock sold, the profit obtained by that sale, though made in conjunction with a sale of the whole concern, might conceivably be treated as taxable income.

But upon the evidence in this case, it would appear that no such separate sale was effected. It was a transfer of all the assets of the partnership for 76,000 shares, some preference, some ordinary, all taken at their face value of £1 each, with an obligation, measured by a number of shares not paid up, to discharge the liabilities of the partnership. If these several items were not worth £76,000, then the shares were not worth their face value. Then as the vendors were the takers of the shares, they would gain nothing. They may have estimated in June that their stock was in the previous January worth more than the sum at which it had been put in their balance-sheet, but they did not, by so estimating it, make it more.

So far as the matter is a question of fact, the judgment of the Chief Justice was conclusive, and, if the question be to any extent a question of law, their Lordships desire to express their agreement with the conclusion drawn by the Chief Justice.

The authorities to which their Lordships have been referred, when carefully examined, show where the distinction is to be drawn between capital sales and sales producing income.

Some of these authorities are cases in which a company is dealing with land. In Miramar Land Company, Limited v. Commissioner of Taxes (26

N.Z.L.R., 723), decided in the year 1907, a company was formed for the purpose of dealing in land ; and it acquired one property, of which it immediately sold a small portion, and a few months afterwards sold the rest in one block, and then it went into liquidation. It was held that the business of the company was one of dealing in land, and that the profit ultimately acquired was none the less a profit upon dealing, because when the last part of the profit was acquired, the company ceased from carrying on business.

So in the case of Californian Copper Syndicate v. Harris (5 Tax Cas., 159), decided in 1904, a company formed to buy copper-bearing land in County California, bought the land for cash, improved it, and then re-sold it in two portions to the Fresno Company for 300,000 shares of the nominal value of £1 each. The whole capital of the Fresno Company was 400,000 shares, of which 75,000 were subscribed for in cash, 300,000 went to the Californian Company, and 25,000 were unallotted. It was held that the transaction was a sale in the line of the company's business, resulting in a profit, and not a mere change in the mode of investment, and therefore that the profit was taxable to income-tax. In that case the Primary Commissioners said that it seemed clear to them that the property had been bought in order to be sold.

On the other hand, in Tebrau (Johore) Rubber Syndicate, Limited, v. Farmer (5 Tax Cas., 658), decided in 1910, this case was distinguished, and the particular transaction in this latter case was held to be a case of appreciation of capital and not one resulting in a profit taxable to income-tax. The facts were that the company was formed to purchase land in Malay and develop it by cultivating rubber trees. Two estates were bought, and much planting had been done ; but the capital was insufficient, and the undertaking was (after existing for rather more than a year) sold to a second company (the old company being wound up). The consideration for the sale was £2,500 in cash and 36,000 £1 shares of the new company. It was held that the first company was not formed to deal in land as a business, and that this was a case of realization of an investment.

Then there are some difficult cases where the business is anent breeding stock. In the Australian case of Commissioner of Taxation for Western Australia v. Newman (29 Commonwealth L.R., 484), decided in 1921, a pastoralist put an end to his business and sold the whole station with stock and plant as a going concern, and it was held that the transaction was not the carrying-on of a business but the winding-up of a business, and that the profit made on the winding-up was not a profit taxable as income ; and in another Australian case, Hickman v. Federal Commissioner of Taxation (31 Commonwealth L.R., 232), decided in 1922, another pastoralist who put an end to his business and sold his property, with all the improvements and the cattle upon it, was held not to be liable to the war-time profits tax in respect of the moneys realized by the sale of his cattle, even though in that case a separate price was realized for the cattle. It is stated in the judgment of Chief Justice Stout that these cases have been since covered by legislation.

In the case of Anson v. Commissioner of Taxes ([1922] N.Z.L.R., 330) the view of the Court was that Anson, who carried on a sheep farm, was carrying it on as a dealer in buying and selling sheep, and the Court said : "Every individual animal (with the negligible exception of the rams kept for breeding purposes) is part of the taxpayer's stock-in-trade. It is true that he does not, while his business is carried on, sell all of his stock-in-trade at once ; he always retains a part thereof. But in this respect his business is not different from that of other merchants. In the case of most trades it is only when the business is wound up or transferred that the entire stock-in-trade is disposed of. Normally a trader retains and carries over to the succeeding year a standard quantity of stock. But this permanent quantity does not for that reason cease to be stock-in-trade. . . ." This being so in the view of the Court, it did not make any difference whether the stock-in-trade was sold progressively or all at once by way of clearing sale or otherwise in connexion with a transfer or a winding-up of the business. Whether his profit was derived from a single sale of all his stock-in-trade at once, or from repeated sales in the ordinary way of his business, his profit was taxable income, and was assessable accordingly.

In that case the item of profit was arrived at by taking the value of the stock as it stood in Dr. Anson's books for one year and comparing it with the same item of value in the previous year, and it seems to have been assumed that this particular piece of farming could be treated by itself, and that all the items of buying and selling of animals and profits, if any, from sale of wool, with the per contra items of wages and fodder and such like, could be taken as balancing each other, so that the difference between the values of the sheep stock in the two years represented the actual profit.

It would be difficult to arrive at the profit in this way if it were the case of a farmer in England ; but the trade of a pastoralist is one with which the New Zealand Courts would be familiar, and which it would be more easy for the New Zealand Judges than for their Lordships to appreciate.

The reported cases on this branch of income-tax law are so involved in detail that it is not always easy to see on which side of the line they fall. The case of Commissioner of Taxes v. Melbourne Trust, Limited (30 The Times L.R., 685 ; [1914] A.C., 1001), is an authority for holding that in certain cases what seems like a distribution of assets is in truth an application of profits. The case, however, nearest the present is that of J. and M. Craig (Kilmarnock), Limited v. Cowperthwaite ([1914] S.C., 338). There, on a transference from one company to another, one-third of the value of each item, other than stock-in-trade, as it stood in the books of the selling company, was treated as its value for transfer purposes, and the balance of a slump price, which, with an undertaking to discharge liabilities, formed the consideration, was inferentially attributable to the stock. It was held, however, in that case that no sum could be pitched upon as the actual price of the stock, and no claim to assess a profit could be based upon such a foundation.

Their Lordships would repeat that if a business be one of purely buying and selling, like the present, a profit made by the sale of the whole of the stock, if it stood by itself, might well be assessable to income-tax ; but their view of the facts (if it be open to them to consider the facts) is the same as that of Chief Justice Stout—that is, that this was a slump transaction.

The other ground on which the appellant's case may rest is that the transaction which led to the claim for tax was not a sale whereby any profit accrued to the two partners. The case of Craig (supra) is an authority for saying that the Crown is not entitled to take a mere bookkeeping entry as conclusive evidence of the existence of a profit. The two partners made no money by the mere process of having their stock-in-trade valued at a high rate when they transferred it to a company consisting of their two selves.

If they over-estimated the value of the stock, the value of the several shares became less. The capital of the company would be to this extent watered. As already observed, they could not, by over-estimating the value of the assets, make them more.

Their Lordships will humbly advise his Majesty that this appeal should be allowed, and that the judgment of Chief Justice Stout should be restored, and that the appellants should have the costs below and of this appeal.

Prob., Divorce, and Adm. Div. (Hill, J.) } 1927. Jan. 14.

THE JUPITER.*

Ship—Foreign ship in English port—Action for possession—Foreign parties—Writ in rem—Comity of nations—Immunity of foreign sovereign State from jurisdiction—Declaration of foreign sovereign State as to facts—Whether conclusive.

In an action between foreign parties for the possession of a foreign ship, which had been arrested in a British port, the defendants put forward a declaration made by the representative in this country of a foreign sovereign State asserting that the vessel at the material time was the property of that foreign sovereign State and had been sold by it to the defendants. It was contended that such a declaration was conclusive of the facts therein stated.

Held, that where such a declaration was not made for the purpose of securing the immunity of the foreign sovereign State from jurisdiction, it was not conclusive, and the Court was at liberty to investigate the truth of the facts therein stated.

This action was brought by the Compagnie Russe de Navigation à Vapeur et de Commerce, and Messieurs Claude M. A. A. E. Bourgeois, and Leonidas Tcheloff and Gregoire Margoline, on behalf of themselves and others, trading as the Compagnie Russe de Navigation à Vapeur et de Commerce, for a declaration that they were the owners of the steamship Jupiter, for possession thereof, or, alternatively, for judgment for the value of the vessel and damages. The action was brought in rem. The Cantiere Olivo Società Anonima, an Italian firm, had entered an appearance to the writ, but the defence was really conducted by and on behalf of the Union of Socialist Soviet Republics.

The facts were shortly as follow:—The Compagnie Russe, under its Russian name of "Ropit," carried on business in Russia before the revolution, having a head office in Petrograd, its ships being registered at Odessa. In 1917 the head office was transferred to Odessa. At the beginning of 1919 the business was apparently moved to France, and the ships traded from Marseilles. After a time issues arose between the company and its shipmasters, with the result that the French Courts appointed an administrator, and to this office the plaintiff Bourgeois eventually succeeded.

In September, 1922, owing to the general depression of the shipping industry, the Jupiter was laid up at Dartmouth in the charge of the master, a Captain Lépine. In March, 1924, while the vessel was so laid up, the master handed her over to the representatives in London of the Soviet Government. That step, he told the Court, was taken from patriotic motives. The plaintiffs alleged that he was influenced by bribes or threats.

In those circumstances an action was instituted in the Admiralty Division by the Compagnie Russe, claiming possession of the Jupiter. The Soviet Government, who defended the action, successfully pleaded "sovereign rights and privileges," and Mr. Justice Hill, on May 29, 1924, set aside the writ and stayed all proceedings in the action on the ground that the Jupiter was a Russian ship, and that the Russian Government, having asserted property in the vessel and declared its unwillingness to submit to the jurisdiction, could not be impleaded in the British Courts (The Jupiter, 40 The Times L.R., 673).

On July 17, 1924, the Court of Appeal upheld the judgment of Mr. Justice Hill (40 The Times L.R., 815; [1924] P., 236).

The Russian Government claimed to be the owners of the vessel under a decree for the nationalization of Russian merchant ships, and also asserted that the plaintiff company had no legal existence by reason of the operation of a Soviet decree for the liquidation of Russian private companies.

In September, 1924, the Arcos Steamship Company, Limited, on behalf of the Soviet Government, sold the Jupiter to an Italian company, the Cantiere Olivo Società Anonima. On October 8, 1924, the plaintiffs issued the writ in the present action, claiming against the Italian purchasers a declaration that the plaintiffs were the lawful owners of the vessel and that possession should be given to them, or, alternatively, judgment for the value of the ship, and damages.

The Soviet Government at once moved to stay proceedings in this action also, but the President, Lord Merrivale, who was upheld on appeal by the Court of Appeal (The Jupiter (No. 2), 41 The Times L.R., 321; [1925] P., 69), dismissed the motion, holding that the Russian State was not impleaded by the action, which was against an Italian company, and that the Admiralty Court had jurisdiction to entertain a claim by one foreigner against another foreigner for possession of a foreign ship that was within the territorial jurisdiction.

Mr. G. P. Langton, K.C., and Mr. K. S. Carpmael appeared for the plaintiffs; Mr. C. R. Dunlop, K.C., Mr. H. C. S. Dumas, and Mr. H. Murphy for the defendants.

Mr. Justice Hill.—In this action the plaintiffs claim possession of the steamship Jupiter. The ship at the date of the writ and arrest was lying at Dartmouth. The writ was originally issued in the name of the Compagnie de Navigation à Vapeur et de Commerce, which was stated in the writ to be a corporate body according to the laws of France, with their head office at 255, Rue St. Honoré, Paris. By subsequent amendments, three persons were added as plaintiffs, M. Bourgeois, M. Tcheloff, and M. Margoline, who were expressed to be suing on behalf of themselves and others, trading as the Compagnie Russe de Navigation à Vapeur et de Commerce. Appearance was entered by an Italian company—the Cantiere Olivo Società Anonima. The defence has been conducted in the name of that company by representatives of the Union of Socialist Soviet Republics, commonly known, and hereinafter referred to, as the U.S.S.R. Three main questions have to be determined : first, whether the plaintiffs, or any of them, have given any authority to sue ; secondly, whether the plaintiffs, or any of them, had and have any such title to, or interest in, the ship as to give them the right to maintain an action of possession. The burden of those two issues is upon the plaintiffs. The burden of the third issue is upon the defendants. The third question is, assuming that any of the plaintiffs would otherwise have had any such title or interest, whether its acquisition has not been prevented, or its enjoyment destroyed, by a change in the property in the ship by virtue of Governmental Acts of the U.S.S.R., or its predecessors in sovereignty, the Italian company resting its right upon a transfer from the U.S.S.R., as owners, and alleging that the Jupiter had become the property of the U.S.S.R. The first question was raised upon motion to set aside the writ, and was referred by the Court of Appeal to this Court. Now that the facts have been ascertained, it is clear that no retainer has been given by the first-named plaintiffs. There is no such corporate body according to the laws of France as the Compagnie Russe de Navigation à Vapeur et de Commerce. There is, or was, a corporate body of which the head office and seat of control were in Petrograd, under a style of which the French title is a translation, known for short as Ropit. It never established a branch in France ; see the French decree of April 23, 1925. It was in controversy whether it is an existing corporation. If it is non-existing, it cannot sue. If it is existing it has given no authority to sue. The name of the Compagnie Russe de Navigation à Vapeur et de Commerce ought to be struck out of the writ as a separate plaintiff. A retainer by Messrs. Bourgeois, Tcheloff, and Margoline was not disputed. Affidavits were filed by each of them. This disposes of the question referred to the Court by the Court of Appeal.

I now pass to the issues in the case, and first as to the right of the remaining plaintiffs to sue, either on their own account or in a representative capacity. So far as is necessary for this part of the case, the facts are as follow :—In 1917 the Jupiter was one of a fleet of steamers owned by the Petrograd company —Ropit. The ships were registered at Odessa, and the management of them was entrusted to a managing director stationed at Odessa. In December, 1917, the Jupiter was at Odessa (see evidence of Alexieff), and was there also on January 26, 1918, and March 4, 1918, and remained there till April 9, 1919 (see admissions under date June 4, 1926). I am not quite sure that she was not there throughout all that period, but those are the specific dates mentioned in the evidence. I shall have later on to consider what was the political position of Odessa between November, 1917, and March, 1918 ; but for the present purpose it is enough to say that there was no settled form of Government there at that time. From March, 1918, to October or November, 1918, Odessa was in the occupation of the Austrians. From October or November, 1918, to April, 1919, Odessa was in the occupation of the French, together with General Denikin. On April 9, 1919, the Jupiter went to Constanza and thence to the United Kingdom, and thence to America (see evidence of Alexieff). She was never again in a Russian port (admissions under date June 4, 1926). Between August 28, 1920, and September 30, 1920, she was lying at Bordeaux (see admissions under date July 16, 1926). Except for this period she does not appear to have been in any French port. From Bordeaux she made a voyage to America and thence to the United Kingdom (see evidence of Lépine). She arrived in the United Kingdom in December, 1920, and was then laid up at Plymouth until September, 1922, and at Dartmouth from September, 1922, until March, 1924. On February 1, 1924, his Majesty's Government recognized the U.S.S.R. as the de jure rulers of those territories of the old Russian Empire which acknowledged their authority. On March 9, 1924, Jacob Lépine, who had been master of the Jupiter since August 30, 1920 (see his affidavit), handed the ship's papers to representatives in England of the U.S.S.R., and the U.S.S.R. took actual possession of the ship. Then followed a writ in rem for possession, which was set aside on the ground that it impleaded the U.S.S.R. (The Jupiter, 40 The Times L.R., 673, 815 ; [1924] P., 236). The Jupiter remained in the actual possession of the U.S.S.R., and in September, 1924, a contract of sale of the ship was entered into between the Arcos Steamship Company, Limited, and the Cantiere Olivo Società Anonima. The Arcos Steamship Company, Limited, was acting on behalf of the U.S.S.R. By this contract the Arcos Company guaranteed the buyers against claims by third parties. Actual possession was transferred to the buyers. On October 8, 1924, while the Jupiter still lay at Dartmouth, a claim for the return of the ship was made by the plaintiffs on the Cantiere Olivo Società Anonima, and was refused (see admissions under date June 14 and 18, 1926). The writ in the present action was issued on the same day.

When the Jupiter left Odessa in April, 1919, a number of other ships, which formed part of the Ropit Fleet, left at the same time. A number of them proceeded to France. By the summer of 1920 some persons were carrying on business in France under the style of Ropit, or of its French equivalent—the Cie. Russe de Navigation à Vapeur et de Commerce. They were managing from an office in Marseilles the Ropit ships which had left Odessa. I was given no precise information as to who those persons were. It would appear from the decrees of the French Courts that they included some who were shareholders in the Petrograd company, and the names of a few such shareholders were given by M. Bourgeois in his evidence. It would also appear from the decrees that Admiral Kanine was taking an active part in the management (see especially the decree of September 23, 1921, at page 35 of copy decrees). According to the evidence of M. Kriloff, Admiral Kanine had been a director of the Petrograd company. M. Alexieff, in his evidence, spoke of the management of the ships being in Admiral Kanine, under authority of Mr. Lefter, who had been managing director at Odessa of the Petrograd company, and who at about this time appears to have been carrying on business in the name of Ropit, at Sebastopol, then in occupation of General Wrangel. The French decree of December 3, 1920, throws doubt upon the authority of Admiral Kanine as derived from Mr. Lefter. All I can say is that there were in France a number of persons actually carrying on business under the name of the company, and actually managing the ships. The managing office was at Marseilles. There was also an office at Paris, which I gather was the head office. These persons had no communication with Petrograd, and did not act under any orders from any one in Petrograd. Nor did they recognize the authority of the Soviet Republics. Jacob Lépine was appointed master of the Jupiter on August 30, 1920 (see his affidavit). He had been in the service of Ropit for 26 years. He had left Odessa in another Ropit ship, the Possadinky (see his evidence), and the French decree of June 8, 1920, shows that he was still master of that ship as late as June 8, 1920. It was not in so many words stated in evidence by whom he was appointed to the Jupiter. It is rather unfortunate that, instead of the master being called before me on the trial of this case, use was made of his affidavit, and there was cross-examination of him upon the original motion on the first application, and a cross-examination, of course, which was not directed to many of the points which called for elucidation when it came to the final trial of the case ; but I must make the best of the material I have got from him. He said that at Marseilles he was ordered to take over the command. Alexieff, who was appointed chief engineer of the Jupiter in September, 1920, said that he was appointed by the Marseilles office of Ropit. Lépine said that he was paid by the Direction in Paris. A number of his receipts were put in, dating from May, 1921, to March, 1924. They relate to payments for wages, food, allowances, and other laying-up charges. They read, "Received from the Marseilles office of the Russian Steam Navigation and Trading Company." I do not know whether they were copies or originals, as they were receipts given to a firm of agents in England.

Mr. Dunlop.—My friend reminds me that the originals were here in Russian, and I think we gave your Lordship the translations.

Mr. Justice Hill.—Then the receipts from the Marseilles office of the Russian Steam Navigation and Trading Company are a translation. On May 13, 1922, he signed an agreement adopting an agreement concluded in Marseilles on March 1, 1922, and expressed to be "between the Board of Ropit and the staff of the steamers." All I can definitely say is that Lépine was appointed master of the Jupiter by persons carrying on business in France under the style of Ropit or its French equivalent, and until March, 1924, he was paid by, and acted under the orders of, those persons, or of persons in France appointed under the French decrees to be presently mentioned. This at any rate is clear, that he was not appointed by the Petrograd office of Ropit, or by any one having the authority of the Petrograd company, if the Petrograd company still existed in 1920, nor was his appointment ever ratified and adopted by the Petrograd company. It is also clear that until the U.S.S.R. took possession in March, 1924, Lépine was in no sense the servant of the U.S.S.R.—he was not appointed or paid or controlled by it.

It is in my opinion important to understand the position of Lépine. One point made for the defendants was that the person in possession of the Jupiter in March, 1924, was Captain Lépine. This was put in different ways. One suggestion was that having been appointed master by the Petrograd company, and being unable to communicate with his principals, he possessed as negotiorum gestor of the Petrograd company. This suggestion falls to the ground when it is found that he never was appointed to the Jupiter by the Petrograd company. Another suggestion was that at common law the master of a ship has possession of it, as a bailee. Mr. Dunlop cited Moore v. Robinson (2 B. and Ad., 817), which accepted and applied Pitts v. Gaince (1 Salkeld, 10). But at the present day it is, in my opinion, impossible to regard the master as the bailee of a ship. In former days, when the master on a foreign voyage passed altogether beyond the control of the owners, and perhaps sold the outward cargo and brought a homeward cargo on owners' account, it might be possible to regard him as bailee of ship and cargo. Similarly, in the seventeenth century, the master seems to have been treated as the employer of the crew and responsible for the wages of the crew, and to have been responsible for their negligence (see Marsden, 6th Edition, page 63, note (e)). But to the conditions of modern commerce these considerations are quite inapplicable. The point is discussed by Pollock and Wright on Possession in the Common Law, at pages 60 and 138-9. After stating the rule that where an owner delivers a thing to a servant to be by him kept, used, carried or applied in the course of his employment as a servant . . . the master's possession continues, they add "it may be that it will sometimes as against strangers be treated as a possession in cases where the servant's charge is to be executed at a distance from the master and where the manner of the execution is necessarily left in a great degree to the discretion of the servant."

In my judgment, Captain Lépine never was in possession of the Jupiter nor had he at any time the right to possession. He was a custodian merely. The person for whom he was custodian was in actual possession. The question is for whom was Captain Lépine custodian ? This brings me to the decrees of the French Tribunals. It is by virtue of these decrees that Messrs. Bourgeois, Tcheloff, and Margoline contend that they had actual possession, and the right to possession, of the Jupiter in March, 1924, when, as they say, their servant, the master, wrongfully allowed the representatives of the U.S.S.R. to take possession. Lépine, as I have said, became master of the Jupiter on August 30, 1920. Four days later, on September 3, 1920, upon his application, the Commercial Tribunal of Marseilles appointed Maître Pelen "provisional administrator with power and mandate to watch over the interests of the Compagnie Russe de Navigation à Vapeur et de Commerce in the exploitation of the Jupiter." The Jupiter at the time was at Bordeaux, and not at Marseilles. Some question was raised before me as to the jurisdiction of the Marseilles Court, but upon the evidence I am satisfied that the decree of the Marseilles Court would be recognized as binding in France. A similar order had been made on June 8, 1920, with regard to six other Ropit ships, including the Possadinky, of which Lépine was the master, and it would appear from later decrees that similar orders were made with regard to other Ropit ships. There were a number of subsequent decrees, but the decree of August 30, 1920, was the only one made while the Jupiter was in France. The effect of these later decrees may be summarized as follows. I think it would be well to go through them, though it may be that the rights of the plaintiffs, if any, depend upon the decree of August 13. On October 3, 1920, Admiral Schramschenko and others, including Admiral Kanine, claiming to act in the name and on behalf of the Compagnie Russe de Navigation à Vapeur et de Commerce moved to set aside the decrees obtained by the masters of thirteen ships (of which the Jupiter was not named as one), but the Court rejected the motion and confirmed Maître Pelen as provisional administrator, and directed that he should consult with Admiral Kanine, and if necessary form a shareholders' committee of inspection. On appeal, the Court of Appeal, on June 20, 1921, confirmed this decree. On August 9, 1921, on the motion of John Cockerill, Limited, as creditors of the Compagnie Russe de Navigation à Vapeur et de Commerce, the Commercial Tribunal of Marseilles extended the powers of Maître Pelen as administrator of the ships (including by name the Jupiter) and extended his administration to other property of the company outside Russian territory. This decree was expressed to be made "in order to provide for the payment of the creditors of the company and the protection of the interests both of the navigating staff and the shareholders." On August 12, 1921, the Commercial Tribunal of Marseilles, by decree reciting inter alia that the Tribunal had appointed Maître Pelen provisional administrator of the ships, appointed M. Jaujon administrator with Maître Pelen. In his application Maître Pelen had included the Jupiter in the list of ships of which he was provisional administrator. On September 23, 1921, there came before the Commercial Tribunal at Marseilles a number of applications to vary the decrees of August 9, 1921, and August 12, 1921. These applications were on the part (1) of the captains interested, (2) of Admiral Kanine, (3) of the members of the Committee of Inspection which it appears had been constituted on January 28, 1921. Maître Pelen, M. Jaujon, and John Cockerill, Ltd., were also parties. The Jupiter is one of the ships enumerated in the judgment. A decree was made confirming Messrs. Pelen and Jaujon as "provisional administrators of the Ropit, but to discontinue their functions on the reconstruction of the said company," and directing them to form a board of directors to take the place of the Committee of Inspection, the board to be composed of the two provisional administrators, one member to be chosen by the captains of the ships, and two members to be chosen by shareholders. The board was given the widest powers, and especially those enumerated in the decree of August 9, 1921, and one of the provisional administrators was to be a party to all financial engagements and important transactions. Then follows a group of decrees of June 13, 1922, January 3, 1923, and January 25, 1923, the effect of which is that a M. Batellet was directed to be substituted for Messrs. Pelen and Jaujon as provisional administrator. From these decrees it appears that M. Tcheloff had been appointed by the captains as a member of the board of directors, and Messrs. Brodsky and Margoline had been appointed by the shareholders. The decree of January 25, 1923, conferred on M. Batellet all the powers conferred on Maître Pelen by the decree of August 9, 1921, and did away with the board of directors. From the recitals of the next decree it appears that in fact M. Batellet never acted, and that Messrs. Pelen and Jaujon continued to act as provisional administrators, and that Messrs. Tcheloff, Brodsky, and Margoline were anxious to continue as members of a board of directors. The decree is dated April 10, 1923. It appoints M. Bourgeois provisional administrator, in place of M. Batellet, of the property situated outside Russian territory of Ropit, and declares that the board of directors, consisting of the provisional administrator and of the Russian members appointed either by the shareholders or by the captains, shall have the fullest powers as regards the management of the affairs of the company, and in particular those referred to in the judgment of August 9, 1921, but the provisional administrator is to be a party to all financial engagements and important transactions. This is the last of the decrees before March, 1924. It is, however, necessary to add that on April 23, 1925, the U.S.S.R. applied to the Commercial Tribunal at Marseilles to cancel the decree of April 10, 1923, and allow the U.S.S.R. to retake possession of the vessels of Ropit. This was refused and the refusal was confirmed by the Court of Appeal on December 23, 1925. I mention this decree because the recital states that the provisional administration was for the purposes of attending to the interests of the shareholders of Ropit and the members of the crews, and to safeguard the interests of creditors, until it is possible for the legal owners of the property of Ropit to re-enter into possession of their property. I should add that M. Bourgeois was still provisional administrator in March, 1924, and so continues. Of the three elected directors, M. Brodsky is dead. But M. Tcheloff and M. Margoline were directors in March, 1924, and so continue. M. Bourgeois gave evidence before me. He said that he administered the Jupiter as he did the other ships; he paid the wages, &c.; he rendered his accounts annually to the Court. It appears from the decrees themselves that the provisional administrator was accountable to the Court.

What is the effect of the decrees as to the possession of the Jupiter? On this point I had the benefit of the evidence of French advocates. M. Allenes, called by plaintiffs, had no doubt that a provisional administrator has legal possession of property which he has to administer. He said that the decree of September 3, 1920, gave the administrator legal possession of the Jupiter. He said that the later decrees had the same effect. But these were made at a time when the Jupiter was not in France. The decree of September 3, 1920, was made while the Jupiter was in France. There may be difficulties in this Court's recognizing a right to possession given by a French Court to a ship which was neither French nor in French territory, and which never after the right was conferred came within French territory. But no such difficulty arises as to a decree made while the ship was in the jurisdiction of the Court which made it. If M. Allenes' view of French law is right, the decree of September 3, 1920, gave Maître Pelen the legal possession, the right to possession, of the Jupiter. M. Duhamel, called by the defendants, did not contradict this evidence of M. Allenes. He said that the decrees did not pass the property to the administrator. No one had suggested that they did. Indeed the decrees all proceed upon the assumption that the original company was still existing and that the property was in it, and they provide for administration until the legal owners re-enter into possession. Apart from the evidence of the French lawyers, I should be of opinion that the effect of the decree of September 3, 1920, was to give the appointed administrator the right to possession of that which he was to administer—namely, the ship. I know not how else he was to administer it. I infer from the decrees that there was some controversy between the masters of the ships and the persons carrying on the business in France, and that the administrator was at first appointed to prevent those persons from dealing with the ships as they chose. Afterwards the interest of creditors and shareholders was considered, and the conflicting claims of the masters and the shareholders were met by entitling each to appoint directors to assist the administrator. But throughout the administrator was maintained, under appointment by the Court, and was answerable to it, and all attempts to get rid of a judicial administration of the ships were rejected by the Court. I hold that the decree of September 3, 1920, gave to Maître Pelen the right to possession of the Jupiter, and that this was a possession on his own account and not as agent for the Petrograd company or anyone else. It was a possession under the Court. The administrator was appointed by the Court, could only be discharged by the Court, rendered accounts to the Court, and was answerable to the Court for his administration. His possession was none the less his own possession because it was for the purpose of preserving the ship for the true owners. Maître Pelen continued to be sole administrator until August 12, 1921. From that date to the appointment of M. Bourgeois on April 10, 1923, he and M. Jaujon were co-administrators. This covers the period of the Jupiter's voyage from Bordeaux to America and thence to the United Kingdom, and her laying up at Plymouth and transfer to Dartmouth, and part of the time she lay there. For the rest of the time at Dartmouth up to March, 1924, M. Bourgeois was administrator. If I must give effect to the decree of September 3, 1920, I think I must equally give effect to the later decrees so far as they merely substitute one person for another as administrator. It seems to me that the jurisdiction of the French Court to make such substitution does not depend on whether the Jupiter was or was not in France at the time they were made. If I am wrong in this, the difficulty would be removed by the addition of Maître Pelen as a plaintiff, in the alternative. The legal position would in that case be this : right to possession of Maître Pelen under the decree of September 3, 1920, and ship in custody of those who at his request were appointed to exercise his rights, because the substitution is made at the instance of M. Pelen. The point is, therefore, one of form and not of substance. The result is that I hold that M. Bourgeois was entitled to possession of the Jupiter in 1924. If so, it is not of much importance whether the right to possession belonged to M. Bourgeois only or to M. Bourgeois jointly with Messrs. Tcheloff and Margoline. The evidence of the French lawyers was not, I think, directed to this point. On the whole I have come to the conclusion, with some doubt, that the right of possession was in M. Bourgeois only. It follows that the custody of Captain Lépine was for M. Bourgeois, as it had previously been for Maître Pelen. Captain Lépine was under the orders of and paid by the administrator for the time being, and was custodian of the ship for him. He was the servant of the administrator. Whom else could he have sued for his wages, who else could have dismissed him ? If he had incurred liabilities for necessaries on account of the ship, who else but the administrator would have been liable in personam ? If all this that I have just now said does not apply to the administrator alone it applies to the administrator together with the other members of the Board—namely, Tcheloff and Margoline. But, as I have said, I think it is the administrator alone. The practical effect is just the same in my view, whatever the rights of M. Bourgeois alone were, or those of Bourgeois, Tcheloff, and Margoline ; it is a mere question, who recovers the judgment ? It is quite enough for the plaintiffs if one recovers, or if all three, if they are entitled to recover.

The result of these considerations is that in March, 1924, when Lépine allowed the U.S.S.R. to take possession of the ship, M. Bourgeois was in actual possession and had the right to possession. Lépine may have acted as a loyal subject of the U.S.S.R, but he betrayed his trust to his employers. Prima facie the act of Lépine was wrongful. Prima facie M. Bourgeois, who had possession in fact and law, was wrongfully deprived of possession in fact. Prima facie M. Bourgeois is entitled to recover possession. His right does not depend merely upon a right to sue given by the French decrees. It depends upon possession, and right to possession, in England, and wrongful dispossession in England, and the ship is under the arrest of this Court. When this fact—possession and right to possession in this country—is grasped, a good deal of the argument as to the right to sue, based upon a consideration of the cases of Russian Commercial and Industrial Bank v. Comptoir d'Escompte de Mulhouse and Others (40 The Times L.R., 837 ; [1925] A.C., 112) ; Banque Internationale de Commerce de Petrograd v. Goukassow (40 The Times L.R., 837; [1925] A.C., 150); and of Employers' Liability Assurance Corporation v. Sedgwick, Collins and Company (42 The Times L.R., 749 ; [1927] A.C., 95), is not material. If M. Bourgeois had possession, and the right to possession, here, and was dispossessed here, there can be no question as to his right to sue here. Judgment must be pronounced in his favour, unless the Cantiere Olivo Società Anonima can show that the U.S.S.R., who sold the ship to them, had a superior title. It is upon the title of the U.S.S.R. that the Cantiere depend. It is not said the Petrograd company is still the owner of the Jupiter, or that it, as owner, has a superior title to the possessory title of M. Bourgeois, or that the condition of the French decrees, viz., the re-entry of the Petrograd company into possession, has been fulfilled. The defendants' case is that before March, 1924, the Petrograd company had ceased to exist, and that all its property, including the Jupiter, had passed to the U.S.S.R.

Before I deal with that part of the case, it will be well to dispose of the suggestion that, apart from a right by virtue of the French decrees, Messrs. Bourgeois, Tcheloff, and Margoline are in some way entitled to sue in a representative capacity. I am unable to find any facts on which such a claim can be based. Before I can recognize such a claim, I must know whom they represent and find that the persons they represent were entitled to possession of the Jupiter. But the evidence leaves me very much in the dark. I know that there were some shareholders of the Petrograd company in France, but have no satisfactory evidence who they were. And I have nothing upon which I can find that they had or were entitled to possession. Indeed, the main contention of the plaintiffs, possession by the administrator, is inconsistent with possession by other persons. The decrees themselves show that the possession by the administrator was adverse to a possession by the persons in France, whether shareholders or others, who, before the appointment of an administrator, were managing the ships in France.

I now come to the question whether a title superior to that of the administrator has been established. The Cantiere Olivo Società Anonima set up a superior title derived from the U.S.S.R., as owners. Strictly the transfer to the Cantiere was not proved—for the contract of sale contemplated a bill of sale, and the bill of sale was not produced. It was said that it was with the authorities in Italy, and could not be produced. But no certified copy was produced. The point, however, is not material. In any case the Cantiere Olivo have to establish the right of the U.S.S.R., and are entitled to rely on the right of the U.S.S.R., from whom they derive possession, and upon whose title and by whose authority they are defending (see Biddle v. Bond, 6 B and S., 225, and Rogers v. Lambert, 7 The Times L.R., 69; [1891] 1 Q.B., 318). This consideration makes it unnecessary to examine matters to which much evidence was directed, namely, the form of the authority of the Arcos Company to sell, and the form of sale required by Russian law. What is pleaded is that by virtue of a decree of the Soviet Government of January 26, 1918, the Jupiter became the property of the Soviet Government, and that by virtue of a decree of March 4, 1919, the Petrograd company ceased to exist. Evidence was given on the one side and the other by a number of Russian gentlemen, some of them lawyers, upon matters of law and the constitutional history of Russia since 1917 ; there was also evidence as to what was done in the carrying out of the decrees. My difficulty, in dealing with this conflicting evidence upon matters which are in themselves obscure, is increased by the fact that these witnesses were not even agreed as to the correct translation of documents put in evidence.

But before I come to these witnesses I have to consider the point made by Mr. Dunlop, which, if sound, concludes the matter, and relieves me from any further consideration of the evidence. It is therefore naturally a very tempting proposition. An affidavit by M. Christian Rakovsky, sworn on November 25, 1924, was put in. He stated that he was Chargé d'Affaires for the U.S.S.R., and that at the time of the sale to the Cantiere Olivo Società Anonima the U.S.S.R. was in possession of the Jupiter and the owner, and entitled to the ownership, of such vessel. Mr. Dunlop's contention is that that statement by the representative of the U.S.S.R. is conclusive as to the facts stated and must be accepted by this Court. This contention was before the Court of Appeal on the hearing of the motion to set aside the writ in this action, and was referred to by Lord Justice Atkin (41 The Times L.R., at p. 323 ; [1925] P., at p. 78). What authority is there for the proposition that in the Courts of this country the declaration of a foreign sovereign is conclusive evidence that personal property in this country was or is the property of the foreign sovereign ? I believe that that proposition holds good only in the case where the jurisdiction of the Court, or other jurisdiction of the Crown, is sought to be enforced against property, and in such cases is limited to the declaration that the property is the property of the foreign sovereign. It is involved in the principle that a foreign sovereign and his property are immune from the jurisdiction of the Crown, unless the foreign sovereign chooses to submit to it. Professor Dicey, Conflict of Laws, 3rd Edition, page 217, after stating the rule as to the immunity of a foreign sovereign from the jurisdiction, says : "The immunity, moreover, applies to the property of the sovereign to the fullest extent, provided that the property is shown to belong to the sovereign." But where jurisdiction is invited over property in this country as, for instance, by a writ in rem, the declaration of the foreign sovereign that the property is his must be accepted, for to investigate the truth of that declaration would be to determine the very question of jurisdiction which is in issue, and to exercise jurisdiction over the foreign sovereign, which the Court cannot do against the will of such sovereign. I have always so understood and in many cases applied the judgment of Lord Justice Brett in The Parlement Belge (5 P.D., 197). But what authority is there for saying that where no question of immunity from jurisdiction is involved the declaration of the foreign sovereign as to the ownership of property must be accepted ? And on what principle can such a rule be based ? Let me, first of all, consider it on principle. Suppose the foreign sovereign did not claim immunity and submitted to the jurisdiction, and the question before the Court was whether the property was, or was not, in the foreign sovereign, must the declaration of the foreign sovereign be accepted as conclusive ? If so, then the declaration of a foreign sovereign would have greater weight than a declaration made on behalf of the King. In a question between the Crown and a private person as to the property in chattels here, it surely would not be conclusive if a minister of State made oath that the property was in the Crown. A fortiori, is the declaration of a sovereign to be accepted as conclusive when a question as to property is litigated between private persons, and the evidence produced by one of them is a declaration by a sovereign that the property had been in it? Moreover, if the declarations of a sovereign as to the ownership of property, not made for the purpose of securing immunity from jurisdiction, are to be conclusive, there is no reason why the same force should not be given to all other declarations. Why call foreign lawyers to prove the fact or the effect of foreign law, if a simple declaration by the representative of the foreign sovereign would be conclusive ? What was the necessity of the Evidence Act, 1851 (14 and 15 Victoria, c. 99, section 7), so far as foreign acts of State were concerned, if already such acts of State were conclusively provable by a declaration of the representative of the foreign sovereign ? Even if the question in issue be the passing of property locally situate in a foreign country, is it clear that the declaration of the foreign sovereign is conclusive? Undoubtedly property passes according to the law of the place where it is situate. But if it is said to have passed by an act of State of the foreign sovereign, is that not a fact which must be proved in the ordinary way by proof of the act of State, of its application to the property, and of the local situation of the property ? For instance, the property in a ship is said to have passed under a sale by a maritime Court, following a judgment in rem. Must not the judgment be proved ? I cannot believe that a declaration by the representative of the sovereign of the Court which condemned the ship must be accepted as conclusive proof. In every such case the question seems to me to be one of fact, to be determined by evidence. The act of State must be proved by lawyers, unless it can be proved as provided by the Evidence Act, 1851. The meaning and the application of the act of State must also be proved by lawyers. The question whether the property or person alleged to be subject to the act of State was within the territory of the sovereign where the act is in question, is equally a matter of fact to be proved by evidence. And on all three points it seems to me that the evidence of the representative of the sovereign carries no more weight than that of any other competent witness.

Mr. Dunlop relied upon what was said by Lord Justice Scrutton in Aksionairnoye Obschestvo A. M. Luther v. James Sagor and Company (37 The Times L.R., 777, at pp. 782-3; [1921] 3 K.B., 532, at pp. 555-6). The decision in Sagor's case (supra) is not in point, for the decree of the Russian Socialist Federative Soviet Republic admittedly had, and it was treated as having, the effect of nationalizing the goods in question, which at the time the decree was passed were admittedly within the territory of the R.S.F.S.R. The decision only applied the principle that the validity of the acts of an independent sovereign government in relation to property and persons within its jurisdiction cannot be questioned in the Courts of this country. Lord Justice Scrutton points out that if the Russian Government had itself brought the goods into this country, and by its representative declared that they were the property of the Russian Government, the Courts here could not investigate the truth of the allegation. This I understand to refer to a claim against the Russian Government. It is a statement of the rule that the Russian Government is immune from the jurisdiction of our Courts. It is impossible, he says, to recognize a government, and yet claim to exercise jurisdiction over its person or property against its will. He says further, and it is on this that Mr. Dunlop relies, "If it (the Court) could not question the title of the Government of Russia to goods brought by that Government to England, it cannot indirectly question it in the hands of a purchaser from that Government by denying that the Government could confer any good title to the property. This immunity follows from recognition as a sovereign State." I am not sure that I follow the use of the word "immunity" in this connexion. Immunity, as I understand it, means immunity from jurisdiction. But the words are spoken with reference to an admitted state of facts, namely, that the goods were in the territory of the Russian Government, and while there became subject to an act of State of that Government, whereby they became the property of the Russian Government. In such a state of affairs our Courts could not deny that the Government could confer a good title to the property. It is governed by the general principle that every sovereign State is bound to respect the independence of every other sovereign State, and the Courts of one country will not sit in judgment on the acts of another done within its own territory. In my opinion, nothing that was said in Sagor's case (supra) establishes Mr. Dunlop's proposition. In Vavasseur v. Krupp (9 Ch. D., 351) the Court did not consider an argument directed to show that the shells were not the property of the foreign sovereign, and pronounced it to be fallacious ; though, as the proceedings were really directed against the shells, and the representative of the foreign sovereign declared them to be his property, it would look as if the case might be within the principle of The Parlement Belge (supra), to which I have already referred. Vavasseur v. Krupp (supra) was decided the year before The Parlement Belge (supra). I hold that M. Rakovsky's declaration is not conclusive.

I must consider the evidence to see whether the Jupiter became the property of the U.S.S.R. or of any one of the Republics which together form the Union. The two which are material are the Russian Socialist Federative Soviet Republic—the R.S.F.S.R.—and the Ukrainian Socialist Soviet Republic, which I will refer to as the Ukrainian S.S.R. If I understand the defendants' case, it is put thus : Firstly, that the decrees of the R.S.F.S.R., which were acts of State having legislative effect, made on January 26, 1918, and March 4, 1919, dissolved the Petrograd company and transferred all its property, including the Jupiter, wherever that property was situated, to the R.S.F.S.R.; secondly, that if the decrees did not in themselves dissolve the company and transfer the property, they provided for the liquidation of the company and the transfer of the property, wherever situated, and that long before March, 1924, the liquidation was completed and the transfer made.

These two contentions are independent of the question whether the Jupiter ever was within the territorial sovereignty of the R.S.F.S.R. They are based upon the fact that the head office of the company was in Petrograd, which undoubtedly was within the territorial sovereignty of the R.S.F.S.R.

Thirdly, they say, as an alternative, that in the end of 1917 and the beginning of 1918 political power in Odessa was in the hands of Soviets there, and that they, acting as members of, or recognizing the sovereignty of, the R.S.F.S.R., seized the ships, and thereby made them the property of the R.S.F.S.R., or that their seizure, if made before the decree of January 26, 1918, was nevertheless a seizure for the R.S.F.S.R., and that the decrees, coupled with the seizure, transferred the property to the R.S.F.S.R.

Fourthly, it is said, as a further alternative, that the Soviets at Odessa seized the ships as an independent sovereign, and that the Ukrainian S.S.R., which subsequently came into existence and exercised sovereignty in Odessa, is to be regarded as the successor of those who so exercised sovereignty in Odessa at the end of 1917 and the beginning of 1918.

These third and fourth contentions have regard to the fact that the Jupiter was at Odessa. In considering these, it is vital to remember that from March, 1918, to April 9, 1919, though the Jupiter was at Odessa, yet Odessa was not territorially within the sovereignty of either the R.S.F.S.R. or the Ukrainian S.S.R. (which indeed had not come into existence), or of any persons to whom they can be regarded as successors in title, nor within the sovereignty of any persons who were of Bolshevik principles, or minded to confiscate private property. Whoever the persons were who seized the ships before March, 1918, they exercised no sort of political power in Odessa during the occupation of the Austrians and the French, except possibly for a few days in the autumn of 1918, between the Austrian and the French occupations ; and before the French left the Jupiter had already left Odessa, and was never thereafter within the territory of either the R.S.F.S.R. or the Ukrainian S.S.R.

As to the first contention, it seems to me that the decrees as to shipping enterprises of January 26, 1918, and March 4, 1919, go no further than the decrees as to banking and insurance enterprises, which were considered by the House of Lords in Russian Commercial and Industrial Bank v. Comptoir d'Escompte de Mulhouse and Others (supra), as to banking, and in Sedgwick, Collins and Co. v. Rossia Insurance Company, of Petrograd (supra), as to insurance. To adopt the words of the Lord Chancellor in the Rossia case (supra) the decrees for nationalizing shipping companies, which have been put in evidence, were, at least, not stronger than the decrees for nationalizing banking and insurance companies. If so, they did not in themselves dissolve the Petrograd company, but merely at most provided for its liquidation. The question whether they nevertheless transferred at once the property of the company was the second question mentioned by the Lord Chancellor in the Mulhouse case (40 The Times L.R., at p. 839 ; [1925] A.C., at p. 119), "Have they proved that the property in the bonds in dispute is no longer in the appellant company ?" But the Lord Chancellor (at pages 842 and 129) said it was unnecessary to consider the question, for counsel had deliberately refrained from arguing the question whether a Russian decree could confiscate foreign bonds which were in this country. Mr. Dunlop has not refrained from contending that the effect of the decrees was at once to transfer to the R.S.F.S.R. the property in the ships of the company, wherever situate.

Two questions are here involved : First, whether they at once transferred the property ; and, secondly, whether they transferred the property, though it was not locally situate within the territory of the R.S.F.S.R. As to the first, it seems to me that if the decrees only provided for the liquidation of the company, they equally only provided for the ultimate transfer of the property upon the completion of the liquidation. I express this view with some hesitation, because I observe that in Employers' Liability Assurance Corporation v. Sedgwick Collins and Co. (supra) Lord Sumner treats the Mulhouse case (supra) as deciding that the decrees as to banking companies "did not dissolve the companies themselves, but only stripped them of their assets and destroyed their good will by making banking a State monopoly."

If the view I have expressed is the true view of the decrees considered in themselves, I am quite unable to arrive at a contrary decision upon the most conflicting evidence called before me. It is for the defendants to satisfy me that the decrees were legislative acts, and that they had the effect alleged. They have wholly failed to do so.

As to the second question—that is, the question whether the decrees, when they operated, if they did not dissolve the company, provided for the liquidation of it and the transfer of its property wherever situated—it was not suggested that ships were to be governed by any principles other than those applicable to other chattels. If the Jupiter was not within the territory of the R.S.F.S.R., I do not see how the mere passing of a decree could transfer the property. This seems to me to be recognized in all the cases : see, for instance, per Lord Justice Atkin in Goukassow's case (39 The Times L.R., at p. 576 ; [1923] 2 K.B., at p. 693) ; per Lord Justice Sargant in Sedgwick, Collins and Company's case in the Court of Appeal (41 The Times L.R., at p. 666 ; [1926] 1 K.B., at p. 15), and per the Lord Chancellor in Sedgwick, Collins and Company's case in the House of Lords (42 The Times L.R., 749 ; [1927] A.C., 95). The Lord Chancellor treats it as obvious that the property and rights of the company in the countries foreign to Russia are not effectively taken from it by the Russian legislation. I am strengthened in this opinion by the view taken by the R.S.F.S.R. itself, as set forth in two circulars. The first, No. 42, is dated April 12, 1922, and was addressed by the People's Commissariat for Foreign Affairs to the Plenipotentiary Representatives of the R.S.F.S.R. abroad. It sets forth that "the régime of property rights established by decrees of the Russian Soviet Power regulates property relations on the territory of the R.S.F.S.R. only," and continues : "But relations in connexion with property rights where the objects thereof are outside the territory of the R.S.F.S.R., and are not connected with such territory, cannot be discussed outside the boundaries of the R.S.F.S.R. in accordance with Russian laws, and are determined by local legislation without regard to the nationality of the subjects of such rights, even if such subjects were Russian citizens."

The second, No. 194, is a circular under date September 26, 1923. It is issued by the People's Commissariat of Justice to all District Courts. It was issued after the union of the R.S.F.S.R. and the Ukrainian S.S.R. had been formed, but in terms applies only to citizens of the R.S.F.S.R. It states that "property rights of citizens of the R.S.F.S.R., which have to be enforced outside the boundaries of the U.S.S.R., are to be determined by the laws of the country where such rights are to be enforced." These circulars show that the R.S.F.S.R. recognize and enforce the general principle that the passing of chattels is governed by the law of the place where they are locally situate, and in particular they recognize that the nationalizing decrees do not operate upon property outside the territory of the R.S.F.S.R.

It will be convenient to examine the question whether the Jupiter ever was within the territory of the R.S.F.S.R. when I consider Mr. Dunlop's third contention. But I may at once say that I find, for reasons to be stated presently, that it is not proved that the Jupiter ever was within the territory of the R.S.F.S.R.

As to the second contention, the view that the decrees could not transfer property which was not in the territory of the R.S.F.S.R. applies equally whether the liquidation was completed or not. Moreover, at the date of completion, if completion ever took place, the Jupiter certainly was not in territory of the R.S.F.S.R., even supposing that Odessa was in such territory, from November, 1917, to March, 1918. The liquidation is said to have been completed in December, 1918, at a time when Odessa, where the Jupiter lay, was in the occupation of the French and General Denikin. If it was completed by December, 1918, I am puzzled by the defendants' insistence on the decree of March 4, 1919. The defendants' evidence on this point is that of M. Kriloff and the file of the company at Petrograd, which he produced. These documents show clearly that up to November, 1918, the liquidation of the company had not been completed, but M. Kriloff said that he was a member of the board of Ropit from 1913, that after the decree of January 26, 1918, some of the former directors remained at Petrograd, and other directors were elected from the Petrograd staff of the company and from the staff of the Petrograd agency of the company, that a Commissary was appointed by the authorities—he did not know by whom—and that in December, 1918, they handed over all the books and documents to officials of the Supreme Council, and the board was dissolved. But it is certain that up to this time the ships of the company, other than those which were in Petrograd, or else were in the north of Russia, had not been got into the possession of the R.S.F.S.R., and it therefore would look as if the chief part of the liquidation was still to be done. I am not able to find affirmatively that the liquidation was completed before the Jupiter left Odessa in April, 1919. I do not know that it would be against the interest of the plaintiffs if it were proved that the liquidation was completed in December, 1918. The Jupiter was at that time not within the territory of the R.S.F.S.R., for reasons which I shall presently state, and the result of a completed liquidation might be that the Ropit ships became bona vacantia, and the property of the first occupants, who were the persons who brought them to France. It is, however, the view of Mr. Machover and Dr. Idelson that ships in the territory of the R.S.F.S.R. were nationalized before 1924. If so, the Jupiter, had it been within that territory, would have become the property of the R.S.F.S.R.

That brings me to Mr. Dunlop's third contention : Can Odessa be regarded as having at any material time been within the territorial sovereignty of the R.S.F.S.R. ? In March, 1924, and to-day, Odessa is within the territory not of the R.S.F.S.R. but of the Ukrainian S.S.R. It has been within the territory of the Ukrainian S.S.R. ever since that Republic came into existence as a sovereign State. M. Glouschenko said that since the Ukrainian S.S.R. was established it has always exercised jurisdiction over Odessa. M. Poushkine said that a Soviet form of Government was established in Odessa at the end of April, 1919, after the French left, and that thenceforward Odessa was in control of the Ukrainian S.S.R. (except that General Denikin's troops occupied it from August, 1919, till February, 1920). On December 28, 1920, a formal agreement of alliance was entered into between the R.S.F.S.R. and the Ukrainian S.S.R. which recognized the independence and sovereignty of each contracting party. On December 30, 1922, these two Republics as sovereign States entered into a treaty with the White Russian S.S.R. and the Transcaucasian S.S.R., and on July 6, 1923, the constitution of the four Republics was agreed and the Union—the U.S.S.R.—created. It thus appears that the sovereignty of the Ukrainian S.S.R. and that of the R.S.F.S.R. are quite distinct—though for certain purposes the two Republics act together—and that from April, 1919, the only sovereign of Odessa has been the Ukrainian S.S.R. During the French occupation and the Austrian occupation, whoever was the sovereign, it was not the Ukrainian S.S.R. (which had not come into existence) nor the R.S.F.S.R., nor any form of Soviet authority; during that period there cannot have been any persons exercising political authority to whom the Ukrainian S.S.R. must be treated as successors—still less any to whom the R.S.F.S.R. must be treated as successors.

What was the position between November, 1917, and the occupation by the Austrians in March, 1918? Several witnesses have given an account of what happened. It is perhaps not surprising that they do not agree. The political position was very confused. In the first place, on November 17, 1917, a Ukrainian Socialist Republic—not a Soviet Republic—was proclaimed, and on January 11, 1918, its Government issued a manifesto declaring an independent sovereign State of the Ukrainian people. Mr. Machover said that it had its own army and financial and judicial system. Its seat of Government was Kief. Its representative body was the Rada. On November 4, 1917, the Council of People's Commissaries of the R.S.F.S.R. passed a decree, which is in the nature of a remonstrance and almost an ultimatum to the Ukrainian Rada. The significance of this is that the document recognizes the Ukrainian People's Republic while complaining that the Rada does not recognize the authority of Soviets in the Ukraine. There is also the significant fact that the Ukrainian People's Republic was a party, as also was the R.S.F.S.R., to the Treaty of Brest-Litovsk, concluded with the Central Powers in February, 1918. The witnesses on the one side and the other differ as to whether Odessa was within the Ukraine, and whether the Rada exercised any authority there. The Rada claimed sovereignty over Odessa, and the R.S.F.S.R. refused to admit the claim; there were discussions between the two Governments during 1918, which ended in neither giving way (see Poushkine's evidence). So long as Odessa was in the occupation of the Austrians or French, these discussions related to the future and not the present. There is the evidence of Poushkine and Schvettau that during the Austrian and French occupations (March, 1918, to April, 1919) the Rada exercised some authority in Odessa. But I can find no evidence that it exercised any effective authority from November, 1917, to March, 1918. Mr. Machover said that from November, 1917, to November, 1918, the Ukraine was in a state of civil war with a Soviet or Bolshevik party in most places. I think the proper inference from the evidence of Alexieff and others is that the Soviet or Bolshevik party in Odessa were masters of the town and port from November, 1917, till the arrival of the Austrians in 1918. It is, however, a long step from that fact to saying that that party was exercising the sovereignty of the R.S.F.S.R., whose seat of government was in Petrograd or Moscow. The evidence altogether fails to satisfy me that I ought to take that step.

The conclusion at which I am inclined to arrive is that the persons who seized the ships in Odessa were acting on their own account and independently of any sovereign, or as exercising sovereignty on their own account, imitating, it may be, the proceedings of the revolutionary government in Petrograd, but not acting in obedience to it or as if they were members of the political society ultimately designated as the R.S.F.S.R. At best, I am left in doubt. The defendants have failed to prove that which it was for them to prove. What is their evidence? Alexieff began by saying that in December, 1917, the sailors at Odessa nationalized all the vessels. He then said that this was done by the Council of Nine. He said that a Soviet form of government was already formed in Odessa by October, 1917, and that a Council of Nine was appointed by the supreme organization, the executive of Soviets in Odessa; that the Council of Nine called upon the Union of Sailors to appoint an Economic Commission; and that this Commission took an inventory of the ships and handed over all the documents to the Council of Nine, and the Council of Nine then worked the ships and paid the wages of the crews. He says that the nationalization was completed in February. All that Alexieff says about Petrograd is that the Soviets in Odessa were in touch with Petrograd and sent delegates to a congress of Soviets at Petrograd in 1917—he thinks after the second conference in October, 1917. He made no reference to the decree of January 26, 1918.

M. Glouschenko says there was a Soviet in Odessa after October, 1917, chosen by the various Unions of Workmen and Soldiers, and that it sent delegates to two congresses of Soviets in Petrograd. He says that the decree of January 26, 1918, was published in Odessa on the following day, and was put in force in Odessa by the Council of Nine, which was appointed by the Soviets in Odessa. He also says that at the end of November, 1917, he and three others were sent by the office of the Ropit, whose managing director was still in Odessa, to get money from the Council of People's Commissaries at Petrograd, and that he got it and brought it back to Odessa; and that there was continuous communication between Odessa and Petrograd. He said also that the military force in Odessa was provided by the Soviets in Odessa. I find it very difficult to reconcile this evidence with much of Alexieff's. If the nationalization was begun in December, 1917, how was it done under the decree of January 26, 1918? If Odessa sent to Petrograd and obtained money for the working of the ships, it is remarkable that M. Kriloff, who continued to act at the head office in Petrograd, knows nothing about it. He said: "I do not remember if we asked for money for Odessa or got any." Further, contradicting Glouschenko, he says that in the early part of 1918 there was no post or telegraph or railway communication between Odessa and Petrograd. The file of the Ropit Company supports this. It shows how little Petrograd knew of what was taking place at Odessa. On February 16, 1918, there is a minute of a decision "to get into contact with the South"; and on March 30, 1918, there is a report of all the information received from Odessa, which was meagre, but, so far as it went, agrees rather with Alexieff's account than with Glouschenko's account. It reads as follows: that "on January 6 the Odessa section of the Sailors' Union proclaimed the entire fleet of the Russian company the property of the union. Later on the democratic organizations and the professional unions of Odessa acknowledged that the Sailors' Union is to be regarded as a transitory measure to the nationalization of the fleet of the Black Sea and the Sea of Azof. To safeguard the same as a national property, on January 12 a Council of Nine was formed for the general management of the affairs of all waterways and transport in the region indicated above. This Council of Nine was composed of representatives of the following democratic organizations," and he mentioned them. "The said Council of Nine proposed to Ropit that they should continue their service under the council's control and guidance, which the Odessa administration consented to do. The board has no further information about the affair." I am not quite clear whether the dates are old or new style; but at any rate they are all dates before January 26, 1918.

M. Schvettau said that in the autumn of 1917 the Government of Odessa changed to a Government of Soviets, and that in the beginning of 1918 the Soviet Government was in actual control of Odessa, and that it appointed a Commissar to the University. All that this comes to is that there was a Soviet form of government at Odessa at that time.

M. Poushkine was not at Odessa. He said that in 1918 the position at Odessa was very peculiar and that the R.S.F.S.R. was very anxious to retain power over the Black Sea ports. His evidence does not help me on the point now under consideration. M. Krougliakoff was of opinion that from November, 1917, to March, 1918, the Soviets at Odessa exercised power, acknowledging the sovereign authority of the supreme Soviet power in Petrograd. But he gave no facts to support his view. His view was based on the assumption that the Petrograd Government succeeded to the sovereignty over all the territories which had been territories of Imperial Russia. There is nothing to justify this assumption. As a lawyer's view it is opposed to the lawyer's view of Dr. Idelson that the R.S.F.S.R. never was sovereign of any territory except Northern Russia.

In the course of the evidence there was put in a decree dated December 1, 1917, which is described as a "Decree of the Second All-Russian Congress of Soviets of Workers, Soldiers, and Peasants' Deputies respecting the establishment of the Council of People's Commissaries." This is one of the congresses of Soviets held in Petrograd. It is difficult to regard these congresses as having sovereign power. They are rather in the nature of meetings of delegates of party organizations. The congress is styled an All-Russian Congress of Soviets. But on December 1, 1917, for reasons which I have already stated, no Soviet organization had sovereignty in the territory of the Ukrainian Socialist Republic. If the Soviets in the Ukraine sent deputies to the congress of December 1, 1917, they were not there as members of a sovereign body. Similarly, if the Soviets in Odessa sent delegates to the congress, it does not follow that they attended as members of a sovereign body. The decree contemplates the convening of a Constituent Assembly. The evidence was that such an assembly was convened in Petrograd in January and came to no decision and was no more heard of. There is no evidence that the Soviets in Odessa sent delegates to this assembly. The decree says that the management of separate branches of State life is given to committees, and that the governing power belongs to the Collegium of Chairmen of these Committees, that is, the Council of People's Commissaries, subject to the All-Russian Congress of Councils of Workmen, Peasants, and Soldiers' Deputies and its Central Executive Committee. There is no evidence that the Soviets of Odessa ever sent a chairman of this committee to Petrograd as a member of this Collegium.

The decree of January 26, 1918, on which the defendants rely, is expressed to be a decree of the Council of People's Commissaries. It provides for the appointment of commissaries to take charge of the shipping companies' offices. There is no evidence that that was done by the Soviets at Odessa. Those Soviets had in fact begun to seize the ships on their own account long before the decree of January 26, 1918, and after the decree of January 26, 1918, they continued to do it in their own way, without regard to the decree of January 26, 1918, until in March, 1918, their activities were put an end to by the arrival of the Austrians.

I was also referred to a copy of a paper, "The Voice of Revolution," of March 9, 1918. Its office was in Odessa. M. Glouschenko said it was the official paper of the Soviets. It styles itself "Organ of the Executive Committee of Soviets of Workers', Soldiers', and Peasants' Deputies of the Rumanian Front and Region." It reports some decrees or orders made in Petrograd and speaks of the Russian Republic. This is a small bit of evidence to support the view that the Soviets of Odessa recognized the sovereignty of the persons in power at Petrograd. But it carries me a very little way.

Taking the evidence as a whole, and I think I have set out the whole of the evidence, I am quite unable to find that Odessa was at any time within the territory of the R.S.F.S.R. or of the revolutionary government of Northern Russia which afterwards took definite form as the R.S.F.S.R.

As to Mr. Dunlop's contention, the persons who seized the ships—whether the Sailors' Union or some association of Soviets in Odessa—either seized them as robbers or seized them as an independent sovereign and made them the property of that sovereign. But their sovereignty, if sovereignty it was, came to an end in March, 1918, and was never revived. And how can I regard the Ukrainian S.S.R. as their successors? There was a complete break. No doubt, if a Government originates in revolution and is then established as a Government, and is then recognized by this country, the recognition is retro-active and recognizes the acts of the Government from its beginning (see Sagor's case, [1921] 2 K.B., at pages 543 and 549). But that supposes a continuity in the governmental activities of the persons so recognized. What was the beginning of the governmental activities of the Ukrainian S.S.R.? Certainly there were none in Odessa until after the Jupiter had left Odessa. I can see less reason for saying that a seizure by the Soviets in Odessa resulted in the property in the ships being in the Ukrainian S.S.R. than for saying that the retaking of the ships by the persons who controlled them during the occupation of the Austrians and the French, and ultimately removed them to France, vested the property in those persons.

In my judgment the defendants have not shown that the property in the Jupiter ever was in the U.S.S.R. or any of the Republics forming the U.S.S.R. In my view, therefore, each of these contentions fails, and the defendants have not discharged the burden which rested upon them on this part of the case.

The result is that my judgment is that M. Bourgeois in March, 1924, was wrongfully deprived of his possession, and that no one has established any title superior to that of M. Bourgeois. In arriving at this conclusion, I have not considered it necessary to consider how far the Ukrainian S.S.R. adopted, or by what means the Ukrainian S.S.R. adopted, the legislation of the R.S.F.S.R. There may be some other matters that were discussed before me which I have not considered, but if I have not considered them it is because in my view the conclusions at which I have arrived make it unnecessary for me to consider them. I find that M. Bourgeois has made out a prima facie right and is entitled to judgment unless a superior right is made out. No superior right has been made out, and therefore M. Bourgeois must have judgment for possession.

MR. JUSTICE HILL, on January 20, directed that the name of the Compagnie Russe de Navigation à Vapeur et de Commerce, as plaintiffs, should be struck out of the writ, and he formally pronounced against the claims of the plaintiffs Tcheloff and Margoline. He granted a declaration that the plaintiff Bourgeois was entitled to possession of the Jupiter at the date of the writ, and gave judgment for him against the defendants and their bail for £7,800, with costs. He refused the application of the plaintiff Bourgeois for interest, as damages, because he thought that it was a matter of mere speculation whether the plaintiff would have been in any better position if he had had possession of the ship in October, 1924, rather than of £7,800 now.

On the application of Mr. DUNLOP a stay of execution was granted, provided that notice of appeal was entered within four weeks.

PROFESSOR DR. G. JAEGER v. THE JAEGER COMPANY, LIMITED.*

Trade name—Passing off—Jaeger clothing—Change of meaning of word "Jaeger"—Confusion—Injunction.

A limited company was formed in England, over 40 years ago, for the sale of Jaeger sanitary clothing and bedding. At that time the word "Jaeger" as applied to such goods meant goods made in accordance with the principles enunciated by Professor Gustav Jaeger—i.e., goods made of animal fibre. The company's business was carried on subject to agreements entered into between the company and Professor Jaeger and certain German companies. In 1925 the plaintiff company, which consisted of members of Professor Jaeger's family who had been introduced into the business formerly carried on by him, opened a retail shop in London, and in 1926 they commenced an action against the defendant company for a declaration that they were entitled to use the word "Jaeger" upon and in connexion with articles of clothing and analogous goods and to carry on business in the sale of such goods under the style of Prof. Dr. G. Jaeger, provided that they took reasonable precautions to distinguish their goods from those of the defendants. The defendants by their counterclaim sought an injunction to restrain the plaintiffs from passing off their business or goods as those of the defendants by the use of the name "Jaeger" or otherwise.

Held, that the meaning of the word "Jaeger," as applied to goods of this nature, had ceased in this country to be descriptive and had come to denote the goods of the defendants; that the plaintiffs were entitled to the declaration, qualified, however, by the insertion, after the word "Jaeger," of the words "as part of their business name"; and that the defendants were entitled to the injunction which they sought by the counterclaim.

This action was brought by the plaintiff company for a declaration that they were "entitled to use the word 'Jaeger' upon and in connexion with articles of clothing and analogous goods and to carry on business in the sale of such goods under the style of Prof. Dr. G. Jaeger provided that they take reasonable precautions clearly to distinguish such goods and business from the goods and business respectively of the defendants."

The defendants, by their counterclaim, sought an injunction to restrain the plaintiffs from passing off their business or goods as those of the defendants by the use of the name "Jaeger" or otherwise.

Sir Arthur Colefax, K.C., Mr. Moritz, K.C., and Mr. K. E. Shelley appeared for the plaintiffs; Sir Duncan Kerly, K.C., Mr. Farwell, K.C., and Mr. F. E. Bray for the defendants.

MR. JUSTICE ROMER, in delivering a considered judgment, said:—The history of this case begins some 50 years ago at the time when Professor Gustav Jaeger first disclosed to a somewhat sceptical world his theory and system of sanitary clothing. According to the professor perfect health could alone be obtained by avoiding the use in clothing and bedding of all material of vegetable fibre, and by the adoption of clothing and bedding made throughout of animal fibre, such as wool, hair, and feathers. The material used should for preference be undyed, but if dyed it was essential that the dye should be "fast." Nor did the professor confine his attention to the material of which clothing was to be made. He designed a number of garments himself, and the use of these garments, to which he gave the name of "Normal," if not essential, was at any rate expected of all true disciples. A glance at some of the catalogues containing illustrations of these garments provokes the reflection that adherence to the system must have required a considerable degree of moral courage, and this may explain the fact that up to the year 1883 it does not seem to have occurred to anyone in this country that the system had any commercal value. In the early part of that year, however, a Mr. Ihlee conceived the idea of forming a company over here for the purpose of exploiting the system. So far as I can see, Professor Jaeger could not have prevented anyone from making and selling in this country clothing or bedding made in strict accordance with the principles enunciated by him, and from announcing the fact that they had been so made. But Mr. Ihlee evidently considered, and I have no doubt considered rightly, that the exploitation of the system over here was not likely to be a commercial success unless he could enlist the professor's interest in the undertaking, and could make use of the professor's name in such a way as to indicate that the business was being carried on with his approval. Mr. Ihlee accordingly approached Professor Jaeger and obtained from him a letter dated June 8, 1883, authorizing Mr. Ihlee to form in England a limited company using the professor's name for the purpose of introducing his system in England and the Colonies on condition that Mr. Ihlee would use marks with the professor's name, and would utilize the same on the goods sold. The professor further stipulated that Mr. Ihlee would have made and would sell an English translation of an extract from one of the professor's published works, which he refers to as his

* Reported by J. L. DENISON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Normal Clothing Book. All this was, however, expressed to be conditional upon Mr. Ihlee's obtaining the consent of, among other people, a German firm called Messrs. Benger. This condition was rendered necessary by the fact that the professor had entered into various agrements with German manufacturers, including Messrs. Benger, conferring upon them certain exclusive rights in connexion with his system. The earliest of these agreements was one bearing the date October 30, 1879, and made between the professor of the one part and Messrs. Benger of the other part. It purported to confer upon Messrs. Benger the exclusive right of manufacture and sale in Germany, and in other countries, of a shirt therein called a "Normal Shirt," made according to the professor's specifications. For every shirt sold the professor was to receive a royalty. Messrs. Benger, for their part, pledged themselves to manufacture the shirts of pure sheep's wool only, and of the shape designed by the professor. In return for this the professor pledged himself to facilitate the introduction of the Normal shirts by recommending them warmly, and to stimulate their propagation by means of public meetings and in the Press. These exclusive rights were subsequently extended so as to cover all underclothing made in accordance with the professor's system. It would seem, however, that Messrs. Benger had not, down to 1883, ever exploited the system in this country, although they had registered a trade mark here in respect of articles of clothing, such trade mark consisting in part of the words "Dr. Jaeger's Normal Wool System." Somewhat similar agreements were entered into by the professor with other German manufacturers in respect of other articles made according to his system, the right to manufacture socks, stockings, towels, petticoats and aprons, and certain other articles, for instance, being ultimately given to one Entress, and the right to manufacture blankets and certain cloth having been given to a firm of Greve and Uhl. It is not necessary to refer to the various agreements in detail. It is sufficient to say that Professor Jaeger conferred upon the manufacturers the right to use his name in connexion with the various articles made in accordance with his system on the terms of his receiving royalties, and that he protected himself as far as he could against the use of his name in connexion with articles that did not conform in all respects to the principles which he had advocated. In this state of affairs Mr. Ihlee entered into an agreement, dated September 19, 1883, with Messrs. Benger, Mr. Ihlee purporting to contract as representative of the defendant company, which was not yet in existence. Under this agreement the company were to have the exclusive right of selling in Great Britain, her Colonies and possessions, the woollen fabrics of Messrs. Benger described as being protected there through a registered trade mark, being the trade mark to which I have already referred. The company were to procure all normal woollen underwear or wool which was manufactured by Messrs. Benger exclusively from them, and were to combine the names of Benger and Jaeger in posters placed in show windows and shops. Messrs. Benger, for their part, pledged themselves to supply the company only with such Normal articles as should comply in every respect with the requirements of Professor Jaeger, and in order to prove its authenticity to have every article stamped as therein mentioned. It would appear that the defendant company thereafter entered into similar arrangements with others of the professor's concessionaires. On December 10, 1883, the defendant company was incorporated under the name of Dr. Jaeger's Sanitary Woollen System Company, Limited, which name it retained until the year 1920, when it became The Jaeger Company, Limited. The first object stated in its memorandum was "to introduce and make generally known Professor Dr. Gustav Jaeger's Sanitary Woollen System." One of the first acts of the company was to register a trade mark (hereinafter referred to as the diamond trade mark) consisting of part of a portrait of Professor Jaeger bearing his signature and containing after the name of the company the words "sole concessionaires." The company obtained the consent of the professor to this, and it further induced him to sign a statement dated December 11, 1885, which was in the following words:—"I have conceded to Dr. Jaeger's Sanitary Woollen System Company, Limited, 42, 43, Forestreet, London, E.C., the sole right in Great Britain and the British Possessions of the use of my name, publications respecting my system, patents, trade marks, &c., and the sole sale in Great Britain and the British Possessions of articles of clothing, bedding, &c., in connexion with my sanitary woollen system, and stamped with the trade marks. I guarantee that the materials of such articles, made by the authorized manufacturers, consist throughout of animal fibre (animal wool, hair, feathers), without any mixture of vegetable fibre; also that articles described to be of the natural colour are free from dye, and that dyed articles are only treated with genuine and harmless dyes. For articles on which the trade marks in question do not appear I am, of course, not responsible." So anxious was the company in those days to associate the professor and his name with the operations they were about to undertake. The defendants also found it desirable to obtain the consent of Messrs. Benger and other concessionaires of the professor to the registration of the diamond trade mark, and they induced such concessionaires, including Messrs. Benger and Entress, to sign a document recording such consent and undertaking to stamp all articles destined for the defendants with the trade mark. In the year 1885, indeed, the defendants agreed that in the event of their business being given up in London, or generally in England, the trade mark should be placed at the absolute disposal of Messrs. Benger for their manufactured articles, and that in the like event the words "Dr. Jaeger's Sanitary Woollen," which by that time had also been registered by the defendants as a trade mark, should also be placed at Messrs. Benger's sole disposal. By an agreement dated May 27, 1886, the relations between the defendant company and the professor were more precisely defined than they had been before that date. By that agreement the professor granted to the defendant company the sole right in Great Britain and her Colonies and possessions to make use of his name, the publications concerning his system, the diamond trade mark, and the sole right of sale of Normal articles manufactured according to his system and marked with the trade mark. As regards such articles the company obtained the professor's guarantee, the company undertaking to obtain Normal articles from the concessioned firms in the legitimate qualities, form, and pattern authorized by the professor, and undertaking to see that all Normal articles marked with the trade mark and not procured from the original concessioned firms should correspond exactly to the requirements of Dr. Jaeger's system, and should, as regards their component parts, be upon his request submitted to him for examination. The company further undertook to pay a royalty to the professor upon all articles of Normal clothing used in their business and marked with the trade mark, so far as the articles were not made by the original concessionaire firms.

With the advantages so secured to them by these agreements with Professor Jaeger and his concessionaires, and by somewhat similar agreements that were from time to time substituted for them, the defendant company carried on business in this country in the sale of articles made under the professor's system. All goods sold by them were at first obtained solely from the concessioned firms in Germany. But at the date of the outbreak of the Great War rather less than one-quarter of the goods were being obtained from this source, the remainder being manufactured in this country.

His Lordship described the relations between the companies down to 1914 and stated that members of the professor's family were introduced into his business. His Lordship then continued: Upon the outbreak of war, however, all further commercial intercourse came to an end, and the various agreements with the defendant company were thereby determined. The effect of this was that the defendant company continued to carry on its business, using for that purpose the name of Dr. Jaeger and the diamond trade mark but without paying him or the plaintiff firm any royalties in respect of their so doing. They ceased, of course, to get any goods from Germany, confining themselves exclusively to the sale of goods that were British made. Upon the conclusion of peace, and perhaps not unnaturally, this state of affairs appeared to the plaintiffs and to some of the concessioned firms to be grossly unfair. Messrs. Benger and Messrs. Greve and Uhl accordingly in the month of June, 1920, made a demand upon the defendants that unless they were prepared to enter into fresh arrangements with those two firms they should cease using the word "Jaeger" as part of their name or upon their goods. A similar demand was put forward on behalf of the plaintiff firm. It should be stated that the professor himself had died in the year 1917.

His Lordship referred to disputes which then arose between the two companies, and continued:—The plaintiffs in November, 1925, opened a retail shop in New Bond-street. In the meantime the defendant company had applied for registration in class 38 of the word "Jaeger," the application being advertised on October 7, 1925. Notice of opposition was given on November 21, 1925, by the plaintiffs, who stated as their grounds of opposition that the word "Jaeger" was not and could not be distinctive of the products of the defendants and was calculated to deceive, adding that they would rely upon the fact that the word "Jaeger" formed part of their own business name and was being so used by them in connexion with all goods included in the class. In their counter-statement the defendants alleged that the use by the plaintiffs of the word "Jaeger" in connexion with their goods was recent and calculated to deceive. The defendants, however, still refrained from taking legal proceedings to restrain the plaintiffs from trading in their own name, and accordingly on January 9, 1926, the plaintiffs issued their writ in this action.

His Lordship read the pleadings, and continued:—At the Bar, however, Sir Arthur Colefax merely asked for a declaration in the terms above set forth qualified by the insertion after the word "Jaeger" of the words "as part of their business name."

His Lordship then dealt with allegations of fraud against the plaintiff company and said: It is sufficient for the moment to say that in my judgment the charge is wholly unfounded. The plaintiff firm has been in existence for nearly forty years, and during that time or the greater part of that time has been engaged in business in Germany. There was no ground whatever for saying that the firm was originally established for the purpose of committing a fraud in this country, or that for that purpose the name of a derelict firm was resuscitated. If any such charge could be made out the Court would not, of course, give the plaintiffs any relief whatsoever. As it is, it seems to me that it is only right to make the amended declaration asked for, in order, if for no other reason, to show that the plaintiffs are innocent of the serious charge brought against them.

The plaintiffs, however, only succeed in this action in part, and I propose to make no order as to the costs of it. I must now deal with the counterclaim. In addition to the serious charge of fraud to which I have just referred, the defendants allege that the word "Jaeger," in connexion with the business of woollen goods, hosiery and garments, for many years past has come to mean and does mean to the trade and public only the goods and business of the defendants, and is distinctive of such goods and business. They then allege that on many occasions customers desiring to deal with the defendants have entered or made purchases at the New Bond-street shop of the plaintiffs under the belief that it was a branch of the defendants, and claim an injunction to restrain the plaintiffs from passing off their business and goods as or for those of the defendants by the use of the name "Jaeger" or otherwise.

His Lordship said that there could be, in his opinion, no doubt upon the evidence before him that the word "Jaeger" had, by the year 1924, ceased in this country to be descriptive and had come to indicate the goods of the defendants. He also found that there was evidence of confusion, but said that he could not, however, adopt the view put forward by the defendants that, in setting up business in this country, the plaintiffs intended that such confusion should arise. After stating the nature of the precautions taken by the plaintiffs to prevent confusion, he said that to a person ignorant of the meaning of the word "Jaeger" at the present day all this would appear quite sufficient for the purpose of distinguishing the plaintiffs' goods from those of the defendants, and, as he had already said, he believed that the plaintiffs themselves were so ignorant. He then continued:—In the circumstances, it seems to me that I ought to grant the injunction sought by the defendants in their counterclaim. The defendants, however, have, in my judgment, entirely failed to substantiate the very serious charge of fraud that they chose to make against the plaintiffs, the successors and representatives of Professor Jaeger, to whom they owe so much. I shall make no order as to the costs of the counterclaim.

OLDHAM v. SHEFFIELD CORPORATION.*

Negligence — Highway—Cul-de-sac—Extension—Contractor's road—Unlighted fence across it—Appearance of continuous road—Invitation to use—Accident to invitee.

The defendants, a local authority, who were carrying out road improvements, employed contractors to pull down a wall at the end of a cul-de-sac and to make a new road joining the old cul-de-sac to an existing highway. The contractors pulled down the wall and made up a section of the new road as a contractor's road and then closed further progress by erecting a wooden fence, but there was no night watchman or lamp to give warning of the obstruction. Between the fence and the existing highway with which the cul-de-sac was to be connected there was a dangerous ravine, but the lights on each side of that highway were clearly visible to anyone entering the cul-de-sac and might induce a stranger to suppose that there was a continuous road. The plaintiff, who was driving a motor-car at night, proceeded along the cul-de-sac and the contractor's road, and, not seeing the fence, crashed through it into the ravine and was seriously injured. In an action for negligence,

* Reported by H. Langford Lewis, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held, that although the place of the accident was not a highway but a private site, yet, as there was an invitation to go upon it, the defendants were liable for the consequences of putting an unexpected obstruction in the path of the invitee, and the plaintiff was entitled to recover.

This was an appeal by the defendants, the Corporation of Sheffield, from a decision of Mr. Justice Salter given on further consideration in London of an action for damages for negligence tried by him at Leeds Assizes. He decided in favour of the plaintiff, and awarded £1,500 damages, plus £208 15s. special damage.

The plaintiff in the action, Mr. John Walter Oldham, licensee of the Birley Hotel, Sheffield, claimed damages for the negligence and misfeasance of the defendants and their servants in carrying out certain road improvements in Sheffield whereby a motor-car which he was driving fell with him over the edge of a deep ravine into the river Sheaf.

The defendants denied negligence and pleaded contributory negligence. They also alleged that the defendant was drunk while driving the motor-car.

On July 31, 1924, about 10.15 p.m., the plaintiff was driving a motor-car along a road known as Charlotte-road, Sheffield. That road ran downhill, and met another road, Edmund-road, almost at right angles. It crossed Edmund-road, but ended in a cul-de-sac with houses on each side. There had originally been a wall cutting off the end of the road at that point, but some time before the accident happened the corporation had entered into a contract to extend the road across land belonging to the Duchess of Norfolk so as to join another road, also called Charlotte-road, on the other side of the valley in which the river Sheaf ran, and in a continuous line with the first Charlotte-road.

The contractors had been engaged for some time in constructing a bridge across the river Sheaf. They had pulled down the wall at the end of the existing Charlotte-road and had made up a section of the new road as a kerbed contractor's road for a distance of 80ft. beyond the site of the old wall, which itself was only 23 yards beyond the cross-roads, and had then closed further progress by erecting a wooden fence 7ft. in height.

The plaintiff, having driven his car down Charlotte-road and reached Edmund-road, proceeded straight along the old cul-de-sac into the new partly constructed road, and, not seeing the fence, crashed through it. Immediately beyond was a steep declivity ending in the river Sheaf, into which the car fell. The plaintiff was seriously injured. He sustained a fractured skull, both knees were bruised and cut, and he suffered a severe shock to his nervous system causing loss of memory. The repairs to his motor-car cost over £100.

There was evidence at the trial that there was nothing to prevent a person not well acquainted with the locality from proceeding across Edmund-road into the old termination of Charlotte-road, there being no night watchman or warning red lamp to indicate that there was an obstruction. It was also proved, and the Judge found, that the lights on each side of the road beyond the ravine would be clearly visible, after the wall had been pulled down, to anyone driving at night down Charlotte-road, and might induce any stranger to suppose that there was a continuous road before him, instead of a dangerous ravine protected by an unlighted fence.

By agreement, the jury was discharged and the case was left to the Judge to decide. The action as originally brought alleged dedication of a road left in a dangerous condition, but the Judge found that there was no evidence of any dedication of the unfinished road to the public, and that it was very difficult to presume dedication from user of a cul-de-sac. He found that the plaintiff was misled by the defendants' neglect of duty in not preventing anyone from driving down the partly finished contractor's road. It was, in his opinion, as plain an instance as one could well find of what was called a trap. If the plaintiff was a trespasser, he was a most unwilling trespasser. The plaintiff had been out for a drive of about 22 miles, and was going a long way round to get home. He had had drinks at two or three places, but there was no evidence that he had consumed sufficient drink to incapacitate himself in any way. The Judge awarded damages as stated.

The defendants appealed.

Mr. Waugh, K.C., and Mr. Paley Scott appeared for the appellants; Mr. Mortimer, K.C., Mr. W. P. Donald, and Mr. G. W. Wrangham for the respondent.

The Court did not call upon counsel for the respondent.

The Master of the Rolls, in giving judgment, said that he would have been quite content to express his concurrence with the judgment of Mr. Justice Salter, but in deference to the argument which had been addressed to the Court he would supplement it with a few observations. It was unnecessary to restate all the facts of the case. The place where the accident happened was in the occupation of the corporation, who were engaged in executing certain works to join up the two portions of Charlotte-road across the ravine through which the river Sheaf ran. He agreed, however, with Mr. Justice Salter that there was no dedication to the public of any of the land so occupied. There was evidence that there was a view straight across the ravine to a considerable rise beyond up to the point where the further portion of Charlotte-road crossed the Midland Railway. The road apparently led straight ahead and a lamp seemed to show that the road continued. From the photographs put in evidence it appeared that any person looking down Charlotte-road from behind Edmund-road might think that he had a continuous stretch of roadway before him. An attempt was made by the defendants to prove that the plaintiff had taken too much drink to drive a motor-car, but the Judge, who saw the witnesses, held that that plea failed, and the Court would not interfere with his decision.

He (the Master of the Rolls) thought that the case had been rightly decided. The accident did not happen on a highway, but that did not dispose of the case if it were found that there was an invitation to go on a private site. The photographs showed clearly that, where the newly constructed section of road continuing Charlotte-road began, part of the kerb had been laid, and a roadway, though not a good one, had been made. If there was an invitation, then the case seemed to fall within the law as stated by Mr. Justice Willes in Corby v. Hill (4 C.B.N.S., 556, at p. 567).

When once the invitee had received and accepted the invitation, he went along the roadway in the confidence that it was safe to pass along it. That made the defendants liable for putting an unexpected obstruction in the path of the invitee. The corporation, when once they had pulled down the old wall at the end of the then existing road, were bound to put up some sort of protection to prevent people going that way from falling into the ravine. They put up a wooden fence which, on a dark night, might easily be mistaken for the roadway, but they placed no light upon it. The question was whether the corporation had taken proper steps to warn the public against the danger of falling into the trap. The answer was that the fence ought to have been lighted with a red lamp.

On the basis of the reasoning in Corby v. Hill (supra), when there was an invitation to the public, there was a duty to light an obstruction after dark. The corporation could not be said to be the agents of the Duchess of Norfolk, as owner of the land, in what they were doing; they were occupying the property in order to do work for their own purposes. There was, in his Lordship's judgment, a duty upon the corporation to fence off the ravine properly, and to light the fence during darkness. The appeal failed and would be dismissed, with costs.

EX PARTE BREWSTER.*

Local Government—Poor law guardian—Alleged disqualification—Patient in hospital maintained out of rates—Payment for cost of treatment—Local Government Act, 1894 (56 and 57 Vict. c. 73), s. 46 (1) (b), (7).

This was an application by Mr. Harry George Brewster, of 187, The Broadway, Bexley Heath, a local government elector in the Bexley Urban District and the Dartford Union, for an order directing the Dartford Guardians to show cause why a writ of mandamus should not issue commanding them to declare vacant under section 46, subsection 1 (b) and subsection 7, of the Local Government Act, 1894, the office of guardian held by Mrs. Ellen Moira Pyne, of Erith, on the ground that, since her election as guardian, she had received "union or parochial relief."

Mr. R. C. Maxwell, for the applicant, said that the ground of the application was that while Mrs. Pyne was a guardian she was a private patient in the King Edward Avenue Hospital, Dartford, which was maintained by the guardians out of the rates. Although she paid the whole cost of her maintenance and treatment, she was technically in the position of a pauper—a view which was accepted by most boards of guardians. An operation was performed on her by her own doctor, who afterwards attended her in the hospital, the anæsthetic being administered by the medical superintendent of the hospital, who was not a whole-time officer, but was paid a separate fee by the guardians for such services. Private patients were not admitted to the hospital if their admission interfered with the treatment of pauper patients.

Mr. Justice Salter, in giving judgment, said that, as the guardians had been paid in full for every privilege and advantage received by Mrs. Pyne at the hospital, there was no evidence on which it could be said that she had received "union or parochial relief" within the meaning of the Act of 1894.

Mr. Justice Talbot agreed.

SONATON PAL v. GALDSTOUN.*

Practice Note.

In dealing with this appeal from Bengal to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, Lord Phillimore, on behalf of that tribunal, made some serious observations in regard to the manner in which the records of the suit and the appeal had been prepared and to the unnecessary inclusion of superfluous documents. His Lordship said:—A very large and cumbrous record has been produced and put before their Lordships, containing, amongst other things, a mass of accounts which were obviously immaterial after the High Court had said that the parties had agreed the accounts between them and had agreed what was due to the plaintiff as a creditor.

The solicitor acting here for the Indian appellant had notice in a letter sent to him by the Registrar of November 3 that "attention would be drawn to the record in this case which contains a large quantity of matter which should not be included and which, as at present advised, should the appellant succeed, I shall not be prepared to allow on taxation."

Their Lordships asked Mr. Narasimham, one of the counsel for the appellants, what he could say about this subject. He pointed out that in Calcutta it was very difficult, if one party contended that the documents should be printed and made part of the record in the case, for the other party to resist it. With that their Lordships are not in agreement. They have the advantage of the assistance of Sir Lancelot Sanderson, who has just returned from India, and they understand that the practice, at any rate in Bengal, and this case comes from Bengal, is well settled. If one party thinks that a document should be printed and the other party thinks it unnecessary, a reference is made to the Registrar of the High Court, who determines, at any rate in the first instance, what should be done. Their Lordships have no reason to suppose that the respondent did desire that these accounts should be made part of the record, but, if he did, the appellant should not have rested content, but should have gone to the Registrar and got a decision as to the usefulness of this mass of accounts.

That is so far as the solicitors in India are concerned. In their Lordships' opinion, if the appellant had succeeded, all those costs would have been disallowed for the reasons given.

But there is another matter on which their Lordships have called for the attendance of the solicitor for the appellants here. It does not follow that, because unnecessary documents have been printed in India, they should be included in the books bound up for their Lordships. It is the duty of the solicitor in this country to make a selection of the necessary documents. The other papers should be ready at hand in case they should be required. In cases of doubt the solicitor should take the advice of counsel on this point, and for this purpose, on application being made, a fee will be allowed.

Their Lordships have intimated the same opinion on other occasions. They have thought it necessary to require the attendance of the solicitor in order to make it quite clear that drastic action will be taken if more care is not used in this matter.

GRAYSON v. GRAYSON.*

Divorce—Wife's prayer for dissolution—Wife guilty of adultery—Discretion of Court—Grant of decree.

In this suit Mr. Denys Henry Harrington Grayson, a shipbuilder, of Beauchamp-place, South Kensington, had petitioned for the dissolution of his marriage with Elsie May Grayson née Jones, of Sloane-street, on the ground of her adultery with a named co-respondent.

By her answer the respondent denied the charges, and by way of counter-charge alleged that the petitioner had committed adultery with Sylvia Ironside, and prayed for the dissolution of her marriage.

The husband's petition had been dismissed and the charges therein struck out.

Mr. Bayford, K.C., and the Hon. Victor Russell appeared for the respondent, who admitted the truth of the charge of adultery contained in her husband's petition and asked the Court to exercise its discretion in her favour.

MR. JUSTICE HILL, in giving judgment, said that this was one of those cases which it would have been impossible to maintain 20 years ago, but the views of the Court as to the circumstances in which its discretion could be exercised had altered enormously in the last few years.

It used to be thought, and he was not sure that there was not a good deal to be said for it, that an injured spouse, who chose to substitute for the legal remedy the remedy of going away with someone else, could not also have the legal remedy.

That view had been modified. One important element now considered was the future of the people, and whether they were likely to marry again or not. The husband was living with a woman, and counsel had said that those two were anxious to marry, and that the husband would never return to his wife, who would not take him back. If he refused a decree the result would be that the wife would remain tied to her husband, an unsatisfactory condition of affairs, and the husband would go on living with the woman with whom he was now, a still more unsatisfactory state of affairs.

He would exercise his discretion, but in so doing he was going as far as he thought he could go. Mrs. Grayson had been seriously wronged by her husband, but she was not compelled to go away with another man. That was her own choice.

His LORDSHIP granted a decree nisi, with costs and the custody of the one child of the marriage.

IN RE BOWER WILLIAMS.*

Bankruptcy—Settlement—Property accruing to settlor — Wife's intestacy — Administration granted to husband—Property accruing to husband in right of wife—Settlement by husband upon child of marriage—Bankruptcy of settlor within two years—Bankruptcy Act, 1914 (4 and 5 Geo. V., c. 59), s. 42.

By s. 42 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, voluntary settlements made within two years of the bankruptcy of the settlor are void as against the trustee in bankruptcy, with certain exceptions, one being "a settlement made on or for the wife or children of the settlor of property which has accrued to the settlor after marriage in right of his wife." A wife who was possessed of certain shares died intestate. Her husband took out administration, settled the shares upon trusts for the daughter of the marriage, and became bankrupt within two years.

Held, that notwithstanding the operation of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, and the independence which it gave to a wife in the holding of her property, the husband had taken the shares jure mariti, or "in right of his wife," and the settlement upon the daughter was not void.

The facts in this appeal from a decision of Mr. Justice Astbury are taken from the judgment of Lord Hanworth, M.R.:—"The husband married his wife on May 20, 1913. On March 30, 1925, she died intestate. On May 9, 1925, the husband took out letters of administration to her estate. On June 4, 1925, the husband made a voluntary settlement, the nature of which was this: there was a daughter of the marriage, and part of the property of the wife consisted of a certain number of shares in a private company, the articles of which contained a clause restricting the transfer of shares except to those who were members of the wife's family, these shares having come to the wife from her father, and, owing to this difficulty of transfer, the husband, having become possessed of the shares, covenanted with the trustees of the settlement to hold them upon trust to pay to the trustees out of the income for the benefit of the daughter during her life the yearly sum of £200 ; as to the balance of the income and the corpus, they were to be for his own benefit. Notice of this settlement was given to the company in July, 1925. Unfortunately the husband got into difficulties, and on April 15, 1926, a receiving order was made against him, and on April 26 he was adjudicated bankrupt.

"Section 42 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, which is in pari materia and almost identical in terms with section 91 of the Act of 1869, provides by subsection (1) that 'Any settlement of property, not being a settlement made before and in consideration of marriage, or made in favour of a purchaser or incumbrancer in good faith and for valuable consideration, or a settlement made on or for the wife or children of the settlor of property which has accrued to the settlor after marriage in right of his wife, shall if the settlor becomes bankrupt within two years after the date of the settlement be void against the trustee in the bankruptcy . . . " subject to certain provisions which I need not recount. Now the trustee in bankruptcy says that the bankrupt has made a settlement, and that he became bankrupt within two years from its date, and hence that it is void as against him. No question arises as to the interest taken by the bankrupt under the settlement, but what is said is that the settlement, so far as the daughter is concerned, is equally void under the section. The answer of the trustees of the settlement is that the operation of the section is excluded in the case of the daughter, because the section excepts settlements made 'on or for the wife or children of the settlor of property which has accrued to the settlor after marriage in right of his wife,' and they say that this property came to the bankrupt only in right of his wife, and that it is a settlement for the child of this marriage. To that the trustee in bankruptcy replies that since the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, although the husband on the wife's intestacy becomes administrator of the wife's estate, yet so far as he takes anything he does not take it in right of his wife, and that under that Act of 1882 the property of a married woman is held completely free from the husband in respect of all rights which formerly accrued to him jure mariti."

Mr. Justice Astbury held that the shares were taken in right of the wife, and dismissed a motion by the trustee in bankruptcy to set aside the settlement. The trustee appealed.

Mr. TINDALE DAVIS, for the appellant, referred to Smart v. Tranter (43 Ch.D., 587) ; Surman v. Wharton (7 The Times L.R., 196 ; [1891] 1 Q.B., 491) ; Cooper v. Macdonald (7 Ch.D., 288) ; and In re Lambert's Estate—Stanton v. Lambert (39 Ch.D., 626).

Mr. F. WHINNEY, for the trustees of the settlement, was not called upon.

The MASTER OF THE ROLLS, after stating the facts, as set out above :—The question, therefore, is whether the property settled is property which accrued to the husband in right of his wife. There is no question as to its being for a child, or its accruing after marriage, so in effect we have only to construe the meaning of those five words "in right of his wife." Counsel, in the course of an interesting argument, said that those words were only retained in the Act to meet the case where there had been a marriage before the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, and that in all cases where the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, operates there is no scope for the words of the section. It becomes, therefore, necessary to see what was and is the position of a husband. It appears to me that the point raised has been decided by a case which is binding on this Court, but in deference to the argument which has been addressed to the Court I will call attention to the position of the matter historically. It appears that originally an administrator took beneficially such residue as fell into his hands. The Statute of Distributions altered the law as to administrators generally, and removed that loose privilege, and a doubt arose whether the husband's rights in respect of the wife's property were cut away if he acted as administrator of his wife's estate. Consequently by the Statute of Frauds, section 24, it was provided that neither the Statute of Distributions "nor anything therein contained shall be construed to extend to the estates of feme-coverts that shall die intestate, but that their husbands may demand and have administration of their rights, credits and other personal estates and recover and enjoy the same as they might have done before the making of the said Act." That means that the husband, as administrator of his wife, took all the property that he was entitled to take jure mariti, and he got the legal title by the grant of administration. But what was the relation of the husband to the wife's property which lay outside the hands of the wife when she died ? I am reading from Lush on Husband and Wife, 3rd edition, page 66, where he says : "Marriage was only a qualified gift to the husband of the wife's choses in action. It depended upon himself whether he made them his absolute property or not. If he brought the outstanding fund under his own exclusive control and dominion, by obtaining payment or otherwise—if, as it was said, he 'reduced it into possession'—during the coverture, the wife's right was gone. But if he did not, her choses in action remained her property, and upon the husband's death in her lifetime she was entitled to them as against his legal personal representative."

Now here we have got shares which are choses in action, and the husband would have to take out administration to bring them into his hands. We have been referred to two cases in which the property was not reduced into possession during marriage, and in which the wife held it after the Married Women's Property Act, 1882. Mr. Justice Stirling, in In re Lambert's Estate—Stanton v. Lambert (39 Ch.D., 626), after dealing with the two Acts to which I have referred, said this (at p. 630) : "Accordingly the husband, when living, was absolutely entitled to be the administrator of his wife. After his death, however, there were cases in which the Ecclesiastical Court considered itself bound to grant administration to the next of kin of the wife. Nevertheless, in equity, the title of the husband prevailed, and the administrator of the wife was held to be a trustee for the legal personal representative of the husband." (Then he cites cases and continues): "The equitable interest of the husband vested on the death of the wife, and passed not merely to his legal personal representatives but to his assignees in bankruptcy." Now what is the effect of that ? It is said that though by the Statute of Frauds he is entitled to be administrator, yet what he takes he takes as administrator, that he does not take anything which reaches him jure mariti, as husband. It is said that that is how the situation has been completely altered since 1882, that the right of the husband now is no more than the statutory right to be administrator, and that that does not fulfil the words of section 42 : "in right of his wife."

In Smart v. Tranter (43 Ch. D., 587) Lord Lindley, in a judgment which is binding upon us, said (at p. 596): "It is clear that since the Statute of Frauds if the husband takes out administration he can get the reversionary choses in action of the wife ; but if he does not, the Statute of Frauds does not in terms apply. That doubt was raised and solved very early in the case of Cart v. Rees, which is stated in the following terms by the Lord Chancellor Cowper when giving judgment in Squib v. Wyn (1 P. Wms., 378, at p. 381) : 'A wife died possessed of choses in action, and the husband survived, and died without taking out letters of administration to his wife, after which the next of kin of the wife administered to her, and Lord Parker held that the administrator to the wife was but a trustee for the executor of the husband, the right to the wife's choses in action being, by the Statute of Distributions, vested in the husband as next of kin to the wife ; and whereas there is a proviso in 29 Charles II. saying that the Statute of Distributions shall not extend to the estates of feme coverts that die intestate, but that their husbands may have administration of their personal estate as before the making the Act, his Lordship said this clause was made in favour of the husband and not to his prejudice ; so that it was intended by the Parliament that the husband should be within the Statute of Distributions, so as to take the wife's choses in action as to his benefit, but should not be within the same as to his prejudice ; and that this was not a new point, but had been settled, and upon very good reason; for were the construction to be otherwise, the husband of the wife intestate would be in a worse case than the next of kin, though ever so remote, which was not the intent of the statute.'" That shows very clearly that the relation of husband and wife secures that administration shall be granted to the husband, and, if it be granted to a person other than the husband, that person would hold for the husband ; because the beneficial interest in the wife's property vested in him on her death, though certain steps had to be gone through, because he was entitled to be treated as being in a higher position than next of kin for the reason that he was the husband. So I think that here the husband takes because he is the husband, not because he is the administrator. I think the judgments of Lord Justice Cotton and Lord Lindley both make that clear. A little further on Lord Lindley says (39 Ch.D., at p. 596) : "There is now no doubt as regards the choses in action of the wife not reduced into possession during the coverture that if the husband survives he is beneficially entitled to them. If he takes out letters of administration he is entitled to them at law and in equity, but if he does not take out letters of administration the legal personal representative of the wife is the person to get them in, but, having got them in, holds them in trust for the husband. That appears to me to be the law as settled ever since the case in Peere Williams."

For these reasons, and because that case is binding on this Court, it appears to me that we must hold that the beneficial interest in these shares accrued to the bankrupt in right of his wife, and therefore the settlement on the daughter remains good. The appeal therefore fails and must be dismissed.

Lord Justice Sargant stated the facts, and continued : The sole question is whether the property was property which had accrued to the bankrupt "in right of his wife," and it is conceded that all the words of the exception are satisfied except those words. The Judge below has decided that the property accrued in right of the wife, and in my opinion he was right in so holding. It was argued against this that the bankrupt did not take the property in right of his wife by virtue of his title as her husband, but because he had constituted himself administrator of his wife's estate. I think that this is not so. I think that that is shown by Smart v. Tranter (43 Ch.D., 587) and In re Lambert's Estate (39 Ch.D., 626), where it is recognized that on the death of the wife intestate the husband at once became entitled to the full beneficial interest in the choses of the wife, and the process of taking out administration was only a process of bringing into possession. It was only a method of completing his legal title, and had no bearing on any beneficial interest in the property. The beneficial title is the main thing that we have to consider, but, even if we have to regard the taking out of administration as an essential step, those two cases show that the right which the husband got to take out administration was because he was the husband of his deceased wife, and so that does not prevent the husband from being entitled to the property in right of his wife. Counsel sought to limit the jus mariti to a right which the husband exercises during coverture, but, in my view, the term "jus mariti" also includes the rights which a husband may have on her decease, including the right to take out letters of administration in order to get possession of her property. If, as I think, the husband, as husband, has a right to get the property of his wife, it is impossible to say that he does not get it in right of his wife. The appeal must be dismissed.

Lord Justice Lawrence.—It is not disputed that the beneficial interest in the shares vested in the bankrupt, but it was strenuously contended that because since 1882 the husband took no interest in the property during the wife's lifetime he was only entitled to the beneficial interest which he took by being executor. It is said that those words in section 42 do not apply to property so acquired by a husband. I think there is no authority which binds the Court to confine the language of section 42 in that way. I think the property accrued to the settlor solely by virtue of his position as husband surviving his wife, and therefore was property which accrued to him "in right of his wife" within the ordinary meaning of the words. I think the appeal should be dismissed.

REX v. KENT JUSTICES—EX PARTE TRIPLOW.*

Justices — Landlord and tenant—Application under Small Tenements Recovery Act, 1838—Concurrent jurisdiction in County Court—Practice of justices not to hear such applications—General rule—Mandamus.

An order in the nature of a mandamus to justices to hear and determine an application under the Small Tenements Recovery Act, 1838, was made absolute when it appeared that the justices had made a general rule not to hear such applications on the ground that the County Court was a more suitable forum for cases which not infrequently raise difficult questions of law.

This was a rule nisi for an order in the nature of a mandamus to justices of the Sittingbourne Petty

* Reported by J. W. Hall, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Sessional Division of Kent to hear and determine the matter of an application by Frank Triplow under the Small Tenements Recovery Act, 1838, for possession of a cottage in the occupation of one Wheatley.

All the material circumstances leading up to the refusal of the justices are set out in the judgment of the Lord Chief Justice.

Mr. A. L. B. Thesiger showed cause; Mr. Elliot Gorst supported the rule.

The Lord Chief Justice.—This is a rule nisi for an order in the nature of a mandamus to certain justices of the county of Kent to hear and determine pursuant to the statutes in that behalf the matter of an application under section 1 of the Small Tenements Recovery Act, 1838, for possession of a small tenement known as No. 3, Duvards-place, Borden, in the said county, upon the grounds that the tenement was within the jurisdiction of the said justices, and that the justices were wrong in law in refusing to hear the said application. In my opinion the case is perfectly clear. It is common ground that the tenement was within the jurisdiction of the justices; the question is whether they refused to hear the case. Two classes of material are put forward to show that they refused—first, a report in the first person from the East Kent Gazette, from which it appears that as counsel was opening the applicant's case the Chairman interrupted and asked if there had been any application to the County Court. Counsel said that there had been an application, but under a different Act, and this was a different set of facts and a speedier method of justice. The Chairman then said: "This Court, as a rule, does not deal with these things. They should go to the County Court. This case has been examined by the County Court Judge?" Mr. Gorst replied: "Yes. It was before him on a certificate from the County Agricultural Committee." The magistrates' clerk interposed: "And it was adjourned for the plaintiff to get it?" Mr. Gorst: "And he got it. The facts were entirely different from what will come before you." The Chairman: "The attitude of this Court is that these cases should go to the County Court, and, in my opinion, it is better that they should. The County Court Judge knows better than we do. If he has turned it down I don't think this Court ought to deal with it." Mr. Gorst: "Does the Bench not wish to hear this case?" The Chairman: "That is our attitude. We do not care on what grounds it was turned down by the County Court Judge." Mr. Gorst: "Very well, I can't press it."

That is to say, that because two years before upon some facts there had been an unsuccessful application to the County Court, this application was not to be heard. That extract makes it clear that the refusal to hear was not based upon special facts relating to the individual case, but on a general rule adopted by the justices with reference to a class of cases. If there were any doubt it would be made clear from the letter of the Clerk to the Justices, which was the second matter put forward in support of this rule. Writing to the applicant's solicitor in reply to an inquiry as to a convenient date for the hearing of the application, the clerk says: "My justices have for many years decided not to entertain applications in ejectment, holding the view that as the County Court has concurrent jurisdiction disputes affecting the law of landlord and tenant can be better dealt with in that Court, which is presided over by a Judge trained in law." It is not necessary to enlarge upon the matter; it seems as clear as can be that the justices declined to hear this application in pursuance of a general rule, which they are not entitled to do. The rule must accordingly be made absolute.

Mr. Justice Avory.—I agree that the conduct of the justices in this case, however excellent and well-intentioned their motives, amounted to a declining of jurisdiction. There may be good reasons why a landlord should seek his remedy under this statute rather than in the County Court—e.g., that justices sit more frequently than the County Court. In some cases it may be absolutely necessary to seek the speediest remedy; if, for instance, the tenant is guilty of wilful waste. Upon proof of the necessary facts it becomes the duty of the justices to issue their warrant.

Mr. Justice Salter.—I agree. We have nothing to do with the merits. The justices must hear this application and enforce the legal rights of the parties, whatever they may turn out to be.

REX v. POSTMASTER-GENERAL—EX PARTE CARMICHAEL.*

Master and Servant—Compensation for injury by accident—Industrial disease—Substitution of departmental surgeon for certifying surgeon—Workman on capitation list of local medical officer—Certificate by chief medical officer—"Medical officer under whose charge the workman is placed"—Certiorari—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925 (15 and 16 Geo. V., c. 84), ss. 43 (1) (f), 44 (3).

By s. 44 (3) of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925, "In such cases, and subject to such conditions as the Secretary of State may direct, a medical practitioner appointed by the Secretary of State for the purpose shall have the powers and duties of a certifying surgeon under the foregoing provisions of this part of this Act. . . ." Under the power now contained in this subsection the Secretary of State made regulations of which the material one was: "In the application of the provisions of the said section to telegraphist's cramp, so far as regards a workman employed by the Postmaster-General, the Post Office medical officer under whose charge the workman is placed shall, if authorized to act for the purposes of the said section by the Postmaster-General, be substituted for the certifying surgeon."

C., a telegraphist employed by the Postmaster-General, was on the capitation list of the local Post Office medical officer at Grimsby. She complained that she had telegraphist's cramp; in accordance with the regulations of the department, the case was referred to the chief medical officer, who had special knowledge of telegraphist's cramp. The chief medical officer certified that C. was not suffering from tele-graphist's cramp. C. obtained a rule nisi for a certiorari to quash the certificate.

Held, (1) that the chief medical officer was not the medical officer "under whose charge C. was placed," and that he was not entitled to give a certificate; (2) that the granting of a certificate was in the nature of a judicial act in respect of which certiorari would lie; (3) that an appeal to a medical referee under s. 43 of the Act was not equally beneficial, since the referee's concurrence with the chief medical officer's certificate would be conclusive, whereas the certificate was a nullity; (4) (per Avory, J.), that whether an appeal was equally beneficial or not, C. being a party aggrieved, certiorari would go ex debito justitiæ at her instance.

This was a rule nisi for a certiorari to bring up and quash a certificate of Colonel H. V. Prynne, chief medical officer of the Post Office, purporting to be given under section 44 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925, whereby he certified that Mrs. Carmichael, the applicant, was not suffering from telegraphist's cramp.

The facts, the grounds of the rule, and the relevant sections of statutes and orders are fully set out in the judgment.

Mr. W. Shakespeare showed cause; Mr. Horton-Smith supported the rule.

The Lord Chief Justice.—This is an order nisi for a writ of certiorari directed to the Postmaster-General to remove into this Court a certificate purporting to be made and issued by one Colonel H. V. Prynne and dated September 25, 1926, whereby it was certified that one Ethel Carmichael was not suffering from the disease known as telegraphist's cramp.

The grounds upon which the rule was granted were as follow:—"That the said Colonel H. V. Prynne was not the Post Office medical officer under whose charge the workman was or ever had been placed, and therefore could not be authorized by the Postmaster-General to act for the purposes of sections 43-44 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925, and could not be substituted for the certifying surgeon, and therefore had no jurisdiction to act for the purposes of the said sections, and accordingly had no jurisdiction to issue the said or any certificate thereunder."

The matter has taken a considerable time in argument, but the point of it can, I think, be quite shortly stated. Under the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925, it is provided as follows by section 44, subsection (3): "In such cases"—that is, cases referred to in the two previous subsections under "Industrial Diseases"—"and subject to such conditions as the Secretary of State may direct, a medical practitioner appointed by the Secretary of State for the purpose shall have the powers and duties of a certifying surgeon under the foregoing provisions of this Part of this Act and those provisions shall be construed accordingly." In pursuance of this power, which was originally contained in s. 8 (5) of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, the Secretary of State in February, 1918, made an order which, so far as is relevant to the present matter, contained this paragraph, numbered 5:—"In the application of the provisions of the said section to telegraphist's cramp, so far as regards a workman employed by the Postmaster-General, the Post Office medical officer under whose charge the workman is placed shall, if authorized to act for the purposes of the said section by the Postmaster-General, be substituted for the certifying surgeon." The topic dealt with in that paragraph of that order is obviously a topic of the greatest possible importance to the workman concerned. In the ordinary case under the Workmen's Compensation Acts, the workman, by evidence, proves the happening of an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment, and proves injury; but in this particular matter of industrial diseases the first step, and it is a condition precedent to any right to recover compensation, is the certificate of a duly certifying surgeon. The statute, notwithstanding these orders, contemplates, and quite naturally contemplates, that the certifying surgeon shall be a totally independent person. The taxpayer's money which is to be paid in compensation is to be controlled in this respect, not by a departmental official, but by a perfectly independent certifying surgeon, unless the steps are taken which this paragraph under this order indicates. What are those steps? The Post Office medical officer may be substituted for the certifying surgeon if, and only if, two conditions are fulfilled: (1) If he is the medical officer under whose charge the workman is placed, and (2) if he is authorized to act for the purposes of this Part of the Act by the Postmaster-General.

In the present case, Mrs. Carmichael had been for a long time employed as a telegraphist. She had been employed at most of the material time at Grimsby and for part of the time in Hull, and although under the system adopted by the Post Office every Post Office worker, apparently, is on the capitation list of some medical adviser or other, whose services may be obtained by the Post Office worker without the payment of fees, Mrs. Carmichael for some reason did not consult the medical officer upon whose capitation list she was; she preferred for some reason the services of her own private medical practitioner. But she was, as the documents show, upon a capitation list, and there was a person who, wherever she was, whether at Grimsby or elsewhere, stood to her in the relation of the local medical officer to a Post Office servant. A time came when she complained that she was suffering from telegraphist's cramp, and thereupon, in the circumstances set out in Colonel Prynne's affidavit, he made an examination: he came to the conclusion that she was not suffering from telegraphist's cramp, and in the certificate which is here complained of he stated that opinion.

The first question is: Was Colonel Prynne the Post Office medical officer under whose charge Mrs. Carmichael had been placed. Colonel Prynne has sworn a long affidavit in which he sets out with the greatest clearness the steps which he took in the matter. It is quite clear that when a certain stage was reached he did play the part of a consultant, but I am not in the smallest degree satisfied that he was at any time the Post Office medical officer under whose charge Mrs. Carmichael was placed. Nor am I in the smallest degree satisfied that he was authorized to act for the purpose of the section by the Postmaster-General. When the question arose the solicitor to Mrs. Carmichael very pointedly, and in repeated letters, inquired as to Colonel Prynne's authority, and at length, on October 7, 1926, the solicitor to the Post Office wrote saying this: "Colonel Prynne's authority to act in this case rests on his position as Chief Medical Officer, as explained in my letter of September 25, and the fact that the case was referred to him. There is no specific document of which I could send you a copy."

In other words, Colonel Prynne was the chief medical officer, he had some special knowledge of telegraphist's cramp, and the case was referred to him. But that is a totally different thing from authorizing him to act for the purposes of this section. In my opinion, on the true construction of this part of this order the medical officer referred to is the ordinary local medical officer under whose charge the workman is placed. It does not follow that the medical officer must be the person to give the certificate. Ordinarily the person who gives the certificate will still be the certifying surgeon ; but if the Postmaster-General desired somebody within the area of the Post Office service to be substituted for the certifying surgeon, that person must be, I think, the medical officer under whose charge the workman is placed, not ad hoc, but the medical officer under whose charge in the ordinary sense the workman is placed. That view of the matter is, I think, greatly fortified when one looks at the manual for the use of Post Office medical officers. Here it is provided, I observe, in rule 6, at pages 2 and 3 : " The duties of a Post Office medical officer are briefly as follows." There are 10 of them. No. 9 is, " To act as certifying surgeon under section 8 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, so far as regards Post Office servants who are suffering from telegraphist's cramp." Although rule 57, which relates to the whole subject of telegraphist's cramp, has been amended by successive additions, including the rather interesting addition that in cases of doubt the chief medical officer should be consulted and the case should not be referred to a specialist or consultant not connected with the Post Office, the rule nevertheless retains its original provision that when all the various steps have been taken the medical officer will then be asked to give a certificate of disablement in the form prescribed by the Act, the form being supplied by the secretary as required, with any necessary instructions.

In those circumstances I am satisfied, first, that Colonel Prynne was not the Post Office medical officer under whose charge Mrs. Carmichael was placed, and, secondly, that he was not authorized to act for the purposes of this part of the statute by the Postmaster-General. He therefore could not be substituted for the certifying surgeon. It follows that the certificate to which he has put his name is so much waste paper.

There was a moment in this case when it was argued that the document was of such a kind as not to be proper for the writ of certiorari. But I am satisfied, when I look at the part which a certificate of this nature must play in the making of any claim for compensation by a Post Office worker suffering from telegraphist's cramp, that the certificate of the certifying surgeon is of the nature of a judicial act, and is a fit subject for certiorari. I think, therefore, that the position of Mrs. Carmichael is that she has never received or been given the opportunity of receiving a certificate from the only surgeon who could lawfully give a certificate. But it is said that she is not in the least damaged by that fact, if a fact it be, for the reason that the statute provides for an appeal, and it is quite true when one looks at section 43 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925, subsection (1) (f), that in the cases with which that section is dealing the machinery of appeal is provided. The words are : " If an employer or a workman is aggrieved by the action of a certifying or other surgeon in giving or refusing to give a certificate of disablement or in suspending or refusing to suspend a workman for the purposes of this section, the matter shall in accordance with regulations made by the Secretary of State be referred to a medical referee, whose decision shall be final, and the medical referee, when deciding the matter, shall also certify as to the condition of the workman at the time when he is examined by him, and such certificate by the medical referee shall be conclusive."

The argument which has been urged against this rule on this point is that even though it be assumed that Colonel Prynne's so-called certificate is a mere nothing, nevertheless Mrs. Carmichael is not damnified, because she can appeal to the medical referee as if there had been a refusal to give a certificate. I do not think that is the true view. This section, in my opinion, assumes that one of two things has happened : either that there has been a refusal to give a certificate, in which case the medical referee starts with a clean sheet, or that if there has been a certificate granted it has been granted by someone who was authorized to grant it. I do not think that it was contemplated at all that the judgment of the medical referee should in the smallest degree be fettered or influenced by a certificate given by a wholly unauthorized person, and I do not think that Mrs. Carmichael would be in the same position before the medical referee as that in which she would have been if there had been a refusal on the part of the proper officer to give her any certificate at all. This certificate, made as it is, if it is not correct, may very well have a misleading effect. I do not think, therefore, that the argument that the beneficial remedy of appeal is open is at all fatal to the applicant for this rule.

Some further points were taken, but I do not think it is necessary to take up time by referring to them. Certainly I shall not express any opinion upon the powers which this Act confers or the particular mode in which they are conferred. Those are topics not for this Court but for other persons. But wide as these powers are, autocratic as the exercise of them may be, I do not think that they open the door to the particular piece of autocracy with which we are in this case concerned. I think, therefore, that this rule ought to be made absolute, and that this pretended certificate ought to be quashed.

Mr. Justice Avory.—I do not differ from the view that this certificate, being a condition precedent to the right of the workman to claim compensation, may be a proper subject for a writ of certiorari, but I have entertained considerable doubt in this case whether the applicant here was not a person under the charge of the chief medical officer of the Post Office within the meaning of the regulation No. 5 which has been quoted. In view of the letter of October 7, 1926, which refers back to the letter of September 25, 1926, I am not prepared to differ from the view which my Lord has expressed that there is not here sufficient to show that she ever was under the charge of the chief medical officer within the meaning of that regulation. The letter of September 25, 1926, states that the chief medical officer is authorized to act for the purpose of the said section by the Postmaster-General. I am inclined to think that that is established, that he was authorized to act for the purpose by the Postmaster-General. But it goes on : " He is specially charged with all cases of alleged telegraphist's cramp, and he is therefore normally the proper person to fulfil the functions of certifying surgeons." I think there is a fallacy there in saying that because he is charged with all cases of alleged telegraphist's cramp he is therefore the proper person to fulfil the functions of certifying surgeons. On the whole, as I say, I do not differ from the view that she was not in the circumstances under the charge of the chief medical officer, and consequently that he had no authority to give this certificate which he did give in this particular case.

I have also entertained considerable doubt whether any practical advantage is to be gained by the applicant in this case if this rule is made absolute, in view of the provisions of section 43, subsection (1) (f), of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925. I have, throughout the argument, certainly entertained the view that the section gives the applicant all the relief which she can require, and that she might under that section have the matter determined by the medical referee, whose decision would be final as to whether she is in fact suffering from this disease or complaint. But, even if that remedy is open to her, it is undoubtedly good law that, if the application for a certiorari is made by a party aggrieved, then it ought to be granted ex debito justitiæ, and the Court has not a general discretion which it would have when the application is made by one of the public who is not personally concerned. That was decided long ago in the case of Rex v. Surrey Justices (L.R., 5 Q.B., 466), and on that principle, even although she has the remedy by appeal in this case, I am prepared to agree that the certiorari should go, seeing that the application is being made by the applicant as the party aggrieved.

Mr. Justice Salter.—I agree that this rule should be made absolute. Where a workman has contracted a scheduled disease and is thereby disabled, and the disease is due to the employment, he is entitled to compensation as though he had met with an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment; but only if he can obtain from the proper medical officer a certificate of two matters: that he has contracted the disease, and that he is thereby disabled. That is the first essential step to obtaining compensation, and, if he can obtain that certificate, then prima facie, and subject to appeal, he is entitled to compensation. I agree with the other members of the Court that Colonel Prynne was not the Post Office medical officer under whose charge the workman was placed.

I do not think that I can derive very much assistance by a study of the manual. It shows how the Post Office authorities read these words. So far as it goes, it appears to support the view that this Court is taking. The normal certifying officer is the certifying surgeon under the Factory Acts. In the case of telegraphist's cramp, when contracted by postal servants, there is a right to substitute a Post Office medical officer for the certifying surgeon. For that right there are two conditions: the person appointed must be the Post Office medical officer under whose charge the workman is placed, and he must be authorized to act under the statute by the Postmaster-General. The mere fact that he is the medical officer under whose charge the workman is placed does not entitle him to certify, nor can the Postmaster-General appoint in lieu of the certifying surgeon any Post Office medical officer except the medical officer under whose charge the workman is placed.

Having regard to a letter of October 7, 1926, I share my Lord's doubts as to whether Colonel Prynne ever was in fact authorized to act, but, whether he was or not, I am quite clear that he never was the medical officer under whose charge Mrs. Carmichael was placed. The certificate, therefore, in my view, is invalid, and I agree with my Lord and Mr. Justice Avory that it is a judicial decision, to which a proceeding by way of certiorari would apply. Prima facie, therefore, it ought to be set aside.

The point about which I have entertained doubt is the remaining one, namely, the question of appeal. The Act provides by s. 43 (1) (f) that if an employer or a workman is aggrieved by the action of a certifying or other surgeon in giving or refusing to give a certificate of disablement, there shall be an appeal to the medical referee, whose decision shall be final. I think the words "or other surgeon" refer to a surgeon who may be substituted under section 44, subsection (3), of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925. But I take it that the paragraph to which I have referred, section 43, subsection (1) (f), of the Act of 1925, assumes that there has been a grant or a refusal of a certificate by an officer authorized by law to grant or to refuse.

On appeal to the medical referee the medical correctness of the grant or refusal can be challenged, but its validity cannot be. The medical referee could not entertain the question whether the officer who purported to certify or refuse to certify was qualified by law to do so. If Mrs. Carmichael were to succeed in the appeal, and the medical referee were to differ from the diagnosis of Colonel Prynne, I have very little doubt that the Postmaster-General would pay, although I have a good deal of doubt whether he would be legally bound to pay. But, if the medical referee should agree with Colonel Prynne, then the applicant's claim would be finally defeated; and, in my opinion, that would not be a satisfactory result, because, in my view, she never has become a certified claimant and never has taken the first step necessary to entitle her to compensation. If she were now to go to the proper medical officer and ask for a certificate, I think her position might be gravely compromised, and his position rendered difficult by the existence of this embarrassing certificate.

I agree, for the reasons given, that the certificate should be quashed.

CRACK v. HOLT.*

Hackney Carriages—Licence—Plying for hire—Omnibus—Taking up in private yard—Town Police Clauses Act, 1847 (10 and 11 Vict., c. 89), s. 45—Town Police Clauses Act, 1889 (52 and 53 Vict., c. 14), ss. 3, 4 (1).

Section 45 of the Town Police Clauses Act, 1847, makes it an offence for the proprietor of any carriage to permit it to be used as a hackney carriage plying for hire within the prescribed distance without a licence. By s. 4 (1) of the Town Police Clauses Act, 1889, "The several terms 'hackney carriages,' 'hackney coach,' 'carriages,' and 'carriage,' whenever used in sections thirty-seven, forty to fifty-two (both inclusive), fifty-four, fifty-eight, and sixty to sixty-seven (both inclusive) of the principal Act [the Act of 1847] shall, notwithstanding anything contained in section thirty-eight of that Act, be deemed to include every omnibus." By s. 3 of the Act of 1889, "The term 'omnibus,' where used in this Act, shall include every omnibus, charabanc, wagonette, brake, stage-coach, and other carriage plying or standing for hire by or used to carry passengers at separate fares to, from, or in any part of the prescribed distance ; but shall not include . . . any omnibus starting from outside the prescribed distance, and bringing passengers within the prescribed distance, and not standing or plying for hire within the prescribed distance."

Held, that under the above enactments an omnibus is required to have a licence when plying for hire anywhere within the prescribed distance, even in a private yard.

These were two cases stated by the Hull stipendiary magistrate.

The appellant, Frederic Edward Crack, a police inspector, preferred an information under section 45 of the Town Police Clauses Act, 1847, and section 3 of the Town Police Clauses Act, 1889, against John Charles Holt, of Newport, Gilberdyke, for that he, on July 16, 1926, then being the proprietor of a certain omnibus, unlawfully did permit such omnibus to be used as an omnibus plying for hire within the prescribed distance of the city and county of Kingston-upon-Hull without having obtained a licence to ply for hire. The information was heard and dismissed on September 29, 1926.

A similar information on the same facts was preferred against Reginald Sportan Holt, the son of John Charles Holt, for driving the omnibus, and that information was also dismissed. The cases stated were, mutatis mutandis, identical and were taken together.

The Town Police Clauses Act, 1847, section 45, provides:—

"If the proprietor or part proprietor of any carriage, or any person so concerned as aforesaid, permits the same to be used as a hackney carriage plying for hire within the prescribed distance without having obtained a licence . . . or if any person be found driving, standing, or plying for hire with any carriage within the prescribed distance, for which such licence as aforesaid has not been previously obtained . . . every such person so offending shall for every such offence be liable to a penalty not exceeding 40s."

The Town Police Clauses Act, 1889, brings omnibuses within the rules relating to hackney carriages, and, by section 3, provides:—

"The term 'omnibus' where used in this Act shall include—every omnibus, charabanc, wagonette, brake, stagecoach, and other carriage, plying or standing for hire by or used to carry passengers at separate fares to, from, or in any part of the prescribed distance ; but shall not include . . . any carriage starting from and previously hired for the particular passengers thereby carried at any livery stable yard (within the prescribed distance) whereat horses are stabled and carriages let for hire, the said carriage starting from the said stable yard and being bona fide the property of the occupier thereof, and not standing or plying for hire within the prescribed distance . . . any omnibus starting from outside the prescribed distance, and bringing passengers within the prescribed distance, and not standing or plying for hire within the prescribed distance."

The following facts were proved or admitted:—

The respondent, J. C. Holt, was the owner of a motor-omnibus, driven by his son, R. S. Holt, on the instructions of his father, for which no licence to ply for hire had been granted by the Corporation of Hull, the licensing authority, for the prescribed distance, which was the area of the city and county of Kingston-upon-Hull.

On July 16, 1926, at about 10.30 a.m., the omnibus was, on the instructions of the respondent, J. C. Holt, standing in a yard in Carr-lane, Hull, which was the private property of a Mr. Lockey, who had for about 12 months permitted the respondent to use his yard in this way on payment of 7s. 6d. a week. Mr. Lockey was a jobmaster, and had stabling for horses and vehicles in the yard. The omnibus had the word "Newport" lettered on the front window. Six passengers mounted the omnibus, which had a seating capacity of 14, one handing to R. S. Holt money for a fare. R. S. Holt then drove the omnibus into the streets of Hull, the respondent, J. C. Holt, who was sitting by him, alighting within the city boundary after the vehicle had travelled some short distance.

No passengers alighted, and no further passengers mounted the omnibus until it had passed outside the boundary of the city of Hull. Outside the city passengers alighted at various points and others got on board. As the passengers got off they paid their fares, save the one who had already paid on the omnibus in Mr. Lockey's yard.

A passenger who travelled from the yard to Newport (outside the city) was told by R. S. Holt on alighting that the fare was 1s. 6d. single or 3s. return. He then paid 3s. for the return fare, no ticket being given him. About 1 p.m. the last-mentioned passenger mounted the omnibus for the return journey. There were five other passengers then on board, one of whom alighted outside the city boundary and paid his fare. Six other passengers got on to the omnibus before the city boundary was reached. After passing within the city boundary one of the passengers alighted, and a person got on who was not invited by R. S. Holt to do so, nor was he observed by R. S. Holt to have done so.

On arriving at Mr. Lockey's yard all the passengers alighted, and also the person last mentioned, R. S. Holt receiving payment from the former, but refusing to take a fare from the latter, whom he did not recognize as having any right to be a passenger.

The omnibus usually did three journeys of a similar character each day and four on Saturdays. R. S. Holt, by his father's instructions, did not invite or seek for passengers while the omnibus was passing along the streets within the prescribed distance.

The appellant contended that J. C. Holt, in permitting his son to convey passengers for reward from Mr. Lockey's yard to places outside Hull and from places outside Hull into Hull, was permitting the omnibus to be used as an omnibus plying for hire within the prescribed distance without a licence.

The respondent, J. C. Holt, contended that in view of the fact that his instructions to his son, R. S. Holt, were that he was not to invite or take up passengers in the streets of Hull, but only in Mr. Lockey's private yard, he could not be held to have been permitting his omnibus to ply for hire within the prescribed distance.

The magistrate's attention was directed to the following cases (among others) :—Birmingham and Midland Motor Omnibus Company v. Thompson ([1918] 2 K.B., 105) ; Clarke v. Stanford (L.R., 6 Q.B., 357).

Inasmuch as there had been no previous hiring of the omnibus for any particular passengers, and further as the omnibus was not the property of the occupier of the livery stable yard (Mr. Lockey), the magistrate was of opinion that the respondent was not entitled to the benefit of the exception created by section 3 of the Town Police Clauses Act, 1889. But being of opinion that, R. S. Holt having carried out the respondent's instructions only to take up passengers in a private yard and not to invite or seek for passengers in the streets within the prescribed distance, the respondent J. C. Holt had not permitted the omnibus to be used as an omnibus plying for hire within the prescribed distance, the magistrate dismissed the information, with £3 13s. costs.

Mr. G. R. Mitchison appeared for the appellant; Mr. C. Paley Scott for the respondent in each case.

The Lord Chief Justice.—The question upon which the opinion of the Court is desired is whether, upon the statement of facts set out in the case, the magistrate came to a correct determination in point of law—in other words, whether it was open to him on those facts to come to any conclusion except that an offence had been committed.

It is tolerably clear that the case in the Court below turned upon the fact that the omnibus started from a private yard and did not seek or accept passengers in the streets of Hull. It appears to me that the case is clearly covered by authority. It was held in Birmingham and Midland Motor Omnibus Company v. Thompson ([1918] 2 K.B., 105) that an omnibus was required to have a licence when plying for hire anywhere within the prescribed distance, whether in a public street or not.

In that case Mr. Justice Avory said: "It is to be observed that by section 3 of the Act of 1889 the term 'omnibus' is to include, among other things, a 'stagecoach and other carriage plying or standing for hire by or used to carry passengers at separate fares.' Such a stagecoach was expressly excluded from the operation of the Act of 1847, and I think it is matter of common knowledge that at that date stagecoaches more often than not started from and took in their passengers in the private yard of an inn; from which it is plain that the Legislature thought that but for such express exclusion a stagecoach would have come within the operation of the Act notwithstanding that it did not ply for hire in a street. In the later Act the Legislature when expressly including a stagecoach must equally be taken to have done so in view of the fact that stagecoaches usually started on their journey, as I have said, from the yard of some inn as distinguished from a street. . . . I should like to add that if it were necessary to discuss the question whether these omnibuses were under the circumstances plying for hire in a street I should have liked further time to consider it. I am not satisfied that it has been decided in any previous case that under such circumstances as those of the present—namely, the gate of the yard being open, placards and notices directing the public to the yard and the omnibuses being visible from the street—these omnibuses might not properly be said to be plying for hire in a street; but it is not necessary to decide that, and I postpone the expression of any opinion upon it." And in the case of Clarke v. Stanford (L.R., 6 Q.B., 357), which was a case dealing with a carriage whilst on the premises of a railway company, under a contract with them to await the arrival of their trains, for the conveyance of any passenger by railway who chose to hire it, it was held that the carriage was plying for hire, and must be licensed. In that case Chief Justice Cockburn said: "I think this case is clearly within the statute. The owner and driver of this carriage were rightly convicted, as the carriage was plying for hire. In Case v. Storey (L.R., 4 Ex., 319) the question turned upon a different statute, and the decision was that under that statute there must be a plying for hire in a public place; this case is, therefore, not governed by that decision. The words of the present statute 'plying for hire' are satisfied by the facts which exist in the present case. . . . I assume that the use of the carriage is confined to the purposes of the passengers coming by railway; still, that is a plying for hire."

That case dealt with a vehicle on the premises of a railway company. Those cases make it quite clear that what was done in the present case was a plying for hire in the prescribed area. It is, indeed, an a fortiori case; for in Clarke v. Stanford (supra) the vehicle was available only for persons arriving as passengers by a particular train; here it was waiting for anyone who might choose to come to the yard. The stipendiary magistrate has misdirected himself, and the case must be remitted to him with a direction to convict. His attention has been too exclusively directed to the fact that the yard was a private one. There is nothing to distinguish the son's case in principle, and the same order will be made in that case.

Mr. Justice Avory.—I agree that the magistrate came to an erroneous conclusion. The question which he had to determine was whether this omnibus was plying for hire within the prescribed distance without a licence, and the only ground on which he came to the conclusion he did was that as the proprietor had given instructions only to take up passengers in a private yard and not to invite nor seek for passengers within the prescribed distance, he had not permitted the omnibus to be used as an omnibus plying for hire within the prescribed distance. The case of Birmingham and Midland Motor Omnibus Company v. Thompson ([1918] 2 K.B., 105) is an express decision that it is not necessary in order to bring the case within the statute that there should be a plying for hire in a public street. It was found in that case that there was not a standing or plying for hire, and Mr. Justice Atkin, as he then was, said: "All we have to consider is whether this was an omnibus plying for hire within the prescribed distance; and if it was, then, whether or not the proprietors were using it as an omnibus so plying for hire within that distance. I think the case clearly falls within the statute, and that the conviction was right."

Mr. Justice Salter.—I am of the same opinion.

CROWN MILLING COMPANY, LIMITED, AND OTHERS v. THE KING.*

New Zealand—Monopolies—Offence—Restriction of dealing—Consideration given to another person—Whether including party's own agent—"Contrary to the public interest"—Question of fact—Commercial Trusts Act, 1910 (New Zealand statute) (1 Geo. V., No. 32), ss. 3, 5.

By s. 3 of the Commercial Trusts Act, 1910,

* Reported by Sir W. J. Soulsby, Barrister-at-Law.

"Every person commits an offence who, either as principal or agent, in respect of dealings in any goods, gives, offers or agrees to give to any other person any rebate, refund, discount, concession, allowance, reward, or other valuable consideration for the reason or upon the express or implied condition that the latter person" (a) Shall deal exclusively with any person or class of persons; (b) Shall not deal with any person or class of persons; (c) Shall restrict dealings with any such person or class; (d) Shall be, or become, a member of a commercial trust; or (e) Shall act under the direction of any commercial trust with regard to the sale, purchase or supply of goods.

By s. 5, "Any person who conspires with any other person to monopolize wholly or partially the demand or supply in New Zealand or any part thereof of any goods, or to control wholly or partially the demand or supply or price in New Zealand or any part thereof of any goods, is guilty of an offence if such monopoly or control is of such a nature as to be contrary to the public interest."

Held, that s. 3 applies only to cases where the consideration is given or the promise is made to another party to the dealing and has no application to the case of an advantage given or promised by one of the parties to the dealing to his own agent.

Held, further, that in the absence of a statutory definition of the classes of monopoly or control that are to be deemed contrary to the public interest the question whether a particular monopoly or control was contrary to the public interest was in the circumstances a question of fact.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Appeal for New Zealand in a suit regarding the legality of a combination of flour millers in New Zealand for the operation of a scheme for the monopoly and control of flour and the by-products of wheat milling.

Mr. M. Myers, K.C. (of the New Zealand Bar), Mr. J. H. Stamp, and Mr. W. D. Campbell (of the New Zealand Bar) appeared for the appellants; Sir John Simon, K.C., Mr. F. O. Langley, and Miss Joan Clarkson for the respondent.

Viscount Finlay.—This case raises questions of great importance with regard to the construction and effect of the New Zealand Act, 1910, No. 32, which came into operation on January 1, 1911. It is entitled "An Act for the Repression of Monopolies in Trade or Commerce," and is cited as the Commercial Trusts Act, 1910.

This Act is directed against what are known as commercial trusts. In section 2 "commercial trust" is defined as meaning any association or combination of persons having as an object:—

"Controlling, determining, or influencing the supply or demand or price of any goods in New Zealand . . . or elsewhere"; or

"Creating or maintaining in New Zealand . . . or elsewhere a monopoly, whether complete or partial, in the supply or demand of any goods," or "acting in New Zealand or elsewhere with any such object."

The Act applies only to goods mentioned in the schedule, which has been amended by subsequent Acts, and includes in its enumeration many of the principal necessaries of life.

The most important of the enacting clauses are section 3 and section 5.

Section 3 makes it an offence to give or offer in respect of any dealings in goods any valuable consideration:—

"(a) For dealing exclusively with any person or class of persons;

"(b) For not dealing with any person or class of persons;

"(c) For restricting dealings with any such person or class;

"(d) For being, or becoming, a member of a commercial trust; or

"(e) For acting under the direction of any commercial trust with regard to the sale, purchase or supply of goods."

Section 5 makes criminal any conspiracy to monopolize or control the demand or supply in New Zealand of any goods, if such monopoly or control is of such a nature as to be contrary to the public interest.

There are other sections of a subsidiary nature to which reference has been made, particularly sections 4, 6, 7, and 8. Provision is also made for the infliction of a penalty for offences against the Act, and for the granting of injunctions (sections 10 and 13).

The present proceedings were instituted against the Crown Milling Company, Limited, of Dunedin, and three other companies carrying on business in New Zealand as flour millers. A company entitled Distributors, Limited, of Christchurch, flour millers' agents, were also joined as defendants.

The statement of claim charged against the defendants conspiracy in breach of section 5 of the Commercial Trusts Act, 1910, and set out the agreement entered into in furtherance of the conspiracy alleged. The defendants denied that there had been any infraction of the Act, and alleged that, so far from prejudicing the trade, what had been done by the defendants had been beneficial in its operation.

The case came on for hearing before Mr. Justice Sim in the Supreme Court of New Zealand, and after a trial which lasted for ten days Mr. Justice Sim gave judgment in favour of the defendants. An appeal was brought against this decision to the Court of Appeal in New Zealand, and after a hearing before five Judges, being the first and second divisions of the Court of Appeal sitting together, the Court, by a majority, set aside the decision of the Supreme Court, and entered judgment for the Crown. The Court consisted of five members—Chief Justice Stout, Mr. Justice Herdman, Mr. Justice Reed, Mr. Justice MacGregor, and Mr. Justice Alpers, the majority consisting of three Judges. The defendants by this appeal to his Majesty in Council ask that the judgment of Mr. Justice Sim should be restored.

The object of these proceedings was to put an end to a combination of flour millers in New Zealand, the nature and objects of which are stated in the form of agreement scheduled to the statement of claim.

The company known as Distributors, Limited, was incorporated for the purpose of acting as agents for the millers in the campaign which it was proposed to initiate against the evils from which the trade in flour, &c., was alleged to suffer. They cannot be better stated than in the language of the preamble to the agreement, adhesion to which it was the office of Distributors, Limited, to promote. The parties to this agreement were, on the one hand, the mill owners who signed it, and, on the other, Distributors, Limited. The preamble is as follows :—

" Whereas the company is incorporated with powers to buy, sell, deal in, and act as agent for the sale of wheat, flour, and other products of milling and cereals : And whereas by the unnecessary multiplicity of marketing and distribution processes the cost of producing, marketing, and distributing flour by flour millers individually is unnecessarily expensive, and results in the net price obtainable by flour millers being unremunerative : And whereas, with a view to minimizing necessary and eliminating unnecessary expenses to individual flour millers the company is prepared to use its organization for the purpose of canvassing for orders, issuing invoices to purchasers, and marketing and distributing flour sold, and otherwise acting as agent in respect of the sale of flour and such other products as aforesaid : And whereas, by reason of difficulties in finance arising from delays and failures in payment by purchasers of flour from flour millers, it is advisable that adequate protection should as far as practicable be obtained against sales to purchasers who are insolvent or unable to pay for flour purchased within a reasonable time : And whereas the company is in a position to dispose of flour to better commercial advantage than can be obtained by individual flour millers, having regard to the difficulties aforesaid : And whereas the said mill owners are the owners of a certain flour mill situated at ....., and hereinafter called 'the said mill' : And whereas the said mill owners have agreed that the company shall act as their sole agent for the sale of flour and its by-products, upon the terms and subject to the provisions hereinafter contained : And whereas the company in consideration thereof has agreed to extend to the said mill owners the advantages it possesses in the marketing and distribution of such flour : Now, this agreement witnesseth that the parties hereto do hereby, in consideration of their mutual covenants and agreements hereinafter contained and implied, mutually covenant and agree in manner following, that is to say :— "

Then follow the details of the agreement. Distributors, Limited, were to sell on behalf of the mill owners (clause 3 (a)) ; the agency was to be exclusive (clause 4), and was to be in the nature of a del credere agency at 5 per cent. commission, subject to modification (clause 7). The price was to be fixed by the directors of the company (clause 11) and arrangements were to be made for the equitable distribution of the trade (clauses 12 and 13). There were a number of other provisions which it is not necessary to state in detail, and provision was made for the final settlement of any dispute which might arise in carrying them out by reference to arbitration (clause 31).

There has been a singular difference of judicial opinion in this case. Of the six Judges who took part in it, one who formed the Court of first instance and five in the Court of Appeal, three were in favour of the Crown and three in favour of the defendants. The defendants thus succeeded in the Court of first instance, where Mr. Justice Sim, sitting alone, was in their favour, but the Crown succeeded in the Court of Appeal, where three were in favour of the Crown and two in favour of the defendants.

It will be convenient in the first instance to state shortly the conclusions at which their Lordships sitting on this Board have arrived, and the principles on which it appears to them that the decision must depend, and then to proceed to an examination of the conflicting views expressed in the judgments in the Courts below.

In order that the Crown may succeed in this case, it is necessary to show that there had been an offence either under section 3 or under section 5 of the Commercial Trusts Act, 1910, there being no other sections in the Act which for the purposes of the present case would constitute an offence.

Section 3 of the Act runs as follows :—

" 3. Every person commits an offence who, either as principal or agent, in respect of dealings in any goods, gives, offers, or agrees to give to any other person any rebate, refund, discount, concession, allowance, reward, or other valuable consideration for the reason or upon the express or implied condition that the latter person—

" (a) Deals or has dealt or will deal, or intends or undertakes or has undertaken or will undertake to deal, exclusively or principally, or to such an extent as amounts to exclusive or principal dealing, with any person or class of persons, either in relation to any particular goods or generally ; or

" (b) Does not deal or has not dealt or will not deal, or intends or undertakes or has undertaken or will undertake not to deal, with any person or class of persons, either in relation to any particular goods or generally ; or

" (c) Restricts or has restricted or will restrict, or intends or undertakes or has undertaken or will undertake to restrict, his dealing with any person or class of persons, either in relation to any particular goods or generally ; or

" (d) Is or becomes or has been, or has undertaken or will undertake to become, a member of a commercial trust ; or

" (e) Acts or has acted or will act, or intends or undertakes or has undertaken or will undertake to act, in obedience to or in conformity with the determinations, directions, suggestions, or requests of any commercial trust with respect to the sale, purchase, or supply of any goods."

In the opinion of their Lordships the facts of this case do not disclose any infraction of section 3. That section provides that an offence is committed by any person who, either as principal or agent, in respect of dealing in any goods, gives, offers, or agrees to give to any other person any rebate, refund, discount, concession, allowance, reward or other valuable consideration for the reason, or on the express or implied condition that the latter person does or does not do any of the things specified under heads (a), (b), (c), (d) and (e) in that clause.

The agreement of the flour millers with Distributors, Limited, is said to show an offence under this section. If Distributors, Limited, fell within the description of " other person " mentioned in the first sentence of section 3 as the person to whom the consideration is given or promised, there would be abundant evidence of such an infraction. But the position of Distributors, Limited, was that of mere agents for the millers, who were parties to the dealing in goods in respect of which the provisions of section 3 come into play. In the opinion of their Lordships that section applies only to cases in which the consideration was given or the promise made to another party to the " dealing." Section 3 has no application to the case of an advantage given or promised by or on behalf of one of the parties to the dealing to his own agent. The essence of the offence in section 3 is that the advantage must have been given or promised to a party to the dealing. It follows that the prosecution cannot rely upon section 3.

Section 5 remains for consideration. It runs as follows :—

" Any person who conspires with any other person to monopolize wholly or partially the demand or supply in New Zealand or any part thereof of any goods, or to control wholly or partially the demand or supply or price in New Zealand or any part thereof of any goods, is guilty of an offence if such monopoly or control is of such a nature as to be contrary to the public interest."

This clause deals with conspiracy to monopolize in New Zealand the demand or supply of any goods or to control the demand, supply or price, if such monopoly or control is of such a nature as to be contrary to the public interest. It is upon these last words that there has been in the Courts below so great a difference of opinion. The question is whether the monopoly or control which it was the object of the defendants to establish was of such a nature as to be contrary to the public interest. The Legislature has not attempted to define the class or classes of monopoly or control which are to be deemed contrary to the public interest within the meaning of this clause. The Courts have to decide this question for themselves.

It is apparent that the effect of the Act is not to treat every monopoly or control as necessarily contrary to the public interest. No offence is committed against the enactment unless the maintenance or control is of such a nature as to be contrary to the public interest. The most obvious form of prejudice to the public interest would be if the effect of the monopoly were to cause an unreasonable rise of price in articles which are necessaries of life. There are in the Act sections dealing with the exaction of unreasonable prices fixed under the influence of any "Commercial Trust," e.g., section 6 and section 7, but it is not charged against the defendants in the present case that the prices have been raised to an unreasonable point within the meaning of any such provision.

Of course, if the Legislature of New Zealand or of any part of his Majesty's Dominions had enacted that any particular acts or omissions should stamp any monopoly or control as contrary to the public interest, every Court would be bound to give effect to such a law. But with regard to the transactions with which their Lordships are now concerned, the Legislature has not taken this course ; it is left to the Courts to ascertain in each case whether the nature of the monopoly or control is contrary to the public interest as a matter of fact, or as a matter of law under some provision of the law, whether common law or statute.

It is not for this tribunal, nor for any tribunal, to adjudicate as between conflicting theories of political economy. Strong views may be entertained on the one side or on the other, but the one material question here is whether the monopoly or control is of such a nature as to be contrary to the public interest. The burden of establishing this is, of course, upon the party who asserts that the monopoly or control is of such a nature.

It is clear that the Legislature had in view that there might be cases of monopoly or control which would not be contrary to the public interest, and that it is so contrary must be established in each particular case of prosecution in which it is sought to prove an offence under the Act. The burden of proof is, of course, upon the person who asserts any proposition, and this applies with special force when, as here, the commission of crime is in question. Their Lordships do not think that this proposition has been established in the present case, and for this reason, in their opinion, one essential element in the case for a successful prosecution is wanting. The point is one upon which opinions may differ, as a reference to the judgments of the Courts below in the present case will abundantly show.

It is now necessary to consider the course which the case has taken and the grounds on which the various Judges arrived at their conclusions.

In the Court of first instance Mr. Justice Sim dealt first with section 3 of the Commercial Trusts Act, 1910. He pointed out that the agreement here is for the appointment of an agent for the sale of goods, not an agreement for the sale of goods as in the Coal Vend case, Adelaide Steamship Company v. The King (15 Commonwealth L.R., 65), and Attorney-General of the Commonwealth of Australia v. Adelaide Steamship Company (29 The Times L.R., 743 ; [1913] A.C., 781), which had been relied on for the Crown. Mr. Justice Sim goes on to consider whether the monopoly and control in the present case are of such a nature as to be contrary to the public interest under section 5. He gives the history of the agreement between the millers which formed the subject of the prosecution, and on his consideration of the evidence he held that the Crown had failed to establish its case. He therefore gave judgment for the defendants.

The case was taken on appeal to the Court of Appeal in New Zealand. The judgments revealed great diversity of view, not only as to the answer to be given, but also as to the point of view from which the question should be considered.

"It cannot therefore, in my opinion, be said that this contract was not of" "[such] a nature as to be contrary to the public interest. First, the Distributors Company had the power of fixing the price ; second, it had the power of fixing the amount of production, and where the production was to take place at different parts of the Dominion, and it had the power of declaring that flour produced in New Zealand must be exported (see paragraph 5). It was therefore a contract of such a nature as to be contrary to the public interest."

And, further, on page 177 at line 10 he said :—

"It is surely not necessary to show that the monopoly and control of food and its price are contrary to the public interest."

He therefore held that the offence had been committed under section 5 of the Act.

Mr. Justice Herdman, on the other hand, held that no offence under section 5 had been proved, and pointed out that because there is some restraint of trade it does not necessarily follow that a contract is detrimental to the public interest. In his opinion, no offence against the Act had been committed, as it was not shown that what had been done was prejudicial to the public.

Mr. Justice Reed arrived at the same conclusion as the Chief Justice, though not quite for the same reasons. He said :—

"It is urged that this is necessary to the life of the flour-milling trade, that unrestricted competition in the past resulted in fluctuating prices of flour and, in some cases, in sales below a remunerative price.

"No doubt the law will uphold, in exceptional cases, an anti-competitive contract if it is clearly shown that unrestricted competition will result in ruin to private interests, and an ill-regulated supply, for such cannot be of advantage to the public. In North Western Salt Company v. Electrolytic Alkali Company (30 The Times L.R., 313 ; [1914] A.C., 461) Viscount Haldane, L.C., said as follows, at p. 469 :—

"'An ill-regulated supply and unremunerative prices may, in point of fact, be disadvantageous to the public. Such a state of things may, if it is not controlled, drive manufacturers out of business, or lower wages, and so cause unemployment and labour disturbance. It must always be a question of circumstances whether a combination of manufacturers in a particular trade is an evil from a public point of view.' "

In the result, Mr. Justice Reed gave judgment for allowing the appeal. After adverting shortly to the evidence as to the history of flour milling in New Zealand, he went on to say (page 195, line 29) :—

" As, for eighty years, with open and unrestricted competition, flour millers were able to carry on without the suggested dire results following, it would require the most cogent evidence that circumstances had so changed that at the present day it would be ruinous to private parties engaged in the industry if a return to such unrestricted competition were made, before the Court should assist in imposing upon the public such an extremely detrimental monopoly. The evidence called entirely failed in that respect.

" For these reasons I think the appeal should be allowed."

Mr. Justice MacGregor was of opinion that the judgment of Mr. Justice Sim should be reversed. He said, with reference to Government control of flour supplies, that it was originally a war measure adopted in 1917, when shipping was almost unprocurable. This control had been continued year after year until apparently it had become intolerable, and, after a reference to the evidence, went on (page 202, line 36) :—

" Is it not abundantly plain from all this that the aim and object of the flour millers was, when the Government monopoly ceased, to fasten on the public of New Zealand in their own interest a similar measure of monopoly, not public, but private, not conceived from any motive of public policy, but wholly self-serving and contrary to the public interest ? In other words, they deliberately conspired together to perpetuate under their own control the State monopoly which the Government itself was about to abandon as undesirable in the public interest."

And on the next page, 203, line 27, he goes on to say :—

" A mass of evidence was produced in support of and against these grave allegations. I need not refer to that evidence in detail. In the result, I am of opinion that the main charges made by the Crown have been established as against the respondents. In most cases, indeed, the facts were indisputable."

Mr. Justice Alpers, at the commencement of his judgment (record, page 206), says :—

" Three questions fall to be discussed on this appeal . . . in my opinion, each of these questions should be answered in the negative."

He also expressed his agreement with the judgment of Mr. Justice Herdman, which already has been adverted to in this opinion. On the third question he expresses his agreement with the view of Mr. Justice Sim, the trial Judge.

In the result this case, which has occupied so much time in its progress through all the Courts, resolves itself into one question—namely, Has the prosecution established that on the facts of this particular case the monopoly or control was of a nature contrary to the public interest ? The question is, of course, such as to lend itself to prolonged discussion, and it has been fully and ably argued on both sides. In their Lordships' opinion, the question in the circumstances of the present case is really one of fact and cannot be decided merely as a matter of law. Their Lordships, after reviewing and weighing the evidence, have come to the conclusion that the prosecution has not discharged the burden of proof which lies upon it, and that the judgment of Mr. Justice Sim should be restored.

The respondent should pay the costs of the appeal.

Their Lordships will humbly advise his Majesty accordingly.

Court of Appeal. (Bankes, Scrutton, and Atkin, L.JJ.) 1927. Jan. 19.

KREDITBANK CASSEL v. SCHENKERS, LIMITED, AND OTHERS.*

Company—Bills of exchange—Bills wrongfully drawn by branch manager on behalf of company—Ostensible authority to bind company—Forgery—Bills of Exchange Act, 1882 (45 and 46 Vict., c. 61), s. 24—Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908 (8 Edw. VII., c. 69), s. 77.

The defendants, a limited company, by their memorandum had power to sign, make, draw, accept and indorse bills of exchange. By article 18 of the articles of association the directors were empowered " to determine who shall be entitled to sign and make, draw, accept and indorse on the company's behalf bills, notes, receipts, acceptances, indorsements, cheques, releases, contracts and documents." The defendants carried on business in London as general carriers and forwarding agents, and they had a branch office at Manchester, of which one Sydney Clarke was manager. Clarke was also concerned in the formation of a company known as Clarke and Walker, Limited. Having bought goods on behalf of the last-named company, Clarke, without any authority to do so from the defendants, drew seven bills on behalf of the defendants signed " S. Clarke, Manchester Manager." The bills were made out to the order of the drawers, accepted by Clarke and Walker, Limited, and indorsed on behalf of the defendants " S. Clarke, Manchester Manager."

The bills were discounted by the plaintiff bank, and when they were dishonoured by the acceptors the plaintiff bank as holders in due course sued the defendants as drawers, but the latter repudiated the whole transaction, and stated that Clarke had acted without authority.

Held, (1) that in the absence of evidence that the branch manager had ostensible authority to draw bills on behalf of the company, the plaintiffs were not entitled to assume that he had such authority (Houghton and Co. v. Nothard, Lowe and Wills, [1927] 1 K.B., 246, followed), and (2) that the bills were forgeries and therefore null and void and the defendants were not precluded from setting up the forgery or the want of authority of the manager.

Judgment of Wright, J. ([1926] 2 K.B., 450), reversed.

This was an appeal from the judgment of Mr. Justice Wright ([1926] 2 K.B., 450).

The following statement of the facts is taken from the judgment of Mr. Justice Wright :—The plaintiffs, a German bank, claim as holders of seven bills of exchange, of which the defendants were drawers and indorsers, and which the acceptors have dishonoured. The present trial concerns the defendants, the drawers and indorsers, only ; they obtained leave to defend under Order XIV.

The defendants are a limited company incorporated on February 16, 1921, having a registered office at 15, Eldon-street, in the city of London ; their business is that of general carriers, forwarding and shipping agents and warehousemen. They have a branch office at Manchester, of which one Sydney Clarke was branch manager.

The defendant company, by its memorandum, had power to sign, make, draw, accept, and indorse bills of exchange. By article 18 of the articles of association it was provided as follows : "The directors shall have power to determine who shall be entitled to sign and make, draw, accept and indorse on the company's behalf bills, notes, receipts, acceptances, indorsements, cheques, releases, contracts and documents."

Two resolutions of the directors were passed on May 14, 1923. By one resolution the defendant company's bank was empowered to honour cheques, bills of exchange and promissory notes drawn, signed, accepted or made on behalf of the company by Mr. J. de Vorsen (manager) and Mr. W. Jager (assistant manager), or by any one director. A later resolution passed on January 2, 1924, was to a similar effect. By the other resolution, the bank was empowered to honour on behalf of the company the signature of Mr. S. Clarke on all cheques payable only to his Majesty's Customs. Such cheques were in fact in payment of reparation duties. S. Clarke was described as assistant manager, but in fact he had, with the directors' assent, used a rubber stamp with which he could sign on behalf of the defendant company as Manchester manager.

In general, all finance was controlled by the London office, and though Clarke indorsed cheques and paid them into the defendant company's bank he was required to send cheques drawn by the defendant company, other than those dealt with in the resolution, to the London office for signature. The defendant company was closely connected with a large and important transport company called Schenker and Co., Berlin, whose head office was in Berlin, and which had various branches in Germany, including one at Sonneberg.

In August, 1924, Sydney Clarke became concerned in the formation of a company called Clarke and Walker, Limited, and in September of that year went to Sonneberg, and on that company's behalf made a large purchase of toys from a merchant called Teichmann, of Sonneberg. He arranged that payment should be made to Teichmann by bills drawn in the name of the defendant company, payable to their order and drawn upon Clarke and Walker, Limited. The defendant company had no knowledge of this, and gave Clarke no authority ; his action was a fraud on the defendant company. He was, however, supported in these proceedings by the manager at Sonneberg of Schenker and Co., Berlin, a man called Bauer.

Under this arrangement seven bills were drawn, each for £200 and each dated Manchester, September 23, 1924, on behalf of Schenkers, Limited, S. Clarke, Manchester manager, to drawer's order, accepted by Clarke and Walker, Limited, and indorsed on behalf of Schenkers, Limited, "S. Clarke, Manchester Manager." Teichmann took them to the plaintiff bank, who, having obtained unsatisfactory reports as to Clarke and Walker, Limited, refused at first to discount more than three bills—£600 in all—without further security. It was then arranged between the plaintiff bank and Teichmann that they would discount the remaining four bills if they had the further security of the indorsement of Schenker and Co., Sonneberg, which was done, Bauer signing in their name. The plaintiff bank thereupon discounted the bills, and in turn had them discounted with the Dresdner Bank at Frankfort. It was admitted that the plaintiff bank acted in good faith and without any actual or constructive notice of any irregularity on the part of Clarke, or any actual suspicion or ground of suspicion that his conduct was unauthorized. The defendant company, however, when the bills were presented and dishonoured by the acceptors and notice was given them, repudiated the whole transaction and stated that Clarke had acted without their authority, so that they were in no way liable for the bills. The plaintiff bank sue as holders in due course, having repaid the Dresdner Bank and obtained the bills.

It was not contended that S. Clarke had actual authority to pledge the defendant company's credit by drawing or indorsing the bills, but the plaintiffs contended that he had implied or apparent authority, which the defendant company denied.

By section 77 of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, it is provided as follows : "A bill of exchange . . . shall be deemed to have been made, accepted, or indorsed on behalf of a company if made, accepted, or indorsed in the name of, or by or on behalf or on account of, the company by any person acting under its authority."

Mr. Justice Wright held that the defendant company was liable, as the branch manager, Sydney Clarke, might have been authorized by the constitution of the defendant company to draw the bills ; that Sydney Clarke, in drawing the bills on behalf of the defendant company, was a person acting under its authority within the meaning of section 77 of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, and that a holder in due course was entitled to assume that Sydney Clarke had the authority of the company in fact. He accordingly gave judgment for the plaintiffs.

The defendant company appealed.

Mr. D. N. Pritt appeared for the appellants ; Mr. A. T. Miller, K.C., and Mr. D. B. Somervell for the respondents.

Lord Justice Bankes.—This case undoubtedly raises an important point, and in this Court a point has been raised which was not raised before the learned Judge. The main facts are really not in dispute, and they are these. The plaintiffs bring their action against the defendant company alleging that the defendant company were the drawers and indorsers of a number of bills of exchange which were dishonoured by the acceptors on presentation. They commenced their action and took proceedings under Order XIV. In answer to their claim, the defendant company set out the facts shortly and their contention was that these bills had been drawn and indorsed by a man who was a manager merely of a branch of their business in Manchester, and that he had done what he did without any authority whatever, and, although they did not say so, in substance it must be assumed from their affidavit that their case was that he had done it in fraud of the company. Upon that affidavit being filed, an order was made in chambers that the case should be tried as a short cause, and it was so tried before Mr. Justice Wright. There the plaintiffs' case was that, the defendants being a company and having among their articles of association an article which authorized the delegation of authority to do such an act as drawing or indorsing a bill of exchange, the rule of law laid down in the House of Lords in Mahony v. East Holyford Mining Company (L.R., 7 H.L., 869) applied because they had discounted these bills bona fide and without notice of any irregularity whatever. It was upon that state of facts and on that contention that the learned Judge dealt with the matter. At the time when the learned Judge gave judgment the case of Houghton and Co. v. Nothard, Lowe and Wills, now reported ([1927] 1 K.B., 246), had not been before this Court. Mr. Pritt, for the appellants, relies on that case as being an authority that on the particular facts of this case and the particular form of the article relied upon, the plaintiffs fail in substantiating their cause of action.

But during the argument another point was taken, which was that this act of the branch manager was a forgery, and that, there being no ground on which the company could be said to be estopped from setting up the forgery, the rule in Mahony's case (supra) did not apply. I think that is fairly stating the argument on the one side and on the other.

Now it is clear, I think, and well established, first of all, that in the case of a company incorporated under the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, which has an article empowering the directors to delegate their authority, anybody dealing with the company without notice of what has actually happened is entitled to say that that article is of itself notice and that anybody dealing with the company must be presumed to have notice of the existence of the article. I think it is also quite clearly established that a stranger dealing with a company has a right to assume as against the company that all matters of internal management have been duly complied with. There are many cases in the books in which, there being an article authorizing the delegation of authority, a company has been held liable although the person who has purported to act upon the delegation of authority had in fact no authority, because, whether he had or had not, the authority is a matter of internal management with which the stranger had no concern.

Article 18, which is the article in question, is in this form : "The directors shall have power to determine who shall be entitled to sign and make, draw, accept, and indorse on the company's behalf bills, notes, receipts, acceptances, indorsements, cheques, releases, contracts, and documents." That article is in a somewhat peculiar form. It is not in the form in which it is found in many of the decided cases, in which the article itself indicates the person by name or by description to whom the power may be delegated. But this is an article authorizing the directors to determine who shall be entitled to sign, and, of course, if they are entitled to say who shall be entitled to sign, they can, if they like, give authority to a most irresponsible person. In Houghton and Co. v. Nothard, Lowe and Wills (supra) the article was in very much the same terms. The directors were empowered to "delegate to any managing director, local board, head manager, manager, attorney or agent any of the powers . . . for the time being vested in the directors." The authority in that case was more circumscribed, if I may use that expression, because it did indicate by description the persons to whom the authority might be delegated. In that case there were certain facts upon which all the members of the Court came to the conclusion that the plaintiffs in that case were not in a position to rely upon the rule in Mahony's case (supra), because upon the facts the true inference was that they did not rely upon the authority or any suggested delegated authority, but that they distrusted the position and authority of the person who was negotiating, and they required express confirmation, and unfortunately for them the express confirmation was not a confirmation at all. But Lord Justice Sargant in his judgment (and Lord Justice Atkin concurred) did go further, and I think did lay down in terms which cover this case a proposition of law that under the circumstances of that case, which I cannot distinguish from the circumstances of this case, the rule in Mahony's case (supra) does not apply. If I am correct in that view, that is sufficient to dispose of this appeal.

But during the argument a further point was raised which seems to me to be quite fatal to the plaintiffs' case, and that is that the act of this branch manager was a forgery, and that under those circumstances the documents were merely waste paper, and the plaintiffs could make no claim against the defendants except upon one of two grounds : either that the defendants were estopped from setting up the forgery or that, apart altogether from the rule in Mahony's case (supra) or article 18, the branch manager had such ostensible authority as rendered the defendants as his employers liable for the acts of drawing and indorsing these bills.

It was contended on behalf of the appellants that what is said to be a dictum of Lord Loreburn in Ruben and Ladenburg v. Great Fingall Consolidated (22 The Times L.R., 712 ; [1906] A.C., 439) has no application to the facts of this case. But, as Lord Justice Atkin has pointed out, it is very material to see what Lord Justice Stirling said in the Court of Appeal in that case. Lord Justice Stirling deals with the point in terms as to whether or not the fact that the document is a forgery is of any importance when you are seeking to apply the rule of law in Mahony's case (supra), and this is what he says (20 The Times L.R., at p. 724 ; [1904] 2 K.B., at p. 729). He first of all refers to the articles of association, and then he says : "The document on which the plaintiffs rely is written on the company's paper, and has the seal of the company affixed, and is countersigned by the secretary ; it also purports to bear the signatures of two directors, but these are mere forgeries by the secretary. In the circumstances the certificate (as was indeed admitted by the plaintiffs at the trial) is not a valid or genuine document, and does not in my opinion bind the defendants. It was suggested that, inasmuch as the document appeared on the face of it to satisfy the requirements of the articles of association, the plaintiffs, acting as they did in good faith, were not affected by irregularities in the proceedings of the secretary : Mahony v. East Holyford Mining Company (supra). To mere irregularities the principle of that case no doubt applies, but it has never been extended to forgery, a forged instrument being simply null and void." The distinction was drawn by Lord

Hatherley in advising the House of Lords in the case itself, and then the judgment goes on to refer to what Lord Hatherley had said. That being the decision appealed from, what Lord Loreburn said (22 The Times L.R., 712 ; [1906] A.C., at p. 443) was this : "I cannot see upon what principle your Lordships can hold that the defendants are liable in this action. The forged certificate is a pure nullity. It is quite true that persons dealing with limited liability companies are not bound to inquire into their indoor management, and will not be affected by irregularities of which they had no notice. But this doctrine, which is well established, applies only to irregularities that otherwise might affect a genuine transaction. It cannot apply to a forgery." It is quite true, as Mr. Miller has contended, that that case has reference to a certificate and not to a bill of exchange, and he relied upon section 24 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, which he said distinguished the case and protected his client. But in my opinion, short of an estoppel, that section does not assist the case which he sets up. Although that is the rule in reference to forgery, it is quite clear that the person setting up the forgery may be estopped from setting it up. Lord Macnaghten deals with that, and in Ruben's case (22 The Times L.R., at p. 713 ; [1906] A.C., at p. 444) he says, having regard to the fact that the document was a forgery, "Then how can the company be bound or affected by it? The directors have never said or done anything to represent or lead to the belief that this thing was the company's deed. Without such a representation there can be no estoppel." In my opinion there was no evidence here upon which an estoppel could be founded. I will deal in a moment with the letter which accompanied these bills of exchange. Under those circumstances it seems to me that it has been proved that the bills are forgeries, and there being no evidence of estoppel it does not lie in the plaintiffs' mouth to rely upon the rule in Mahony's case (supra). Then they are driven to rely, if they can, upon the ordinary rule applicable to the case of principal and agent, and if they could show, or if they had brought evidence to show, that the drawing and indorsing of bills of exchange were within the ostensible authority of a person occupying the position of this branch manager, it might be that they would have been in a position to establish a claim founded upon that ground. But no such evidence was attempted, and I certainly am not prepared to accept the proposition that it was within the ostensible authority of this branch manager, having regard to his position, to accept bills of exchange to this amount and in this form.

In my opinion, therefore, the appeal succeeds upon both grounds. Mr. Miller relied upon the letter that was sent by this Manchester branch manager accompanying the bills, but so far from assisting Mr. Miller's case it seems to me to be against it. It certainly does not amount to an estoppel that he was allowed to use letter paper headed "Schenkers, Ltd., International Forwarding, Shipping and Insurance Agents. Head Office, 15, Eldon St., London" ; and it certainly is not estoppel, it seems to me, that he was allowed to use a stamp for signing documents : "For and on behalf of Schenkers, Ltd. Branch Manchester Manager." It does not seem to me to amount to an estoppel, and short of an estoppel I cannot see that the document has any greater force or effect than the bills themselves.

Under all these circumstances I think the appeal succeeds and that the judgment for the plaintiffs should be set aside and entered for the defendants with costs here and below.

Lord Justice Scrutton.—In my view this is not an easy case, and but for two authorities on two points to which the Court has been referred I should desire to go much more carefully into the various lines of authorities than has been done ; but in my view this Court is bound, and I am bound, by authority on two points to decide that this appeal should be allowed.

The facts are rather curious. A German gentleman named Teichmann was a seller of goods, and he sold a considerable quantity of goods, over £1,000 worth, to a firm of Clarke and Walker, Ltd., 17, Blackfriars-street, Manchester. As is quite usual in commercial transactions, while the buyer desired credit and was only prepared to pay by giving a bill, the seller desired to get the money as soon as possible and desired to discount the bill, and the ordinary course of business would be, of course, that the seller would draw on the buyer and get the bill discounted either before or after acceptance. Now that was not the course that was pursued in this case. The gentleman representing the supposed buyers, Messrs. Clarke and Walker, Limited, a Mr. Clarke, came to the seller with a bill drawn by a firm of Schenkers, Limited, signed on their behalf by himself, described as Manchester manager, and already accepted by Clarke and Walker, Limited ; so that the position was that Clarke and Walker, Limited, the buyers, being primarily liable, for some reason Schenkers, Limited, had by drawing become liable on the bills and guaranteed the payment by the buyers, Clarke and Walker, and the person who signed the document which would make Schenkers, Limited, guarantors was a gentleman of the name of Clarke, the same as the Clarke of Clarke and Walker, Limited, and he described himself not as a director or managing director or anything of that sort, but Manchester manager. The document was accompanied by a letter from Manchester addressed to the seller : "We beg to enclose you herewith bills of exchange for £1,400 drawn by Messrs. Clarke and Walker and countersigned by your good selves," and that document itself was again signed "Schenkers, Limited. Clarke, Manchester Manager." It seems to me to add nothing to the signature that already appeared on the bill of exchange, "Schenkers, Ltd. Clarke, Manchester Manager." Now, as a matter of fact, Clarke had no authority to bind Schenkers, Limited. There was an article in the articles of association of Schenkers, Limited, which empowered the directors to delegate to anybody the power of signing bills of exchange, but they had not, as a matter of fact, given any delegation to Clarke, and he had no authority to bind them by bills of exchange, and he knew it ; and in binding them he was defrauding them. The seller, Mr. Teichmann, took the documents to a German bank, who discounted them, and then, when they were dishonoured, or rather when Schenkers, Limited, said they would have nothing to do with them, sued Schenkers, Limited, the drawers, the acceptors not being worth anything.

The case came before Mr. Justice Wright, as did a similar case, namely, Houghton's case (reported [1927] 1 K.B., 246 in the Court of Appeal), and Mr. Justice Wright applied the doctrine of Royal British Bank v. Turquand (6 E. and B., 327), which, as I understand roughly, is this, that any person is deemed to have notice of the articles of association of any company whose articles of association are registered. I think some of the cases go further, and say that he is not only deemed to have notice but he is to be deemed to understand what they really mean, which is sometimes a rather extensive presumption. But if the thing that happened is a thing that might have been done if certain internal arrangements in the company had been made, then the person knowing of the articles is not bound to inquire whether the internal arrangements of the company have been carried out, and may assume that the thing is regular because there was an article which justified the proceedings if the company within its own ambit, within its own domestic management, took certain steps. Acting on that position, Mr. Justice Wright said that in this case there was an article under which power could have been delegated to Clarke, the Manchester manager, and the bank was not bound to inquire whether in fact authority had been delegated because it could have been delegated, and consequently on the line of Royal British Bank v. Turquand (supra), and within the cases about presumption and notice of the contents of articles, Mr. Justice Wright held that the bank was excused from inquiring whether the domestic arrangements necessary to delegate to Clarke power to accept bills of exchange had been made, there being powers in the articles to make such delegation.

There are two matters which I think bind me to say that the decision was wrong ; first of all I think it has been established by the House of Lords that the doctrine that you are deemed to have notice of articles and need not inquire as to whether the domestic arrangements necessary to carry them out had been made does not apply where the document to which that principle is sought to be applied is a forgery. I think, having considered the matter, that the decision in Ruben and Ladenburg v. Great Fingall Consolidated, Limited (22 The Times L.R., 712 ; [1906] A.C., 439) binds me to come to that conclusion. Anyone who remembers the time when that case was decided knows that it excited tremendous discussion both in legal and commercial circles. A secretary of a company had issued a document, purporting to be regularly signed by directors and with the seal of the company on it, to people who advanced money on the strength of it, and the secretary of the company was a person who had authority to issue certificates ; he was the person to whom you would go to get a certificate ; but the company were allowed to say to the person who had advanced money on the faith of the certificate issued by its secretary : "This is not a document that binds the company at all," and that, as my Lord has pointed out, began with the passage in the judgment of Lord Justice Stirling, where, citing the case of Mahony v. East Holyford Mining Co. (L.R. 7 H.L., 869), the case in the House of Lords which perhaps states most clearly the doctrine that everybody is presumed to know the contents of registered articles of association, he said : "To mere irregularities the principle of that case no doubt applies, but it has never been extended to forgery, a forged instrument being simply null and void." Then he quotes the passage that my Lord has read from Lord Hatherley in Mahony's case (supra), pointing out that to forgery the doctrine which he was laying down in Mahony's case (supra) did not apply. When it came to the House of Lords, Lord Loreburn said in almost the same language as Lord Justice Stirling : "It is quite true that persons dealing with limited liability companies are not bound to inquire into their indoor management, and will not be affected by irregularities of which they had no notice. But this doctrine, which is well established, applies only to irregularities that otherwise might affect a genuine transaction. It cannot apply to a forgery." Lord Loreburn, without referring definitely to the doctrine, puts the ground on which the company are not liable as being that the document is a forgery, is not the company's deed, and there is nothing to prevent the company from saying so. Now, of course, there is this difficulty about Ruben and Ladenburg v. Great Fingall Consolidated (supra), that certainly Lord Davey—and I am not certain that another noble Lord did not say so—said that they were not liable because the act was done for the benefit of a servant and not for the benefit of the company, following a statement in those terms by Mr. Justice Willes in Barwick v. English Joint Stock Bank (L.R. 2 Ex., 259, at p. 265) and the House of Lords subsequently in a considered judgment in Lloyd v. Grace, Smith and Co. (28 The Times L.R., 547 ; [1912] A.C., 716), to which Lord Macnaghten was a party, has said that that limitation was erroneous, and that although the act is done for the benefit of an employee alone, not for the benefit of the company, yet the company may be liable. There is a little difficulty in reconciling the two cases on the head of forgery. I have always felt that difficulty, more especially as I was the Judge who originally decided Lloyd v. Grace, Smith and Co. (supra), and, having been reversed by the Court of Appeal, was affirmed by the House of Lords. But the House of Lords, having Ruben and Ladenburg v. Great Fingall Consolidated (supra) cited to them, have not in any way repudiated the doctrine of Mahony's case (supra), the doctrine of presumption of knowledge of the contents of the articles of association, and the doctrine of Royal British Bank v. Turquand (supra), that you need not inquire into the details of internal management, and, though dissenting from parts of the judgment, said nothing to interfere with the rest of the judgment so far as it is based on forgery.

Now it seems to me clear that this document is a forgery within the language of the Forgery Acts. It contains a false statement, namely, that the manager is acting for the company, and it purports to bind the company. That statement is in fraud of the company, and those two elements appear to make the document a forgery within the Forgery Acts. That being so, I feel bound by the decision of the House of Lords to hold that in this case it is not open to the plaintiffs to say "The question whether authority has or has not been delegated to Clarke, the Manchester manager, is a matter of internal management about which I need not inquire under the rule in Royal British Bank v. Turquand" (supra).

The second matter that I think binds me is this. In Houghton's case (supra), which in many details is very similar to this, when it came before the Court of Appeal, two judgments in effect were given. The judgment of my Lord dealt with the matter on the particular facts, and he declined to express any further opinion. But the judgment of Lord Justice Sargant, in the reasons with which my brother Atkin concurred, took a further point. He said that, though there is a power of delegation, though you are deemed to know it, you cannot say "I am deemed to know of that and I did act upon it," unless it is proved that you did in fact know of it. Now I hope it is not disrespectful to say that I wish that Lord Justice Sargant, who is thoroughly conversant with that branch of the law, had explained to people who are not so thoroughly conversant with that branch of the law exactly how that fitted in with the doctrine that you are deemed to know and to understand the true meaning of the articles of association. As is very usual when people who are speaking know all about a matter, they forget that other people do not know so much about it. The Lord Justice has not explained exactly how his decision fits in with the line of cases of which Mahony's case (supra) is an instance. But whether he has explained his reasons or not, there is no doubt about what he said, and there is no doubt that my brother Atkin has concurred in the reasons. In those circumstances I think I am bound by the decision given by a majority of the Court, which prevents the plaintiffs from putting forward a position like this: "We are deemed to know there was a power of delegation, and we are excused in those circumstances from inquiring into the internal management, because the judgment has said that you need not unless you in fact knew of the power of delegation and relied on that power." As I understand, the case being tried as a short cause and only on defences specified in an affidavit, Mr. Pritt did not go into questions of notice, and I think the learned Judge rather indicated that he could not, otherwise I should have thought that this transaction was so unusual as a commercial transaction that it put the seller and the bank on inquiry as to how it came about that this odd guarantee was given in fact by a gentleman named Clarke who appeared to be the same person as was guaranteed. But that point was not taken, and I do not rest my judgment here on that point, though I think there would have been a good deal to be said for it if it had been taken, and though it rather relieves my feeling, apart from the law, that upon the merits there is a good deal to be said for it.

Lord Justice Atkin.—I agree. The transaction itself which my Lord has just referred to was certainly a transaction which one would not suppose was within the ordinary course of business in this country. The firm of Schenkers, Limited, are a very large firm of forwarding agents. They do not deal in goods except so far as they make some advances on them. They have a branch, among other places, in Manchester, of which one Clarke was at the material times a manager. But Clarke also formed a company of Clarke and Walker for the purpose of dealing, among other things, in toys. He had recently formed this company, and there was apparently a very small capital subscribed. He went over to Germany in his capacity as interested in the firm of Clarke and Walker for the purpose of buying toys in the toy market in Germany, and he bought or agreed to buy a large quantity of toys from a man named Teichmann. Teichmann wanted to be sure about payment, and he consulted a gentleman named Bauer, who was interested in the German firm of Schenkers, and who also carried on a similar business as a limited company. Mr. Bauer, who apparently was very anxious to help the firm of Clarke and Walker, said "You had better get your Clarke and Walker bills endorsed by our firm of Schenkers, in England, who are perfectly sound." Apparently that was done, and Mr. Teichmann was satisfied with that. So Mr. Clarke went back to England and then drew seven bills of £200 each, all dated the same day and all made payable three months after date. He drew these bills on Clarke and Walker payable to his order or their order, and he drew the bills in the name of Schenkers, Limited, "S. Clarke, Manchester Manager"; and he sent those bills to Teichmann, saying "This is £1,400 of bills," and Teichmann took the bills to the bank, and they discounted them. I quite agree that we are not concerned here with the question of notice; we must assume that the bank had no notice that there was anything wrong with the bills. But they thought it necessary to make some inquiries, and the man of whom they thought it necessary to make inquiries as to whether these bills drawn in the name of Schenkers were in good order was the man who in fact signed the bills. They wrote to Clarke, who had given the bills in the name of Schenkers, Limited, and asked whether when he did give a bill in the name of Schenkers, Limited, it was in order, and they got an answer that it was—as might be expected—and so they were satisfied with that, and they discounted the bills.

Now the bills themselves, it is quite plain to my mind, were forgeries; they were false documents and they were fraudulent documents; they were concocted by Clarke for the purpose of defrauding Schenkers, Limited. I have no question about that. The firm of Schenkers, Limited, had nothing to do with these bills or the consideration for them, and it is an obvious fraud upon them; and it would appear, therefore, that there was no reason why they should pay for the forgery or pay Mr. Teichmann. But it is said that they are liable, and one reason why it is said that they are liable is this. It is said: "You are a limited company, and as a limited company you are in a very much more awkward position than if you were a firm, because you have got a provision in your articles that the directors may determine who may sign bills of exchange, and inasmuch as the directors may determine who may sign bills of exchange with the authority of the company, therefore anybody who purports to sign a bill of exchange in the name of the company is deemed to have authority to sign the bill of exchange." If that doctrine were really carried to its logical conclusion it would be a very alarming thing for companies, for anybody who has the pen of a ready writer need only sit down and write a bill of exchange in the name of any company who had that article, and that company would be presumably bound when the bill got into the hands of a holder for value without notice, even though the thing was an absolute forgery. That, I think, is untrue, and the article cannot have that extended bearing. I think there is a limitation accepted by the learned Judge, as was pointed out before, and pointed out in one of the cases—that that would mean that not merely the office boy but anybody might purport to sign on behalf of the company. That cannot be true, and to my mind quite plainly it is not true. The learned Judge himself limited the doctrine in his judgment to such a person as falls within the category of persons who under the articles might properly be empowered if the appropriate authority had been given. That seems to me to bring you to an entirely different class of case. I agree that that probably is right, but who is the person who might properly be entitled? You are then thrown back on the persons who ordinarily, apart from the articles, from their position in the company or elsewhere would be acting within the scope of their apparent authority in signing a bill. That is a question which has to be determined, to my mind, quite apart from the actual terms of the article, which merely empowers the directors to pick out a person who can have authority to sign a bill. Now if you deal with that proposition and come to consider whether the manager of a branch business is a person who has ostensible authority to sign bills on behalf of the company, in my view, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, the learned Judge was wrong in assuming that there was any such ostensible authority. It depends, of course, upon the evidence as to the nature of the business and as to the actual position occupied by the gentleman. But in the absence of evidence I am not prepared to hold that the manager of a provincial branch, even if he is in such an important position as manager of the Manchester branch of a forwarding agency, has authority to draw bills to bind his company. The actual evidence given, I think, was that the company never signed bills at all, and in the absence of evidence that the branch manager had ostensible authority to draw bills, I should have thought quite plainly that he had not. Therefore this is the ordinary case of a person having exercised or purported to exercise an authority to bind the company in fraud of the company, outside the scope of his ordinary ostensible authority. If that is the case, then under section 24 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, the holder is not entitled to enforce payment of these forged bills unless the principal is precluded from setting up the forgery or the want of authority. To my mind, inasmuch as the act was not done within the ostensible authority of the agent, the principal is not precluded from setting up the want of authority. That seems to me to determine this case.

I think the true limits of the doctrine as to the effect of an article which empowers the company or the directors of it to nominate a person to have authority to do a particular act on behalf of the company are made quite plain in the judgments of my Lord and Lord Justice Sargant in the case of Houghton and Co. v. Nothard, Lowe and Wills ([1927] 1 K.B., 246). It seems to me, therefore, to be unnecessary to consider the further doctrine as to knowledge of the articles of the company, except that one might say this, that the doctrine is as to knowledge of the article, that is to say, you are to be in the same position as though you had read the articles, and, if you had read the articles, all you would see would be that the directors had power to nominate the person who was to sign bills of exchange, and it appears to me that you would not be in a very much better position if you knew that unless you went on further and inquired whether or not the directors had in fact nominated a particular person to sign the bills. There are certain cases where you need not make that inquiry, and when you find the power and know that the act can be done by the company in a board meeting, and there purports to be a resolution, you are not obliged to inquire whether or not the forms of the company required by the articles as to the constitution of the board and the quorum and so on have been actually carried out. If you are dealing with a director in a matter in which a director normally would have power to act for the company you are not obliged to inquire whether or not the formalities required by the articles before he exercises that power have in fact been complied with. Those are matters of internal management—which an outsider is not obliged to investigate. But we have the authority of the Court of Appeal in Houghton's case (supra) and of the House of Lords in Ruben's case (22 The Times L.R., 712; [1906] A.C., 439) for saying that the doctrine that you need not investigate whether or not the internal management of the company has been strictly carried out in accordance with the articles has no application to cases where you have an obvious forgery. As regards that, it appears to me that the cases which have been referred to have no operation. In this case there is the right of this company to say: "These are not our bills, and we are not precluded from denying the authority of the person who purported to sign the bills on our behalf."

For these reasons I think the appeal should be allowed and judgment entered for the defendants with costs.

Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. (Viscount Finlay, Viscount Dunedin, Lord Parmoor, Lord Darling, and Lord Warrington of Clyffe.) 1927. Feb. 7.

ROBINS v. NATIONAL TRUST COMPANY, LIMITED, AND OTHERS.*

Privy Council Appeals—Concurrent findings of fact — General rule against interference — Exceptions.

The general rule, that on an appeal to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council the Board will not examine the evidence in order to interfere with the concurrent findings of two Courts on a pure question of fact, is not confined to Indian appeals but will be applied to all the judicatures from which an appeal lies to the Judicial Committee. Although an exception may be made to the rule in the case of a miscarriage of justice, yet the words "miscarriage of justice" in this exception mean only such a departure from the rules which permeate all judicial procedure as to make that which happened not in the proper sense judicial procedure at all.

The application of the rule may, however, be prevented by showing that the finding of one of the Courts was so based on an erroneous proposition of law that, if that proposition be corrected, the finding disappears.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Supreme Court of Ontario (Appellate Division), in a suit in which the appellant sought to set aside the will of Mr. E. C. Walker, a distiller at Walkerville, Ontario.

Mr. Stuart Bevan, K.C., Mr. O. E. Fleming, K.C. (of the Canadian Bar), and Sir Robert Aske appeared for the appellant; Mr. Glyn Osler, K.C., Mr. J. H. Rodd, K.C., and Mr. J. F. Hellmuth, K.C. (all of the Canadian Bar), for the respondents.

Lord Dunedin, in delivering their Lordships' judgment, said: The late Edward Chandler Walker was at first senior partner of the firm of Walker and Sons, and thereafter when that firm was changed into a limited company was president of Walker and Sons, Limited, whiskey distillers, in Walkerville, Ontario. He was a very wealthy man, married, but with no children, and he died on March 11, 1915, leaving a widow. He left a will dated February 27, 1914, and the respondents are the trustees and the principal beneficiaries under the said will. The said will revoked all prior wills. The testator had made a prior will on December 21, 1901, under which the appellant is a beneficiary. The present action is at the instance of the appellant to set aside the will of 1914 and restore the will of 1901. The grounds on which he seeks to set aside the will of 1914 are: 1. Want of testamentary capacity in the testator on the date of the execution of the said will; 2. Fraud or undue influence by which the testator's brothers obtained the execution of the said will.

The appellant was manager of the company, both as a firm and afterwards as a limited company, for a long period, and was on terms of great intimacy with the testator. The appellant left Walkerville in 1914, and went to England. He alleges that he only came to know of the will of 1901 under which he was a beneficiary, and of the state of affairs as at the date of the will of 1914, in April, 1922. On June 23, 1923, he raised the present action against the executors, and the beneficiaries were afterwards added as defendants.

The action was tried before Mr. Justice Mowat without a jury. Evidence was led on both sides. The evidence was voluminous and contradictory, and the trial lasted six or seven days. The learned Judge found that no testamentary incapacity of the testator had been made out, and that it had not been shown that the execution of the will was induced by fraud or undue influence, and he dismissed the action. Appeal was taken to the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court of Ontario, and that Court unanimously affirmed the judgment of the Trial Judge. Appeal has now been taken to the King in Council, and the appellant has sought to induce their Lordships who sit on this Board to examine and revise the evidence and to come to the conclusion that the result arrived at by the Trial Judge and the Court of Appeal was wrong. This raises in a quite distinct way the question whether their Lordships will examine the evidence in order to interfere with the concurrent findings of two Courts on a pure question of fact. Whether a man at the time of making his will had testamentary capacity, whether a will was the result of his own wish and act or was procured from him by means of fraud or circumvention or undue influence, are pure questions of fact. The rule as to concurrent findings is not a rule based on any statutory provision. It is rather a rule of conduct which the Board has laid down for itself. As such it has gradually developed. The Judicature which has given greatest occasion for its development has undoubtedly been the Judicature of India, but the principle is not in any way limited in its application to Indian legislation or Indian law, be it Hindu or Moslem, as such. Indeed it is obvious that, if such a rule is a good rule to be applied to the findings of the Courts in India, there could be no reason for suggesting that the findings of the Courts of our great self-governing Dominions should be entitled to less consideration. Their Lordships wish it to be clearly understood that the rule of conduct is a rule of conduct for the Empire, and will be applied to all the various Judicatures whose final tribunal is this Board.

Being as has been said a rule of conduct, and not a statutory provision, the rule is not cast iron, but it would avail little to try to give a definition, which should be at once exhaustive and accurate, of the exceptions which may arise. It will be sufficient to quote what has been said on this subject in the past :—

In Moung Tha Hnyeen v. Moung Pan Nyo (L.R., 27 Ind. Ap., 166) Lord Hobhouse, delivering the judgment of a Board which included Lord Macnaghten and Lord Lindley, said :—

"There has been nothing to show that there has been a miscarriage of justice or that any principles of law or of procedure have been violated in the Courts below. This case is one which very decidedly falls within the valuable principle recognized here, and commonly observed in second Courts of Appeal, that such a Court will not interfere with concurrent judgments of the Court below on matters of fact ; unless very definite and explicit grounds for that interference are assigned."

And in Rani Srimati v. Khajendra Narayan Singh (L.R., 31 Ind. Ap., 127) Lord Lindley repeated the view :—

"The appellants have failed to show any miscarriage of justice or the violation of any principle of law or procedure. Their Lordships, therefore, see no reason for departing from the usual practice of this Board of declining to interfere with two concurrent findings on pure questions of fact."

There was a faint attempt made in the present case to argue that what the appellant considered a quite inadequate appreciation and an unjustifiable belittling of a certain witness whom he regarded as all-important would amount to a miscarriage of justice. The expression means no such thing. It means such departure from the rules which permeate all judicial procedure as to make that which happened not in the proper use of the words judicial procedure at all. There is, however, also another way of preventing the application of the rule. If it can be shown that the finding of one of the Courts is so based on an erroneous proposition of law that if the proposition be corrected the finding disappears, then in that case it is no finding at all. Such an attempt was made with great skill and pertinacity by Mr. Bevan for the appellant in the present case. He laid stress on the law as it had been authoritatively settled in England, and in Ontario in such matters the law of England rules. Now the English Courts have gone what some might think pretty far on the question, what duty lies on those who propound a will. Those who propound a will must show that the will of which probate is sought is the will of the testator, and that the testator was a person of testamentary capacity. In ordinary cases if there is no suggestion to the contrary any man who is shown to have executed a will in ordinary form will be presumed to have testamentary capacity, but as soon as the capacity is called in question then at once the onus lies on those propounding the will to affirm positively the testamentary capacity. Moreover, if a will is only proved in common and not in solemn form, the same rule applies even though the action is to attack a probate which has been granted long ago. These propositions will be found to be settled by the following cases : Barry v. Butlin (2 Moo. P.C., 480) ; Cross v. Cross (3 Sw. and Tr., 292) ; Tyrrell v. Painton ([1894] P., 151).

Now their Lordships will assume that these cases are right. The reason for this form of expression is that the appellant represented that the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court of Ontario in the case of Larocque v. Landry (52 O.L.R., 479) had taken another view, in that it held that when once probate was granted though only in common form, the onus was on him who sought to set it aside, and the Court in this case held itself bound by that case. It is questionable whether that is the result of the decision. But assuming that it is, when an Appellate Court in a Colony which is regulated by English law differs from an Appellate Court in England, it is not right to assume that the Colonial Court is wrong. It is otherwise if the authority in England is that of the House of Lords. That is the supreme tribunal to settle English law, and, that being settled, the Colonial Court which is bound by English law is bound to follow it. Equally, of course, the point of difference may be settled so far as the Colonial Court is concerned by a judgment of this Board. But in the present case their Lordships do not consider it necessary to settle which of the two possible views as to onus is right ; they will assume for the purposes of this discussion that the English rule is right. But given the law the appellant in their Lordships' opinion fails in its application to the facts. Their Lordships cannot help thinking that the appellant takes rather a wrong view of what is truly the function of the question of onus in such cases. Onus is always on a person who asserts a proposition or fact which is not self-evident. To assert that a man who is alive was born requires no proof. The onus is not on the person making the assertion because it is self-evident that he had been born. But to assert that he was born on a certain date if the date is material, requires proof; the onus is on the person making the assertion. Now, in conducting any inquiry, the determining tribunal, be it judge or jury, will often find that the onus is sometimes on the side of one contending party, sometimes on the side of the other, or, as it is often expressed, that in certain circumstances the onus shifts. But onus as a determining factor of the whole case can only arise if the tribunal finds the evidence pro and con so evenly balanced that it can come to no sure conclusion. Then the onus will determine the matter. But if the tribunal, after hearing and weighing the evidence, comes to a determinate conclusion, the onus has nothing to do with it, and need not be further considered. That seems to their Lordships the case here. After reviewing the evidence as to capacity the learned Trial Judge says :—

"The result of this evidence pieced together, dovetailed together, combined and considered as a whole does not make me think that there was anything which would affect the mind or which would show the incapacity of the late E. C. Walker to make his will when he did."

The Court of Appeal first stated the grounds put forward by the appellant for the reversal of the judgment of the Trial Judge, thus :—

"That the evidence established that the testator was not mentally capable of making a will at the time when the alleged will was executed"; and after examining the evidence it concludes thus :

"The plaintiff clearly fails upon the first of his grounds for the reversal of the judgment."

There is a passage at the beginning of the Trial Judge's judgment which shows that on the question of onus he agreed with what had been laid down by the Court of Ontario, and the appellant argued that the learned Judges of the Court of Appeal must be presumed to have had the same views, and that, consequently, the whole judgment was vitiated by this wrong view as to onus. But, as has been already explained, there was no question of onus in the determination as it came to be made. It was a considered result of the evidence, and onus as a determining factor never arose, for the learned Judges could, and did, come to a positive conclusion on the evidence led. Learned counsel laid stress on the fact that the Trial Judge expressed the result of his view in a negative fashion :—

"The evidence does not make me think that there was anything which would show the incapacity of the testator."

He argued that that was no positive finding of capacity as the authorities require. The learned Judge was not dealing with onus. He was stating a result in ordinary English, and to say that the above sentence was not a positive finding of capacity seems to their Lordships as out of the question as to say that if one said of a man that he was not dead on a certain date there was no finding that he was alive.

Their Lordships therefore think that the attempt to avoid the effect of the concurrent finding rule fails. Much was sought to be made of the unfair way in which, the appellant argued, the Trial Judge had treated the evidence of a certain Dr. Shurly. Some of the criticisms that he made do not particularly recommend themselves to their Lordships, but in the end he came to his result on a consideration of the whole evidence. That the Court of Appeal looked at the evidence in rather a different way matters not, for the rule is a rule as to concurrent findings, and not a rule as to concurrent reasons. Thus in Ram Anugra Narain Singh v. Chowdhry Hanuman Sahai (L.R., 30 Ind. Ap., 41) the judgment of their Board states :—

"The rule (as to concurrent findings) is none the less applicable because the Courts may not have taken precisely the same view of the weight to be attached to each particular item of evidence."

No question of this sort arises as to the procuring of the will by fraud or undue influence, because it is admitted that in that case the onus is always on the person who attacks the will. See Craig v. Lamoureux (36 The Times L.R., 26; [1920] A.C., 349).

In their Lordships' opinion the rule as to concurrent findings clearly applies in this case, and the appeal falls to be dismissed. A petition was lodged for the admission of new evidence. This application had been made to the Court of Appeal and refused. Their Lordships will be slow indeed to interfere with the decision of the local Court on what is really a question of discretion and procedure. This petition therefore falls to be dismissed, with costs.

Their Lordships will humbly advise his Majesty in accordance with the above opinion. The appellant will pay the costs of the appeal.

Court of Appeal.
(Lord Hanworth, M.R., Sargant and Lawrence, L.JJ.)
1927. Feb. 7.

MITCHELL v. B. W. NOBLE, LIMITED.*

Revenue — Income-tax — Profits — Deductions —Business expense—Payment to retiring director—Income Tax Act, 1918 (8 and 9 Geo. V., c. 40), Schedule D, Cases I. and II., rule 3 (a).

The Court held that a payment by a company to a director in order to induce him to retire, in circumstances in which the other directors had come to the conclusion that it was essential in the interests of the company that he should retire, was a business expense deductible from the company's profits for purposes of income-tax.

Decision of Rowlatt, J. (43 The Times L.R., 100), affirmed.

This was an appeal from a decision of Mr. Justice Rowlatt (43 The Times L.R., 100). The short point was whether a payment to a retiring director, made because it was believed to be advantageous to the respondent company to get rid of him, was a business expense which could be deducted from profits in ascertaining the amount due for income-tax.

The company's directors were entitled to hold office for life, subject to their holding certain shares and subject to dismissal for misconduct. In the event of a director being so dismissed the remaining directors were empowered to require him to sell to them his shares in the company at par.

It was also provided that if any director should, inter alia, neglect his duties or be guilty of such misconduct towards the company or otherwise as would in the absence of any agreement to the contrary entitle a company summarily to dismiss him from his employment, the company should have power to dismiss him forthwith, paying to him such a proportion of his salary only as should then be due.

In 1920 the company, by altering its articles, issued 2,000 participating notes, and allotted them to the directors. The notes were to confer certain rights in profits. It was provided that no persons other than a director, officer, servant, or employee of the company should be entitled to hold or acquire participating notes. It was also provided that when a noteholder ceased to be a director, officer, servant, or employee of the company he should forthwith surrender his notes to the company to be cancelled.

During 1920 and 1921 considerable friction of a personal nature arose between one director of the company and his co-directors, and there was evidence before the Special Commissioners of conduct on the part of that director improper in a director of the company. The other directors desired to get rid of him and considered it necessary for the sake of the good name of the company to do so. It was admitted that the company might possibly have been justified by law in exercising its power of dismissal, in which case the dismissed director would have been entitled to no compensation. But the other directors were anxious that the matter should not become public, and they entered into negotiations with the director concerned for his retirement. He at first demanded £50,000, but a compromise was eventually arrived at, and on December 30, 1921, an agreement was entered into between the company, the remaining directors, and the retiring director, whereby the retiring director agreed (1) to retire from the company ; (2) to transfer his shares, which at that time were 300 £1 shares, at their face value of £1 per share to the remaining directors ; and (3) to surrender his participating notes. The company agreed to pay him £19,200 and the directors to pay him £300, making together the sum of £19,500. He agreed to accept that sum in full and complete satisfaction of all claims which he had or might have against the company or the directors. (The £300 paid by the directors was expressed to be the consideration for his shares.)

The sum of £19,500 was payable in five annual instalments. The first instalment (which was duly paid) amounted to £5,500 and consisted of (a) the £300 payable by the directors for the retiring director's shares and (b) £5,200 being part of the £19,200 payable by the company.

It was contended on behalf of the company that the sum of £19,200 was money wholly and exclusively laid out for the purposes of the business ; and that the instalments were admissible deductions from profits as and when they fell due.

It was contended on behalf of the Crown, inter alia :—

(1) That, in essence, the £19,200 was domestic expenditure incurred for the purpose of buying out a director and shareholder for purely personal reasons and was not expenditure incurred for the purpose of earning profits of the company.

(2) That neither the £19,200, nor the instalment of £5,200, nor any other instalment thereof was money wholly and exclusively laid out or expended for the purposes of the company's business, nor admissible as a deduction in computing the profits of the company for assessment to income-tax.

The Special Commissioners held that the instalment of £5,200 paid to the retiring director should be allowed as a business expense, and they reduced the assessment.

Mr. Justice Rowlatt upheld the Special Commissioners.

The Crown now appealed.

The Attorney-General (Sir Douglas Hogg, K.C.) and Mr. R. P. Hills appeared for the Crown and cited, inter alia, British Insulated and Helsby Cables, Limited v. Atherton (42 The Times L.R., 187 ; [1926] A.C., 205) ; Ounsworth v. Vickers, Limited (31 The Times L.R., 530 ; [1915] 3 K.B., 267).

Mr. Konstam, K.C., Mr. Le Quesne, K.C., and Mr. Merlin for the respondents were not called upon.

The Master of the Rolls, in giving judgment, said that it was clear that the company was one which, with a very small capital, could earn very large profits mainly by the personal skill and industry and reputation of the directors. It was therefore natural that they should agree to terms with this director who had resigned, so as to avoid any scandal. Good credit was essential to the carrying on of the business, and the Court must not overlook the finding of the Special Commissioners that a bargain had been concluded in the interests of the company. The directors had had to face a difficult and delicate problem ; they had to get rid of this director without public scandal, and so they had agreed to give him a large sum which was to be paid by instalments.

It was said that that was not a payment "wholly and exclusively" for the purposes of the business within the meaning of Rule 3 (a) of Cases I. and II. of Schedule D of the Income Tax Act, 1918, although the Special Commissioners had found that it was a "business expense." In his (the Master of the Rolls's) view, the Court should interpret that phrase as applying to an expense incurred for and on behalf of carrying on the business of the company, and it seemed that the Special Commissioners meant to find that as a "business expense" it was incurred "wholly and exclusively" for the business.

That was the finding of fact, but it could, of course, be said that it was not open to them to find that in law. Upon that question, however, he agreed with what was said by Lord Cave in British Insulated and Helsby Cables v. Atherton (42 The Times L.R., 187 ; [1926] A.C., at p. 212), that :—

"A sum of money expended, not of necessity and with a view to a direct and immediate benefit to the trade, but voluntarily and on the grounds of commercial expediency, and in order indirectly to facilitate the carrying on of the business, may yet be expended wholly and exclusively for the purposes of the trade."

That, and other authorities which had been cited, showed that, when there was this finding of fact that the directors were minded to save the company from scandal and that they were satisfied that they must get rid of this director and pay this sum as a means of doing so, then it was impossible to say that it could not be regarded as a sum which could be deducted as an expense of the business. In Strong and Co., of Romsey, Limited v. Woodfield (22 The Times L.R., 754 ; [1906] A.C., at p. 452) Lord Loreburn said :—

"I think only such losses can be deducted as are connected with, in the sense that they are really incidental to, the trade itself."

And Lord Davey said in the same case, at p. 453 :—

"These words are used in other rules, and appear to me to mean for the purpose of enabling a person to carry on and earn profits in the trade."

In the present case the directors had had to face a situation of delicacy and gravity ; they were justified in the course which they took, and from that point of view the payment was a proper business deduction.

Then it was said for the Crown that, even if that were so, it was a capital expenditure, although spread over certain years; and that it was an ascertained sum, and not one of a recurring nature. Mr. Justice Rowlatt, on the other hand, held that it was a simple business payment. Several cases bearing upon this point had been discussed in British Insulated and Helsby Cables v. Atherton (supra). In Smith v. Incorporated Council of Law Reporting (30 The Times L.R., 588; [1914] 3 K.B., 674) a gratuity of £1,500 was paid to a law reporter upon retirement. Hancock v. General Reversionary and Investment Company, Limited (35 The Times L.R., 11; [1919] 1 K.B., 25) was a case where money was expended to purchase an annuity for the benefit of a retiring actuary.

It was not easy to get much help from particular cases on their own particular facts, but it seemed to him that the present case approximated more closely to these last two cases, where the deduction was allowed as current expenditure, than to the British Insulated and Helsby Cables case (supra) and other cases where the sum expended was held to be capital.

The payment in the present case was made in the course of business. It was not made to secure an actual asset to the company so as effectively to increase the company's capital. It was made to enable the directors to carry on as they had done in the past, unfettered by the presence of a colleague who might have a bad effect upon their credit. The payment was a business expense and deductible for income-tax purposes. The appeal would be dismissed.

Lord Justice Sargant, after stating the facts, said that with regard to the question whether the disbursement was wholly and exclusively for the purposes of the business he could see nothing to show or even suggest that it was not so. A good deal of stress had been laid upon the fact that the continuing directors could buy out the shares of the retiring director at par, but they could have done that in the same way if he had been dismissed. In a company of this private and confidential nature it was absolutely necessary that, if one director left, his shares should be taken by the others. Again, the mere fact that a very large dividend could have been earned was not conclusive, because these dividends would have come from the whole company and been incidental to the profits of the whole company, and therefore, as a secondary result, a payment made to ensure the prosperity of the whole company was not tarnished, so to speak, by the fact that it went to the benefit of the directors, who were in fact the company.

Then it was said that this must be a payment of capital. With regard to that he (Lord Justice Sargant) agreed with the view of Mr. Justice Rowlatt that compensation paid to ensure the dismissal of a servant was a payment usually attributable to revenue, and to the year in which it was made. It did not seem on the face of it to be a capital expenditure, and it was a payment of a sort which might be liable to recur, though it might be hoped that it would not. Moreover, to him (the Lord Justice) it seemed impossible to say to what capital account such a payment could be placed. It did not seem to be such a payment as could be taken to be withdrawn from the company's capital of only £1,000. It was undoubtedly paid out of profits, and essentially different from the payments made in cases which had been referred to which were payments for the permanent benefit of the company and for the permanent increase of its capital. The appeal must therefore be dismissed.

Lord Justice Lawrence said that he agreed with the other members of the Court that this was a payment wholly and exclusively for the business, and that its sole object was to enable the company to carry on its activities. As to whether it was an expenditure of capital or of revenue, he confessed that he had some doubts, which were not wholly resolved, whether the payment was not made, as said by Lord Cave in British Insulated and Helsby Cables v. Atherton (42 The Times L.R., 187; [1926] A.C., 205), to secure an advantage for the enduring benefit of a trade. However, the other members of the Court had decided that the payment was not of capital, and his (Lord Justice Lawrence's) doubts in the matter were not strong enough to make him wish that a reply should be asked for from the respondents.

Practice—Costs—Defamation—Contemptuous damages—Plaintiff's costs—Court's discretion—Principle on which rule is to be applied—Meaning of "good cause" for costs not following event—Action oppressive or one that should not have been brought—Relevant matters before issue of writ may be considered—Order LXV., rule 1.

This action, tried with a special jury, was brought by Lionel Walker Birch Martin, of Kensington, late managing director of Bamford and Martin, Limited, motor engineers, of Kensington, who alleged that the defendant, the Hon. John Roby Benson, a director of the above company, on three occasions uttered words to three different persons imputing dishonesty on the plaintiff's part. In substance the defences were two: (1) Non-publication; (2) justification. There was no plea of privilege. The words complained of contained a number of serious allegations against the plaintiff, and their meaning the defendant did not seek to dispute. The particulars of justification were expressed in the clearest and most unambiguous terms. They charged the plaintiff (inter alia) with three felonies of larceny, with criminal conspiracies, and with several acts of dishonesty.

The trial of the action lasted for many days. Much of the evidence was of an intricate character. At the conclusion of the summing-up his Lordship left a series of questions to the jury which covered the various points raised by the defence and particulars of justification. The jury found that the defendant had in fact published the words complained of, and they found also as to each separate matter of justification that the plea of justification had not been proved by the defendant. Upon each of the seven separate heads dealt with by them the jury awarded the plaintiff damages to the extent of ¼d. only. The damages were, therefore, 1¾d. in all.

* Reported by G. G. Beagley, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

After the jury had given their verdict the defendant's counsel asked that the plaintiff be deprived of costs. On the application of the plaintiff's counsel, there was on a later date an examination of legal decisions upon the question of costs, and judgment was reserved.

Mr. Norman Birkett, K.C., and Mr. J. W. Morris were for the plaintiff; Sir Leslie Scott, K.C., and Mr. Hugh Beazley for the defendant.

His Lordship, in giving judgment, said:—The plaintiff's counsel pointed out to the jury in the plainest words the gravity of the accusations made against his client, and he asked for damages which would fully vindicate the plaintiff's character and conduct. The defendant's counsel stated in express language that he, too, recognized the serious character of the allegations made, and as to the criminal offences charged he said that he regarded himself as occupying the position of a prosecuting counsel with respect to the burden of proof. The jury were fully alive to the considerations involved. As a result of the trial they awarded to the plaintiff the sum of 1¾d. damages only. The amount given was as contemptuous as it could be.

The question for decision is whether I should make an order depriving the plaintiff of costs. The jurisdiction of the Court in such a matter rests to-day on Order LXV., Rule 1, which provides (in substance) that where an action is tried with a jury the costs shall follow the event unless the Court, for good cause, shall otherwise order. The words "good cause" have been discussed in many cases, and it is not easy to elicit a clear meaning from so broad a phrase. The Court has a discretion, but it is a discretion which must, of course, be exercised judicially. The notes in the practice books upon Order LXV., Rule 1, are replete with decisions upon the point. Before the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1873, in actions of libel and slander, damages under 40s. did not carry costs. See per Lord Justice Bowen in Moore v. Gill (4 The Times L.R., 738). Hence the problem did not then arise which to-day calls from time to time for judicial consideration when trivial damages are given in claims for defamation. Order LXV., Rule 1, it is to be noted, applies to all actions tried with a jury. It contains no special provision with respect to actions of libel and slander. It is obvious, however, that each type of action may have its particular aspects and call for distinctive consideration. With respect to every class of jury action, however, it seems to be clear that the Judge is to decide the question of costs independently of any view expressed by the jury. In the case now before me the jury expressed in clear and emphatic manner their own view that each party should pay his own costs. But, as Mr. Justice Hawkins pointed out in Roberts v. Jones (7 The Times L.R., 517; [1891] 2 Q.B., 194, at p. 198), "The Judge is under no obligation to give effect to any special reasons or views the jury may have entertained or expressed in giving their verdict, such, for instance, as a hope or recommendation that it may or may not carry costs, unless such views accord with his own." See too the even clearer words of Lord Justice James in Harnett v. Vise (5 Ex.D., 307, at p. 311), and per the Court of Appeal in Wootton v. Sievier (30 The Times L.R., 165). It is plain that the Judge must exercise his discretion as to costs, not only unfettered by, but wholly independently of, any view expressed by the jury on that particular matter.

Now what is "good cause" in such a case as the present? In Forster v. Farquhar (9 The Times L.R., 338; [1893] 1 Q.B., 564, at p. 567) (which was not a case of defamation), Lord Justice Bowen, in giving the judgment of the Court, said: "No nearer and no closer definition can be given that there will be good cause whenever it is fair and just as between the parties that it should be so." But the question still remains as to when it is fair and just to make a special order depriving the plaintiff of costs upon a trial by jury. The constantly cited decision of Jones v. Curling (13 Q.B.D., 262), which again was not a case of defamation, but of ejectment, indicated in substance that upon the question of good cause within Order LXV., Rule 1, "the facts must show the existence of something, having regard either to the conduct of the parties or to the facts of the case, which makes it more just that an exceptional order should be made than that the case should be left to the ordinary course of taxation." (See, for example, per Lord Esher, Master of the Rolls, at page 268.) Taking then the broad statements of Lord Justice Bowen and Lord Esher, Master of the Rolls, in the cases which I have cited, the question here is as to the manner in which they should be applied to actions for defamation. Upon this point Harnett v. Vise (supra) is important. It was an action for libel. The plaintiff had secured a verdict for £10 damages, but had been deprived of costs by Baron Huddleston under a rule of Court substantially similar to Order LXV., Rule 1. The matter went to the Court of Appeal. They affirmed the decision of the Judge (which had been approved by a Divisional Court) and they laid down a useful principle. That principle was stated by Lord Justice James (page 311) as follows: "It is the duty of the Judge who tried the case, and the duty of the Court of Appeal also, to consider the whole circumstances of the case, everything which led to the action, everything which led to the libel, everything in the conduct of the parties which may show that the action was not properly brought in respect of the libel complained of." The Court, therefore, is not confined in any way to that which has occurred since the writ. It may look at all the relevant matters which took place before the writ. In this connexion it is worth while to mention the wide area of considerations which is open to a jury with respect to the assessment of damages. See Praed v. Graham (24 Q.B.D., 53). The jury, as Lord Esher there pointed out, may consider the plaintiff's conduct before action, after action, and in Court during the trial. As Lord Justice James indicated in Harnett v. Vise (supra, at p. 312), when dealing with the question of costs there may be a great deal in the conduct of a plaintiff which shows that he himself has brought about the defamation complained of. This point, I think, is important. A like view of the principle was expressed by Lord Justice A. L. Smith in Bostock v. Ramsey Urban District Council (16 The Times L.R., 520; [1900] 2 Q.B., 616, at p. 622)—a case of malicious prosecution—where the successful defendants were deprived of costs. I may mention, too, the words of Lord Justice Atkin in Ritter v. Godfrey (36 The Times L.R., 144; [1920] 2 K.B., 47, at p. 61), where he expressed the view that there would be grounds for dealing with a successful plaintiff's costs when his conduct had induced the defendant reasonably to believe that he had a good defence. The principle seems clear: the difficulty lies in the application. It is in the light of the decisions cited, and particularly of Harnett v. Vise (supra), that other rulings on the question of costs in actions for defamation should be considered. It must, I take it, be now deemed clear law that a plaintiff is not to be deprived of costs merely because a jury has given nominal damages. See O'Connor v. Star Newspaper, Limited (9 The Times L.R., 233), where, however, Lord Justice A. L. Smith pointed out that the smallness of the damages was an important element to be considered if there were other circumstances which could be taken into account. In that case the plaintiff, who recovered one shilling damages, was in fact deprived of costs.

It may not, of course, be right to deprive a plaintiff of costs where nominal damages only have been given upon the request of the plaintiff's counsel and where good ground exists for thinking that the assessment of a trivial sum by the jury was referable to that request. But if no particular circumstance such as that which I have just suggested by way of example exists, and a jury award contemptuous damages, what ought a Judge to do in the exercise of his discretion ? There are several decisions and dicta which help to a conclusion. In Moore v. Gill (supra, at p. 739) Lord Justice Bowen said : " It seemed to him that in this case a farthing damages meant that the action ought not to have been brought, and that it was prima facie 'good cause' for depriving the plaintiff of costs." In Wood v. Cox (5 The Times L.R., 272, at p. 274), where the plaintiff obtained one farthing damages only, Lord Justice Bowen said : " The jury, by giving such damages, said in effect that the plaintiff did not deserve to get more than a farthing, though the libel was a serious one." In the course of the argument he had said (page 273) : " In law a plaintiff brings an action not to clear his character but to recover damages. If the jury only give him a farthing, might it not be said that he ought not to have brought the action ? " Lord Justice Fry said : " Where the smallness of the damages indicated the view of the jury that the action ought not to have been brought, in his opinion 'good cause' to deprive the plaintiff of costs existed." In O'Connor v. Star Newspaper, Limited (supra), Lord Justice Bowen said : " The smallness of the damages was not conclusive upon that point. Speaking for himself he was inclined to think that when a farthing was given as damages in an action of libel or slander, that threw the onus of proof upon the plaintiff to show a reason for bringing the action ; it prima facie showed a reason for thinking that the plaintiff ought to be deprived of costs." The views expressed by Lord Justice Bowen seem to me to indicate the sound rule to be applied by the Court in the absence of any special facts which may explain the award of contemptuous damages. It must be remembered that an action for defamation is one in which the considerations of character, conduct, and reputation are peculiarly relevant, and that they are to be viewed in relation to the circumstances of publication and the general facts of the case. Here I may mention that the publications complained of in the present case were made to personal friends of the plaintiff under the circumstances shown in the evidence.

It is not possible satisfactorily to enumerate the special circumstances which may lead the Court to refuse a defendant's application to deprive a plaintiff of costs where trivial damages for defamation have been given by a jury. I see that in Macalister v. Steedman (27 The Times L.R., 217) Mr. Justice Bucknill refused to deprive a plaintiff of his costs, though the jury had found one farthing damages only. He apparently based his decision to a large extent on the fact that the jury found that the defendant had acted with express malice. This, I think, may be a matter of distinct relevance. There was no suggestion in the case now before me that the defendant had acted maliciously. I see, too, that in special circumstances Baron Huddleston, in Myers v. Financial News (5 The Times L.R., 42), not only deprived the plaintiff, who had been awarded a farthing damages by the jury in an action of libel, of his costs, but also directed him to pay the costs of the defendants. Many decisions on the point, I may mention, are collected and discussed in Mr. Gatley's excellent treatise on the Law of Libel and Slander. It is desirable that I should refer to three of them. The first is Williams v. Ward (55 L.J., Q.B., 566), in the Court of Appeal, which indicated one aspect of the matter which may arise in defamation actions. There the defendant had published a serious libel of (as Lord Esher said) " a multifarious kind." It made many charges against the plaintiff. The Court said that the jury must have thought that all the substantial allegations were proved, and that the charges made by the defendant were true except in some small and insignificant particulars. The Court therefore took the view that the action was oppressive, and thus that good cause existed within Order LXV., Rule 1. The verdict in that case was apparently a general one, whereas in the case before me the jury gave a number of findings and not a general verdict. But if, as in the case before me, the jury gives a repeated award of contemptuous damages, even though some of the slanders were of the most serious nature, I confess that I can see no distinction in principle beween Williams v. Ward (supra) and the present action. The next decision that I cite is Nicolas v. Atkinson (25 The Times L.R., 568), where Mr. Justice Phillimore said that his recollection was that in the more recent cases no costs had been given where damages were only a farthing. My own recollection agrees with that of the learned Judge, who is now Lord Phillimore. The final decision that I cite is a case which throws, I feel, much light on the matter, and which falls into line not only with Williams v. Ward (supra) but with the earlier cases which establish the principle on which Order LXV., Rule 1, is to be applied, not only generally, but particularly with respect to actions of defamation. I refer to Red Man's Syndicate, Limited v. Associated Newspapers, Limited (26 The Times L.R., 394). In that action of libel the jury found one farthing damages only. Mr. Justice Phillimore pointed out that where a farthing damages was given in a personal action for defamation it generally meant that a wrong had been suffered, but that owing to the nearness of the statements to the truth the wrong was so slight that a farthing covered the damage, or that the plaintiff's general character was so bad that it had not suffered further substantial damage by the libel or slander. In either case he thought that a defendant should not be called upon to pay the plaintiff's costs, and he therefore made an order under Order LXV., Rule 1, depriving the plaintiff of them. The underlying principle of this seems to be that in such cases the action should be regarded as oppressive, and as one that should not have been brought, and that therefore " good cause " exists.

Recognizing as I do that each case must depend on its own particular facts, I am satisfied in the present action that I ought to make an order depriving the plaintiff of costs. I have no doubt that the verdict of the jury meant, either that the statements made were so nearly true that ignominious damages would suffice, or that the plaintiff's character was so bad that contemptuous damages should be given. This, I think, is the basic explanation of the assessment by the jury, after the fullest deliberation, of one farthing damages only upon each head of claim, including the charges of felony. Nor do I doubt that the jury took the view that in any event the conduct of the plaintiff had been open to the gravest suspicion, that it called for severe condemnation, and that the plaintiff had brought the defamation upon himself. In my opinion the jury were amply warranted, upon the circumstances revealed at the trial, in assessing the damages at the smallest sum that could be given.

I make an order depriving the plaintiff of costs.

Court of Criminal Appeal.

REX v. HUGHES.*

Criminal Law—Procedure—Indictment—False pretences — Amendment — Introduction of allegation as to representation of existing fact —Indictments Act, 1915 (5 and 6 Geo. V., c. 90), s. 5 (1).

A count for obtaining goods by false pretences, consisting in a promise to do something in the future, cannot be amended under s. 5 (1) of the Indictments Act, 1915, so as to introduce for the first time the fundamental ingredient of the representation of an alleged existing fact.

This was an appeal by Robert Hughes, the first Lord Mayor of Cardiff, who had been convicted at Swansea Assizes of obtaining money by false pretences and of larceny, and had been sentenced to three years' penal servitude.

Mr. T. W. Langman appeared for the appellant; Lord Halsbury, K.C., and Mr. Ivor Brace for the Crown.

Mr. LANGMAN said that the indictment on which Hughes was charged consisted of 18 counts charging him with obtaining money by false pretences, and with stealing it by a trick. Hughes had taken a great part in public life, and had been the first Lord Mayor of Cardiff. He had been a traveller for a large firm of whisky distillers, and also for certain large breweries, and had acquired an unrivalled knowledge of the licensed trade and the value of licensed property. The allegations against him were that in 1924, while in financial difficulties, he advertised for managers for certain licensed houses, and obtained from the persons who answered those advertisements certain sums as deposits by falsely pretending that he was in a position to appoint them as managers of licensed houses.

The indictment, as filed, alleged that Hughes had said that he "would" appoint the donors of the money to managerships. It was amended at the close of the case for the prosecution to an allegation that he had represented that he was in a position to make the appointments. That was done to make the indictment accord with evidence which had been elicited by questions put by the Judge. Section 5 (1) of the Indictments Act, 1915, gave the Court power to amend a defective indictment. This indictment, however, was not defective, but bad, and the amendment to it was not an amendment of a mere defect of form, but went to the very substance of the matter.

LORD HALSBURY said that the amendment could properly be made after the Grand Jury had found a true bill. No injustice had resulted from what had occurred, since the case had been dealt with entirely on the footing that the false pretence was that Hughes was, at the material moment, in a position to give to the applicants the jobs which he had promised them. If, moreover, the amendment had been refused he (counsel) would have gone on with the larceny charges and invited the Judge to direct the jury that they could find Hughes guilty of false pretences on the evidence given in support of those charges: see section 44 (3) of the Larceny Act, 1916. As the applicants had no intention of parting with the permanent possession of their money, there was evidence on which the jury could convict Hughes of larceny by a trick.

The LORD CHIEF JUSTICE, in giving the judgment of the Court, said that the false pretences and the larceny counts in the indictment were alternative. The jury had, however, convicted Hughes on all the counts. That, of course, was absurd.

The indictment was, with great carelessness, copied and passed, and in every one of the counts relating to false pretences the pretence was stated to be "by falsely pretending that he, the said Robert Hughes, would appoint the said So-and-So as manager . . ." In other words, the false pretences thus alleged were entirely consistent with mere futurity. At the trial a great part of the evidence was consistent with the view that what Hughes had said to the witnesses was of the nature of a promise to be fulfilled in the future.

At the end of the case for the prosecution, the Judge at the trial thought it right to amend the counts charging false pretences so as to read, "by falsely pretending that he, the said Robert Hughes, was in a position to appoint . . ." Hughes complained that he was prejudiced by that amendment's being made and that it could not be made "without injustice" to him within section 5 (1) of the Indictments Act, 1915.

In the opinion of the Court that sub-section dealt with defective indictments. Its object was to enable the Court, that justice might be done, to remedy a defect in an indictment. That was a wholly different matter from revising and altering the substance of the charge. As the indictment in the present case was copied and passed it alleged false pretences which were none at all. The evidence was largely consistent with such representations having been made, and it would be a bad precedent in such circumstances to permit the re-writing of the alleged false pretences at the conclusion of the case for the prosecution so as to introduce into the indictment for the first time the fundamental ingredient of the representation of an alleged existing fact. That was not correcting a defect in the indictment; it was altering its substance in circumstances in which Hughes was prejudiced by the alteration. His conviction on the counts charging false pretences must be quashed.

There was no evidence on which Hughes could be convicted on the counts charging larceny by a trick. The applicants for managerships intended to part with their money, relying no doubt on hopes which were disappointed. It was true that section 44 (3) of the Larceny Act, 1916, in a proper case and after a proper direction, empowered a jury to convict of false pretences on an indictment charging larceny, but that was entirely different from finding a verdict of false pretences on an indictment charging false pretences, which indictment, up to the last moment, was in substance wrong.

On the moral merits of the case it might be that little could be said for Hughes, but, not without reluctance, the Court had come to the conclusion that the appeal succeeded.

There being another indictment on the file against Hughes, he was released on his own recognizances to appear at Cardiff Assizes on February 10.

Court of Appeal.
(Lord Hewart, C.J., Bankes and Scrutton, L.JJ.)
1927. Feb. 1.

PATHÉ OF FRANCE, LIMITED v. HARRIS
SAME v. MANSBRIDGE.*

Revenue — Customs — Cinematograph films—Emulsionized celluloid sheets in rolls—Width of 3ft. 9in.—Whether dutiable—Films 9½ millimetres wide—Imposition of duty on films "of standard width of 1⅜ inches"—Customs Consolidation Act, 1876 (39 and 40 Vict., c. 36), s. 17—Finance Act, 1925 (15 and 16 Geo. V., c. 36), s. 3 (1).

The effect of s. 17 of the Customs Consolidation Act, 1876, is that duty is payable under s. 3 (1) of the Finance Act, 1925, on films of the width of 9½ millimetres for use in a toy cinematograph.

But emulsionized celluloid sheets in the form of rolls 3ft. 9in. wide, although when cut and otherwise treated they could be used in a cinematograph, are not necessarily "cinematograph films" within s. 3 (1) of the Finance Act, 1925, and therefore on importation may not be chargeable with Customs duty under that enactment.

Judgment of Talbot, J. (42 The Times L.R., 760), reversed on the first point and affirmed on the second.

These were two appeals by the defendants from the judgment of Mr. Justice Talbot (42 The Times L.R., 760).

The actions were brought by the plaintiffs, Pathé of France, Limited, against collectors of H.M. Customs and Excise, asking for a declaration that no duty was payable by them on films 9½mm. wide for use with baby ciné apparatus imported by them from France, and for the return of £519 duty which had been paid. They also asked for a declaration that emulsionized celluloid sheet imported from France was not dutiable, and for the return of £6 2s. 10d.

Mr. Justice Talbot gave judgment in favour of the plaintiffs in both cases.

The defendants appealed.

The Solicitor-General (Sir Thomas Inskip, K.C.) and Mr. Bowstead appeared for the appellants; Sir Duncan Kerly, K.C., and Mr. J. G. Joseph for the respondents.

The Lord Chief Justice said: These two appeals have, as a matter of convenience, been heard together, but they do not raise precisely the same questions. Each of them is an appeal from the judgment of Mr. Justice Talbot, and in each proceeding it was claimed that a certain duty had been wrongly charged by collectors of Customs, in the one case upon films for use in a miniature cinematograph, known in the trade as a baby cinema apparatus, and in the other case upon a sheet of celluloid over 40 yards long and some 3ft. 9in. wide coated upon a substratum with emulsion. The plaintiffs are dealers in films for use in cinematograph exhibitions and also in other photographic appliances and accessories.

The question for our decision turns on the construction and application of a certain part of section 3 of the Finance Act, 1925, which, in its turn, repeated, with very slight modifications, the provisions of section 12 of the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1915. The Act of 1925 provided by section 3, subsection (1), that after a certain day certain Customs duties should be charged on articles imported into Great Britain or Northern Ireland. There is set out in the subsection a table or schedule which begins with motor-cars and their accessories and component parts, goes on to musical instruments and similar instruments and their accessories and component parts, then to clocks, watches and their accessories and component parts, and then finally comes to cinematograph films. The provision with regard to cinematograph films is as follows:—

"Cinematograph films imported for the purpose of the exhibition of pictures or other optical effects by means of a cinematograph or other similar apparatus;

"Blank film, on which no picture has been impressed, known as raw film or stock;

"Positives, that is, films containing a picture for exhibition, whether developed or not;

"Negatives, that is, films containing a photograph, whether developed or not, from which positives can be printed."

Those are the cinematograph films which are to be the subject of the new Customs duty. Then there follows what may be described as a money column, headed "Per linear foot of the standard width of 1⅜ inches," and calculated in that way, the duty, in the first case, on the blank films is to be ½d., on the positives 1d., and on the negatives 5d. Those are the films which are to be the subject of the duty, and those are the duties which, in the respective cases, are to be paid.

I deal first with the judgment of the learned Judge so far as it related to what has been described as the sheet of celluloid. That is really the judgment in the second case. In that case, apart from subsidiary questions, the main contest was whether it was true to describe this material, some 3ft. 9in. wide, as a cinematograph film within the meaning of this subsection. Nobody suggested that it was a cinematograph film suitable for exhibition in the condition in which it was, or suitable in the condition in which it was for being converted immediately into a positive or a negative film. What was said was that when it had undergone certain processes, which proved on analysis to be at least three, namely, slitting, perforation and trimming, it was material capable of being converted into cinematograph films, and that, as it stood, it was accurately to be described, not, indeed, as a cinematograph film, but as "cinematograph film," a generic description.

The question turned on evidence, and the learned Judge, who had the great advantage of hearing and seeing the witnesses themselves, arrived, after hearing the evidence, at a conclusion which he has expressed in no ambiguous terms. "I am satisfied," he says, "that no one in the trade, or out of it, would call such a sheet a cinematograph film. It might perhaps be described as cinematograph film in the sense of film which can, when cut into strips and otherwise treated, be used in a cinematograph. But the Act says 'cinematograph films,' not 'film,' and though it is true that one subdivision of cinematograph films is described as blank film, I think that any inconsistency which there may be between these two parts of subsection (1) must be reconciled by limiting the meaning of 'blank film' to such blank film as falls within the class of cinematograph films and not by enlarging what is, in my opinion, the true meaning of 'cinematograph films' so as to include anything which might not improperly be described as 'blank films.'"

That is the finding of the learned Judge, and that is the view which he has expressed. Our attention has been directed to all the relevant portions of the evidence on this point. It is sufficient to say that although there may be in one place or, it may be, two places a certain ambiguity, I am not prepared to take the responsibility of saying that the learned Judge, on a question of fact, arrived at an incorrect conclusion. With regard to the construction of the section, in the part of it which is relevant to this matter, I think, with all respect, that the learned Judge was right. It seems to me, therefore, that so far as the second action is concerned, this appeal fails, subject to this, however, that the plaintiffs succeeded in obtaining a declaration which, on one view of it, is superfluous, and on another view of it goes beyond what is right, and I do not think that that declaration ought to stand.

With regard to the other question, that is to say, the question raised in the first of the two cases, different considerations arise. There the subject-matter under consideration was undoubtedly not a sheet but a strip, and a strip suitable in its then condition to be used, and intended in its then condition to be used, in what is called a miniature cinematograph. Here, clearly, we have passed beyond the region of the raw material and have got into the region of the manufactured article. But it is said that, although in all other respects this strip satisfies the requirements of the definition which is contended for of a cinematograph film, nevertheless it fails in the vital respect that it is too narrow. That argument depends upon a particular construction of this part of the subsection which describes, under the heading "Per linear foot of the standard width of 1⅜ inches," the various rates of Customs duties that are to be applied in the several cases. It is said that at the time when the Act of 1915, copied, so far as this part of it is concerned, afterwards into the Act of 1925, was passed there was no width for business purposes except the width of 1⅜in., and that Parliament was designating the particular and known articles which alone were to be the subject of Customs duty. That was the view which was ultimately accepted by the learned Judge. Sir Duncan Kerly has very frankly admitted, in the course of his argument, that if that view is right, all the words at the head of this table after the words "Per linear foot" are otiose, and, if otiose, easily misleading. If Parliament was dealing and intending to deal only with films or strips of the well-known width of 1⅜in., it would, I think, have been sufficient to say "Per linear foot." That is not what Parliament said. It chose to say: "Per linear foot of the standard width of 1⅜ inches." That seems to me to suggest a computation, just as the earlier part of the subsection, where it is dealing with motor-cars, musical instruments, and clocks, provides that the Customs duties shall be an amount equal to 33⅓ per cent. of the value of the article. The length of the film being ascertained, the width of the actual film being ascertained, the money rate can easily be applied on the basis of "Per linear foot of the standard width of 1⅜ inches"; and, indeed, at the time when that Act was passed, there were, so to say, lying in wait for it the provisions of the Customs Consolidation Act, 1876, which, by section 17, provides, among other things, that "all duties, rates, charges and drawbacks imposed and allowed according to any specified quantity or any specified value shall be deemed to apply in the same proportion to any greater or less quantity or value," and so on.

It seems to me, though I say it diffidently, that the learned Judge, on this part of the matter, came to a wrong conclusion, and that these words "of the standard width of 1⅜ inches," so far from limiting and circumscribing that which was to be the subject-matter of the Customs duties, were really providing a mode and a measure of calculation of the Customs duties to be applied to films of varying widths, it might be more or it might be less.

There was finally another argument faintly indicated with reference to this part of the matter, namely, that these baby films, as they are called, are not within the taxing section because they are not in the proper sense of the term intended for exhibition, and reference was made to the Cinematograph Act, 1909. But that Act was an Act imposing, for the safety of the public in particular, various safeguards with reference to the public exhibition of films, and especially films of a certain kind. Section 1 provided that "An exhibition of pictures or other optical effects by means of a cinematograph, or other similar apparatus, for the purposes of which inflammable films are used, shall not be given unless the regulations made by the Secretary of State for securing safety are complied with."

Then by section 7, subsection (4), it was provided that the Act should not apply "to an exhibition given in a private dwelling house to which the public are not admitted, whether on payment or otherwise." Even a slight acquaintance with the provisions of that Act makes it clear that it would have been ludicrous to apply the provisions of that Act to an exhibition in a private dwelling house to which the public were not admitted. But that does not make that which takes place in that house not an exhibition. On the contrary, this very subsection speaks of it as an exhibition—"this Act shall not apply to an exhibition given in a private dwelling house."

I think no assistance is to be derived from the vocabulary employed in that Act for the proposition that this kind of film, called a baby film, cannot be intended for exhibition, because it is used in fact only for private exhibition, though indeed the evidence shows that it is not always used merely for private exhibition.

It seems to me, therefore, that in this case the decision of the learned Judge ought to be reversed and that there ought to be judgment for the defendant in the action, the appellant in this Court.

Lord Justice Bankes said: I agree in the result that one of these appeals must be dismissed and the other must be allowed. The action in which the appeal is to be dismissed is an action which was brought to test the question whether or not a sheet of celluloid was liable to duty under section 3, subsection (1), of the Finance Act, 1925. The question really turned on the facts, and the learned Judge concludes his judgment on that point in this way: "I am not satisfied that the expressions 'raw film' or 'stock' have ever been applied in the trade to film which has not been at least cut into strips of standard width."

In an appeal from a Judge on a question of fact, this Court does not interfere except when it is satisfied that on the materials before the learned Judge it is quite plain that he has gone wrong. It is quite impossible in this case to come to any such conclusion. On the evidence before him the learned Judge was quite justified in refusing to be convinced.

I only want to make one further observation with reference to that action, because I am not sure that I agree with the construction which the learned Judge puts upon the subsection. It is quite true that the subsection, in dealing with taxable articles, refers to cinematograph films, but when it comes to indicate the duty which is payable in respect of such films, it divides them into three classes. There are the negatives which are films properly so called, and something which is exactly described by reference to the knowledge of the trade, the experience of the trade, and the expressions which are used in the trade in reference to this particular thing; and what the statute says is that in addition to negatives and positives the duty is imposed on a blank film "on which no picture has been impressed, known as raw film or stock." I think that if the evidence before the learned Judge had satisfied him that that term was applied in the trade generally to this particular article, he ought to have held that it was taxable, although it was not a cinematograph film. But the learned Judge seems to have taken the opposite view of the section, because he says: "The Act says 'cinematograph films,' not 'film,' and though it is true that one subdivision of cinematograph films is described as blank film, I think that any inconsistency which there may be between these two parts of subsection (1) must be reconciled by limiting the meaning of 'blank film' to such blank film as falls within the class of cinematograph films and not by enlarging what is, in my opinion, the true meaning of 'cinematograph films' so as to include anything which might not improperly be described as 'blank films.'" I do not think that the question is material for decision in this particular case because of the view taken by the learned Judge on the evidence, but as the learned Judge has so expressed himself in reference to the section, I feel bound to express what my view would be if the case ever came up again for decision, which I do not suppose is likely on this particular point.

Then with regard to the other action which was one to test the liability for duty of what are called the baby films, the question again had reference to the construction of this subsection, and the meaning of that part of the subsection which indicated what the duty was to be, and it imposed a duty upon these three classes of films "Per linear foot of the standard width of 1⅜ inches." If the matter stood there, it seems to me so extremely improbable that the Legislature, in imposing a duty on this class of articles, would have left it open to the ingenious manufacturer to evade the duty by one-hundredth part of an inch in the width of his manufacture, that one would have attempted, apart from anything else, to read or construe this language as "Per linear foot of the standard width of 1⅜ inches or in the same proportion to any greater or less quantity." But any doubt on the matter seems to me to be completely set at rest by section 17 of the Act of 1876, because that is a section of general application to all future taxing statutes, and it provides that where, among other things, duties are imposed or allowed according to any specified quantity, they shall be deemed to apply in the same proportion to any greater or less quantity. And turning back to the subsection again it seems to me impossible to say that the duty here is not imposed according to a specified quantity when you find that the duty is "Per linear foot of the standard width of 1⅜ inches." For these reasons this appeal ought to be allowed.

Lord Justice Scrutton said: I agree with the result at which my Brothers have arrived.

The appeal in Harris's case was accordingly allowed, and that in Mansbridge's case dismissed.

Court of Appeal. (Lord Hewart, C.J., and Bankes, L.J.) 1927. Jan. 25.

EX PARTE BREWSTER.*

Local Government—Poor law guardian—Alleged disqualification—Patient in hospital maintained out of rates—Payment for cost of treatment—Local Government Act, 1894 (56 and 57 Vict., c. 73), s. 46 (1) (b), (7).

Decision of the Divisional Court (43 The Times L.R., 224) affirmed.

This was an appeal by the applicant, Mr. Harry George Brewster, of The Broadway, Bexley Heath, a local government elector in the Bexley Urban District and the Dartford Union, from an order of the Divisional Court (Mr. Justice Salter and Mr. Justice Talbot) (43 The Times L.R., 224) refusing an application for an order directing the Dartford Guardians to show cause why a rule nisi for a writ of mandamus should not issue commanding them to declare vacant under section 46, subsection 1 (b) and subsection 7, of the Local Government Act, 1894, the office of guardian held by Mrs. Ellen Moira Pyne, of Erith, on the ground that, since her election as guardian, she had received "union or parochial relief."

While she was a guardian, Mrs. Pyne was a private patient in the King Edward-avenue Hospital, Dartford, which was maintained by the guardians out of the rates. She had paid the whole cost of her conveyance to and maintenance at the hospital.

The Divisional Court refused to make the order applied for on the ground that, as the guardians had been paid in full for every privilege and advantage received by Mrs. Pyne at the hospital, there was no evidence on which it could be said that she had received "union or parochial relief" within the meaning of the Local Government Act, 1894.

The applicant appealed.

Mr. R. C. Maxwell, for the appellant, said that an important question of principle was involved. He submitted that when a guardian became a patient in the guardians' hospital the guardian was thereby disqualified and the seat became vacant. The facts in this case were agreed and the proceedings were entirely friendly. The fact that the cost of Mrs. Pyne's relief had been repaid did not prevent disqualification. Counsel referred to Chard v. Bush (39 The Times L.R., 693; [1923] 2 K.B., 849).

The Lord Chief Justice, in giving judgment, said:—In my opinion there is no ground for interfering with the order of the Divisional Court. The judgment of the Divisional Court is right, for the reasons given.

Lord Justice Bankes said:—I agree. The grant of the writ is discretionary, and it seems to me that the Judges of the Divisional Court exercised a proper discretion.

REX v. EDITOR OF THE "DAILY MIRROR" AND OTHERS—EX PARTE SMITH.

REX v. EDITOR OF THE "DAILY MAIL" AND OTHERS—EX PARTE SMITH.*

Contempt of Court—Publication of photograph of accused person—Possible question of identity.

Observations on the duty of persons responsible for the production of newspapers to exercise care as to the publication of a photograph of an accused person in cases where it should be reasonably clear to them that a question of identity may arise.

These were rules nisi for attachment for contempt of Court against Mr. Alexander Campbell, the editor, and Daily Mirror Newspapers, Limited, the proprietors of the Daily Mirror; and Mr. Walter George Fish, the editor, and Associated Newspapers, Limited, the proprietors of the Daily Mail.

The alleged contempt was in each case the publication of a photograph of Edgar William Smith, on the morning of the identification parade at which Smith, who was being charged with the attempted murder of Police-constable Dainty, was put up for identification.

Sir Patrick Hastings, K.C., and Mr. J. B. Melville showed cause for the Daily Mirror; Sir John Simon, K.C., and Mr. Giveen for the Daily Mail; Mr. A. M. Lyons supported the rules.

Sir Patrick Hastings said that the matter was regarded as of the gravest importance by his clients. During the existence of the Daily Mirror—more than a quarter of a century—it had never been suggested that they had been guilty of contempt of Court. But it had been their continuous practice to publish photographs of persons for whom warrants were issued, and in some cases at the request of the police.

The alleged attempt to murder Dainty took place on January 7. On the same day very detailed descriptions of the alleged assailant were circulated, and on January 9 Smith was arrested. On January 10 he was brought before the magistrates and charged with attempted murder only, though a hint was given that there might be further charges. On January 13 there was an identification parade. None of the persons asked to attend identified Smith except Dainty and a man named Browning, who identified him as a person whom he had helped with a motor-car on January 7. On that day, January 13, a photograph of Smith appeared in certain editions of the Daily Mirror and the Daily Mail. Each person before the identification parade was asked what newspapers they had seen, and in particular whether they had seen the Daily Mirror or Daily Mail. None had seen the Daily Mirror. Browning said that he had at home a copy of the Daily Mail, but had not had time to look at it; it was found that that copy was of an edition which had not the photograph.

On January 26 and 27 Smith was again before the magistrates and was committed for trial on the charge of attempted murder. Mr. Lyons then admitted that there was no question of identity, but outlined another line of defence. A charge was also preferred of assaulting Miss Farmer, but she was unable to recognize Smith as her assailant. There was no other identification and that charge was dismissed.

The Lord Chief Justice.—But could any intelligent person employed in a newspaper office have any doubt that a question of identity might arise? This newspaper for commercial purposes published a photograph so that anyone on payment of a penny could look at it. It goes much further than a mere description in words.

Sir Patrick Hastings.—It never entered the head of anyone that it could be contempt of Court.

The Lord Chief Justice.—The question is whether it ought to have done so.

Mr. Justice Avory.—We frequently have cases in which the evidence of identification is unsatisfactory because people were shown a photograph before the identification.

Sir Patrick Hastings.—It came as a complete surprise that it should be suggested that this could be contempt. From no quarter, judicial or executive, had any warning come to my clients that there was any objection to this practice which had been followed for a long period.

The Lord Chief Justice.—Your words suggest that the journalist sitting in his office thinking what best he can do for the public good is guided by the tradition of centuries of blameless predecessors. What is said against you is that, in pursuit of profit, you took the risk, involving the accused person in a far greater risk—not in pursuit of any public purpose, but in pursuit of money.

Sir Patrick Hastings submitted that there was no contempt, and was about to resume his seat when

The Lord Chief Justice said:—I have observed, and I am entitled to assume that it is deliberate, that throughout your argument there has been not a syllable by way of regret.

Sir Patrick Hastings said that his instructions were to fight this upon the basis that his clients had done no wrong. If, in spite of that, the Court should be of opinion that they had or could have committed a contempt the regret which he expressed—and which he was sure that Mr. Campbell, who was ill with influenza, would desire him to express—was complete and unqualified.

Sir John Simon associated himself, on behalf of the editor and proprietors of the Daily Mail, both with the argument and with the expression of regret offered by Sir Patrick Hastings. A wide proposition and a narrower one were involved. He would submit that the King's Bench would not be likely to lay down the proposition that the publication of a photograph of a defendant was contempt of Court merely because the initial stages of proceedings, civil or criminal, had begun. That would be far too wide; for there must be many cases of purely neutral aspect, and some in which publication was actually beneficial. But excluding that wide proposition, where the question of identity must arise there could be no contempt in respect of a charge which might be preferred in the future. At the date of publication of the photograph the only charge was that of attempted murder, in respect of which the question of identity did not arise. Even if a newspaper, hearing that the police wished to prefer a further charge, deliberately published a photograph which might prejudice the charge, it would be not contempt of Court but possibly an indictable conspiracy.

Mr. Lyons submitted that the contempt was a serious one. In consequence of an alleged assault on a young woman on the main road from Lincoln to

* Reported by J. W. Hall, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Nottingham Police-constable Dainty had an encounter with a man. Smith was arrested and brought before the justices at a hearing from which the public were excluded, but the Press were present. He was then charged with attempted murder, and it was stated that there would be other charges. His (counsel's) submission was that in the circumstances of this case it must have been obvious that if and when other charges were made there must be a charge in respect of the assault on Miss Farmer.

It was not part of his case that anyone who went to the identification parade was in fact misled, but that there might have been a calamity. Just as the solicitor bought one of those newspapers, so might Miss Farmer, or one of the witnesses, and have had the photograph in her mind for half an hour or more before Smith was put up for identification. For the fact that no one saw the photograph the newspapers should not get credit.

Police officers were not allowed to show photographs of an accused person to witnesses before the identification parade (Rex v. Goss, 17 C.A.R., 196 ; Rex v. Dwyer and Ferguson, 41 The Times L.R., 186 ; [1925] 2 K.B., 799 ; Rex v. Haslam, 19 C.A.R., 59). Newspapers doing something for the purpose of profit and sensationalism could have no better right than the police.

There were, in fact, two parades : one at the hospital for identification by Dainty, and another later with respect to the charge of Miss Farmer. In that case identity was the sole and crucial feature ; it was quite true that a fortnight later he had said that identity was not in issue in Dainty's case, but the newspapers were wrong to anticipate what might be the defendant's considered position a fortnight later. As to Sir John Simon's contention, that contempt of Court could not be committed where no charge had been preferred, the accused person could be indicted for anything which might be disclosed by the depositions. The attitude of the Court was shown in Rex v. Editor and Printers and Publishers of the Evening Standard (40 The Times L.R., 833). He submitted that Smith had been put to an additional, illegal, and unfair risk.

The Lord Chief Justice, in giving judgment, said that the phrase "contempt of Court," as had been observed more than once, was, in relation to the kind of subject with which they were now concerned, a little misleading. The mischief consisted not in some attitude or supposed attitude to the Court itself, but in the prejudice to an accused person. It was not something which affected the status of the Court itself, but something which might profoundly affect the rights of citizens.

What was now complained of was that when a man named Smith had been arrested on a charge of attempted murder and brought before the magistrates, and before those proceedings had been completed, those two newspapers, the Daily Mirror and the Daily Mail, on January 13, printed photographs of the accused person. The wording accompanying the photographs was somewhat different, but it was not suggested that the information in the Daily Mail office was different from that in the office of the Daily Mirror.

The principles on which the Court acted in such cases had been stated on several occasions. In particular, in Reg. v. Payne and Cooper (12 The Times L.R., 321 ; [1896] 1 Q.B., 577) Lord Russell of Killowen said, at p. 580 :—

"The applicant must show that something has been published which either is clearly intended, or at least is calculated, to prejudice a trial which is pending."

In the same case Mr. Justice Wright said, at p. 581 :—

"In order to justify an application to the Court the publication complained of must be calculated really to interfere with a fair trial."

In the present case it was not alleged that there was on the part of anyone concerned an intention to prejudice the fair trial of Smith ; what was said was that the publication of those photographs was calculated to prejudice the fair trial of Smith.

In recent years the Court of Criminal Appeal had had, on more than one occasion, to consider the use of photographs of accused persons by the police. In 1923, in Rex v. Goss (17 C.A.R., 196), it was stated :—

"No doubt there are circumstances in which the police of necessity make use of photographs, but to make use of photographs beforehand to see whether important witnesses can identify an accused person whom they are afterwards going to see is to pursue a course which is not a proper one."

In the following year, 1924, the matter was further considered in Rex v. Dwyer and Ferguson (41 The Times L.R., 186 ; [1925] 2 K.B., 799, at p. 802) :—

"It is one thing for a police officer, who is in doubt upon the question who shall be arrested, to show a photograph to persons in order to obtain information or a clue upon that question ; it is another thing for a police officer to show beforehand to persons who are afterwards to be called as identifying witnesses photographs of those persons whom they are about to be asked to identify. It would be most improper to inform a witness beforehand, who was to be called as an identifying witness, by the process of making the features of the accused person familiar to him through a photograph."

The question was again considered in 1925 in Rex v. Haslam (19 C.A.R., 59, at p. 60) :—

"Two matters emerge clearly in this appeal. First, witnesses who were called on to pick out the appellant at an identification parade as being the wrongdoer had previously been shown a photograph of him. It is not suggested that the photographs were shown to the witnesses that the police might obtain a clue to the direction in which inquiries might usefully be made or to the person whom it would be proper to arrest. The appellant had already been arrested, and the effect of what was done was to give the witnesses—or certainly three of them—an opportunity of studying a photograph of the appellant before they were called on to identify him. That course is indefensible. It cannot be right that when a witness, or a possible witness, is being called on merely to identify a person who is already arrested, that witness, before the identification, should be shown a photograph of the accused person. One can see that sometimes it will happen that when a person has been shown a photograph to assist in the arrest of a wrongdoer not yet arrested he may later give evidence of identification. That is a different thing from what happened here. In that case the person is asked to identify the accused person, notwithstanding the fact that he has previously seen a photograph. A person who has seen a photograph of the accused person may identify him simply because he has seen a photograph of him."

The kind of mischief which the publication of the photograph of an accused person might bring about was indicated in those passages. No one would excuse a police officer if, bringing together all the persons among whom witnesses of identity might be found, he said : "I have arrested a man and am going to put him up for identification by you," and then showed them a photograph of the man whom they were going to be asked to identify, because, for one reason among others, the witnesses would approach the important, and it might be crucial, task of identification with the knowledge that that particular man had been arrested.

The fact that a photograph was published in a money-making business did not excuse a newspaper for doing that which would be reprehensible in a police officer. In his opinion, in the publication of photographs no less than in the publication of news matter, it was the duty of a newspaper to take care lest prejudice should be caused to a man about to stand his trial. An attitude of cynical indifference was manifestly wrong.

By that he did not mean to lay down that a newspaper might never publish a photograph of a person who was a party to a civil or criminal proceeding; no one would dream of laying down so wide a proposition. But he did say that there was a duty to exercise care in the publication of the photograph of an accused person. If a newspaper published a photograph in such circumstances it ran a grave risk—a risk which in one sense affected the accused person, and in another sense affected those responsible for the newspaper.

In the present case the attempt to murder took place on January 7. Smith was arrested on January 9, and brought before the magistrates on January 10. It was not till January 13 that the identification parade was held, and it was while that identification parade was still pending and before it had taken place, that those photographs appeared. Was it, or was it not, reasonably clear that a question of identity might arise? He thought that it was clear. It certainly was not clear that a question of identity would not arise, and what the newspapers did was to take the risk.

It was quite true that when the identity parade took place only one person identified Smith; and it was quite true that later, on January 27, when Smith was committed for trial, his counsel said that the question of identity no longer arose; but that could not have been foreseen by those who published those photographs on January 13. They ought to have seen that the question of identity might arise, and he thought that they had published matter which was not intended, but was calculated, to prejudice the fair trial of Smith.

The question did not arise whether there could be contempt in a case where proceedings were said to be imminent, because in this case proceedings had begun. The other question might one day have to be decided, but for the present it was only necessary to refer to a passage in Rex v. Parke (19 The Times L.R., 627; [1903] 2 K.B., 432, at p. 437), where Mr. Justice Wills said:—

"Great stress has been laid by Mr. Danckwerts upon an expression which has been used in the judgments upon questions of this kind—that the remedy exists when there is a cause pending in the Court. We think undue importance has been attached to it. It is true that in very nearly all the cases which have arisen there has been a cause actually begun, so that the expression, quite natural under the circumstances, accentuates the fact, not that the case has been begun, but that it is not at an end. That is the cardinal consideration. It is possible very effectually to poison the fountain of justice before it begins to flow. It is not possible to do so when the stream has ceased."

But that further and larger question did not arise. There was in this case a duty to take care, with reference to a case which had arisen, and to an accused person who was then under arrest. That duty was, perhaps, made even more manifest by the statement made in open Court and reproduced in the Press that there might be further charges.

In those circumstances he was of opinion that these rules ought to be made absolute, but as it was the first time that proceedings had been taken in respect of the publication of a photograph he thought that it was not necessary to impose any penalty. Very different considerations would apply if and when a similar case arose again. But in this case the rules would be made absolute, and would lie in the office subject to further order. The respondents must pay the whole costs of the proceedings.

MR. JUSTICE AVORY concurred.

MR. JUSTICE TALBOT said that he had entertained grave doubt whether material existed for the exercise of their jurisdiction, but as they were not deciding the wider question of contempt in respect of pending proceedings, he did not dissent.

1927. Feb. 2.

IN RE MONK—GIFFEN v. WEDD.*

Will—Construction—Charity—Gift of residue—Probable surplus—General charitable intention—Whether an intestacy as to surplus not immediately required.

A testator, who died in 1916, by his will made in 1913 left the residue of his personal estate on certain trusts for the benefit of the inhabitants of a small village, the trustees being directed to make loans without interest to the poor and deserving, no loan to exceed £100, no borrower to receive more than one loan, and the period for repayment not to exceed nine years. The testator directed that any surplus should be invested from time to time by the Charity Trustees. So far as could be foreseen there was bound to be a surplus as the number of possible borrowers was small and the residue was valued at about £20,000.

Held, that as there was a general intention on the part of the testator to devote the residue to charity, and as it was conceivable, though not probable, that all the loan fund might be required, there was no intestacy as to the surplus not immediately required for the purposes of the charity.

This was an appeal by the Attorney-General from a decision of Mr. Justice Tomlin, who had held that as the charitable intention of the testator was not sufficiently paramount and not likely to exhaust the residue of the estate, the next-of-kin were entitled to the surplus not immediately required for the purposes of the charity.

Robert Monk, the proprietor of the Robin Hood Hotel, Leicester, who died on August 5, 1916, gave, by his will dated June 10, 1913, a life interest in his estate to his widow and, subject thereto and to the payment of certain legacies, left the residue upon certain trusts for the benefit of the inhabitants of Foxton, a small village near Market Harborough, where he was born and where he desired to be buried. The population of Foxton was under 400, and the testator's estate, after payment thereout of the legacies payable on the death of his widow, who died in May, 1924, was of the value of about £20,000.

The testator by Clause 7 of his will directed his original trustees to pay and transfer his residuary estate to the Foxton Parish Council, or to the Official Trustees of Charitable Funds if there were no parish council. No parish council had ever been formed for Foxton, and the Official Trustees held the funds.

After having set apart £800, for the purpose of establishing a coal fund for the distribution of coal among the poor and deserving inhabitants of Foxton, the trustees were to hold the rest of the estate to an account to be entitled "The Robert Monk's Foxton Charity Loans Fund," and were to apply the capital and income of the fund in making loans to the poor and deserving inhabitants of Foxton as thereinafter provided. No loan was to exceed £100, only one-sixth part of the loan fund was to be lent in any one year, the borrowers were to be inhabitants or residents of Foxton not over 35 years of age, the period for repayment was not to exceed nine years, and no interest was to be charged, but no borrower could be granted more than one loan.

Mr. Justice Tomlin declared that the will did not contain any general charitable intention in respect of the surplus of the residuary estate, and held that there was an intestacy of the surplus not required for the payment of the legacies, the death duties, and the making of provision for the coal fund and the loan fund, and he directed certain inquiries.

The Attorney-General appealed.

The Attorney-General (Sir Douglas Hogg, K.C.) and Mr. Dighton Pollock appeared for the appellant; Mr. Rolt, K.C., Mr. C. E. Loseby, and Mr. J. P. Stimson for the trustees of the will; and Mr. Gavin Simonds, K.C., and Mr. C. A. J. Bonner for the next of kin.

The MASTER OF THE ROLLS, in his considered judgment, after stating the facts, said that it was plain that the limitations contained in the will narrowed the number of possible borrowers to a small one. The testator, however, contemplated that there might be a surplus, and directed it to be invested from time to time by the Charity Trustees. It was said that so far as could be anticipated there was no prospect that the qualified borrowers in Foxton would become so numerous as to exhaust the resources of the Charity Trustees; that there must be a surplus; and that, as there was no paramount general charitable intention as to the whole, there was an intestacy of the unrequired surplus.

The authority of the judgment of Mr. Justice Parker in In re Wilson ([1913] 1 Ch., 314) was invoked, where that Judge defined broadly two categories into which the decided cases might be divided: (1) Where the paramount intention, according to the true construction of the will, was to give the property in the first instance for a general charitable purpose rather than a particular purpose, in which case, even though the precise directions could not be carried out, the doctrine of cy-près would be applied; and (2) where on the construction of the will no such general paramount intention could be inferred, and, it being impossible to carry out the particular purpose, the whole gift failed. It was contended that the present case came within the second category. Mr. Justice Parker in In re Wilson (supra) held that the whole gift, which was to provide the salary of a schoolmaster, was in the testator's mind dependent upon its being feasible and possible to carry out the particular directions. Other illustrations of the second category were In re White's Trusts (2 The Times L.R., 830; 33 Ch.D., 449); In re Packe—Sanders v. Attorney-General ([1918] 1 Ch., 437); and In re Stanford—Cambridge University v. Attorney General and Others (40 The Times L.R., 3; [1924] 1 Ch., 73). In the last case a balance was left of a fund provided to finance the publication of a literary work. In those cases the legacy was clearly given in favour of a particular purpose, and, in the first three, conditions precedent had to be fulfilled before the purpose could be effective.

Other cases were cited by the Attorney-General, such as Incorporated Society v. Price (1 Jones and La T., 498); In re Davis ([1902] 1 Ch., 876); and Biscoe v. Jackson (3 The Times L.R., 577; 35 Ch.D., 460)—a case where a sum was given to establish a soup kitchen and cottage hospital in a parish where land for it could not be found. In those cases a paramount charitable intention was found to exist, even though the particular form expressed for it had ceased or was not practicable as intended.

Where the gift could be read as devoting the property to charity, adding a condition subsequent to the gift, if the performance of the condition became impossible, the gift became absolute. But if the condition was precedent to the gift and became impossible, the gift failed altogether.

If that principle was applied to the present case it would be seen that the loan fund was practicable at the present time, even if not in the full measure which the sum available made possible. See Attorney-General v. Bishop of Chester (1 Bro. C.C., 444), where a legacy towards establishing a Bishop in America was held not to be void though none had been appointed. Lord Macnaghten referred with approval to that case in Wallis v. Solicitor-General for New Zealand (19 The Times L.R., 230; [1903] A.C., 173, at pp. 183, 184) and to Chamberlayne v. Brockett (L.R., 8 Ch., 206).

The next of kin in this case could only base their claim upon a mistake of quantum as to the loan fund in the purpose of the testator, and that was held in Attorney-General v. Earl of Winchilsea (3 Bro. C.C., 374) not to be a sufficient ground for upsetting the testator's charitable intention.

Lord Alvanley, Master of the Rolls, at page 379 said:—

"Wherever the intention has been to dispose of the whole property to certain purposes, as in the early case of Thetford School (8 Co. Rep., 130b), . . . the whole has been applied, the intention has been considered as such, and it has been only inferred that the testator has been mistaken merely as to the quantum."

If there was a large increase in value of the sum bequeathed after the testator's death, it might prove necessary in some cases to invoke the cy-près doctrine, as in In re Avenon's Charity—Attorney-General v. Pelly ([1913] 2 Ch., 261). Where the charity could be started at once there was no reason to defeat the general intention of the testator because it was prophesied that in time the quantum of his gift would be found too large for its purpose.

Applying those principles to the present case, and remembering that the Court leaned in favour of charity, he (his Lordship) thought that there was a general intention on the part of the testator to devote this residue to charity. It was conceivable, if not probable, that all the loan fund might be required in the not remote future. The duly qualified borrowers might present themselves, just as the bishop did in the case already cited.

A further question arose, however, as to the validity of the direction for accumulating the surplus income. But when personal estate was given to charity it was taken entirely out of the scope of the law of remoteness. See Chamberlayne v. Brockett (supra). In his (his Lordship's) opinion there was an immediate and effective gift of the whole of the residue for charity, and the next of kin were displaced. The doctrine of cy-près could be at once applied, were it necessary to do so.

The appeal would be allowed, and the order of Mr. Justice Tomlin discharged. There would be liberty for the Attorney-General to apply for a scheme if and when so advised. The costs of all parties to the appeal as between solicitor and client would come out of the fund.

Lord Justice Sargant said that the first and most crucial point was whether the language of the testator's will indicated a general charitable intention coupled with specific directions as to the mode of carrying out that intention, or whether it merely indicated a specific and limited charitable intention. The indication of a general intention might arise from general prefatory words, as in Wallis v. Solicitor-General for New Zealand (19 The Times L.R., 230; [1903] A.C., 173), or in Chamberlayne v. Brockett (L.R., 8 Ch., 206, at p. 211), but such words were not necessary. In his (his Lordship's) judgment there were several definite indications of a general charitable intention. There was, after the death of the testator's wife and the payment of legacies, an abrupt termination of the duties of the original trustees, and there was a peremptory direction to transfer the residue to one or other of two sets of trustees, designated "Charity Trustees." The gift was immediate and absolute. In many analogous cases, where a share of a testator's estate had been given out and out and then settled on children upon trusts which did not exhaust the beneficial interest, it was definitely settled that there was no resulting trust for the next of kin. The principle was stated in Lassence v. Tierney (1 Mac. and G., 551), and had been restated in Hancock v. Watson ([1902] A.C., 14) and other cases. The reasoning in those cases was equally applicable to an original out and out gift to charitable trustees.

Next it was to be noted that the gift to the Charity Trustees was immediate and unconditional and their duties were to begin at once, and were such as would at once absorb part of the fund, and might in the view of the testator ultimately exhaust it. The case was one quite different from that of In re Wilson ([1913] 1 Ch., 314). If there should be any failure, it would be a partial failure by matter subsequent, not a total failure, through failure of a condition subsequent. Further, there was an even more cogent indication in the provisions for the investment and accumulation of so much of the fund as might not from time to time be required. Reference had been made to the restrictions on accumulation imposed by the Thellusson Acts, but it was elementary that those restrictions were immaterial for the purpose of construing a will or other document. Here it was the construction of the will only that was in question, and for that purpose a direction for indefinite accumulation seemed to be of the greatest weight, and completely negatived the suggestion that the gift to charity was not intended to be exhaustive. It was well settled that the question of general charitable intention was one depending on the construction of the particular will or other instrument, having regard to the principles laid down in the long line of cases on the subject. He (his Lordship) therefore thought the appeal should be allowed. But even if no general charitable intention was shown, there was still, in his opinion, an effective trust for the accumulation and investment of the fund so far as not employed for 21 years from the testator's death, i.e., until August 5, 1937, so that even on that construction an immediate inquiry such as had been directed was premature.

Lord Justice Lawrence said that it was plain that the trusts declared by the testator concerning the Loan Fund were intended to continue for ever, and the persons who might benefit under them were limited only by the housing capacity of the parish of Foxton. The next of kin had asserted that the residue was larger than was reasonably required for the purposes of the trust, and that the portion not so required ought to be paid over to them. In his (his Lordship's) opinion the order of the learned Judge was wrong. It was not for the next of kin or even the Court to determine how much of the testator's estate ought to be devoted to the trust. That was a matter for the testator himself. Who could say that the fund was too large to meet all the claims which might in the future be made upon it? What was the reasonable time within which (according to the inquiry directed) the Court ought to find that the whole of the fund would not be required? Those were questions which in his (his Lordship's) opinion the Court ought not to embark upon. Nobody could foresee what the population of the parish might be in time to come. It was conceivable (though not probable) that the Loan Fund (which was to be publicly advertised) might attract persons to the parish. To constitute a partial failure of a charitable trust such as the present one, the next of kin would have to prove that it was impossible that the whole sum could ever be required for the purposes of the trust—a fact which was incapable of proof.

His Lordship then dealt with the effect of clause 23 of the will, directing the accumulation of the surplus income, and rejected the contention of the Attorney-General that there was no direction to accumulate within the meaning of section 164 of the Law of Property Act, 1925, because at any time the investments might be sold and applied for the benefit of the trust. The destination of the surplus income after the period allowed by law for accumulation of income depended upon whether there was to be found in the will a general intention to devote the residue to charity, and it was not disputed that, if there was, any such surplus income would be applicable cy-près, and would not pass to the next of kin. He agreed with Mr. Justice Tomlin that the point whether a general charitable intention could be gathered from the testator's will was a difficult one, on which he confessed it was not easy to make up his mind. On the whole he had come to the conclusion that the testator had sufficiently indicated his intention to dedicate the whole of the ultimate residue of his estate to charitable purposes, namely the relief of the deserving poor of the parish of Foxton. It was important to bear in mind the testator's direction to his original trustees to transfer the residue either to the parish council of Foxton or to the Official Trustees of Charitable Funds.

For those and other reasons given by the Master of the Rolls and Lord Justice Sargant he (his Lordship) was of opinion that the testator, in spite of the particularity of his directions for application, had shown an overriding intention to devote the whole of his residue to charity. He concurred in the form of order proposed by the Master of the Rolls.

EAGLE, STAR AND BRITISH DOMINIONS INSURANCE COMPANY, LIMITED v. REINER.*

Insurance (Marine)—Reinsurance—Slip—Construction—"On a voyage."

The plaintiffs, as original insurers, insured a consignment of oranges from any port in Spain to Antwerp, and, after the ship had left Valencia and had been in wireless communication with Gibraltar, they reinsured with the defendant by a slip, which referred to the fact that the ship had been in such communication with Gibraltar and which contained the words "on a voyage," meaning, according to the evidence, that the risk should attach only from a named port in the course of the voyage. The ship stranded before she reached Gibraltar, the oranges were damaged, and the plaintiffs had to pay on the policy. In an action on the contract of reinsurance,

Held, that on the true reading of the slip the intention was to limit the risk to the voyage from Gibraltar, and the action failed.

This was an action in which the plaintiffs claimed £24 18s. 2d. from the defendant on a policy of reinsurance.

Mr. Le Quesne, K.C., and Mr. Simey appeared for the plaintiffs ; and Mr. Porter, K.C., and Mr. Somervell for the defendant.

The plaintiffs, as original insurers, insured a consignment of oranges from any port in Spain to Antwerp, and they reinsured the risk with the defendant and other underwriters. The oranges were loaded at Valencia for the voyage. In the course of the voyage the ship stranded at Gandia, and many cases of the oranges were damaged by sea water. The plaintiffs had to pay on the original policy, and they now claimed from the defendant his proportionate liability under the policy of reinsurance.

The defendant pleaded that the agreement which he made with the plaintiffs was one to reinsure the oranges "on the s.s. Sicilier at and from and off Gibraltar on a voyage to Antwerp."

The slip was in that form, but the policy when drawn up purported to insure from Spain to Antwerp, and, in that form, was signed by Lloyd's Signing Bureau on the defendant's behalf. The stranding took place before the steamer reached Gibraltar, and the defendant said that his risk was only to begin at and from Gibraltar and that he was, therefore, not liable. He counterclaimed to have the policy rectified to express the real intention of the parties that the risk should only begin at Gibraltar.

* Reported by W. B. Thompson, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The material part of the slip was as follows :—

S. Valencia 23/12 W.T.
{ Gib. 27/12 apl } on a voyage from Spain Antwerp

Meaning : "Sailed Valencia Dec. 23, wireless telegram. Gibraltar Dec. 27 as per list." As originally drawn the words "on a voyage from," and the brackets, were not in the slip, but the defendant wrote them in and contended that they expressed the real intention of the parties.

Mr. Le Quesne, for the plaintiffs, submitted that the claim on the policy must succeed. The defendant said that the policy did not represent the true intention of the parties, and he claimed that it should be rectified to bring it into accord with what had been orally agreed. The only case in which rectification of a policy was permissible was that in which the policy had to be brought into conformity with the slip. Section 22 of the Marine Insurance Act, 1906, required that a contract of marine insurance must be embodied in a policy. That document must be in a particular form and must be properly stamped. If evidence of an oral agreement was admitted the effect would be to allow a contract to be enforced which had not been embodied in a policy.

Mr. Porter contended that as the policy in its present form did not carry out the real intention of the parties it ought to be rectified like any other document.

Mr. Justice Salter, in giving judgment, said that the action, which was one on a marine policy, raised a question of some importance with regard to words which were in customary use in cases of marine insurance where it was desired to take a risk on cargo which was at sea in the course of a voyage, and to limit that risk to begin from some particular point in the voyage. There was no question that on the policy as it stood the defendant would be liable. But the defendant said that the policy was in its present form by reason of a mistake common to both parties and did not represent the contract which was in fact made.

The true contract was alleged to be contained in the slip when properly construed, and he was asked to rectify the policy to bring it into accordance with the slip. It was not a case in which it was necessary to ask for rectification of both policy and slip to make both accord with some outside agreement, though Spalding v. Crocker (13 The Times L.R., 396 ; 2 Com. Cas., 189) seemed to show that the Court could do even that where there had been a common mistake. The question, therefore, was what was the true construction of the slip.

The plaintiffs instructed their agent to reinsure the risk for the whole voyage. A slip was accordingly prepared for insurance "Spain-Antwerp." The agent took the slip into the market, and observing that the steamer appeared in Lloyd's list as being reported from Gibraltar on December 27, he wrote on the slip, "Gibraltar 27/12 a p l." He then presented the slip to the defendant. At that time the information on it was that the steamer had left Valencia on December 23 ; had been in wireless communication with Gibraltar on December 27 as per list ; and was on a voyage from Spain to Antwerp.

The defendant refused to take up the insurance because he was not satisfied with the rate offered, and also because he desired the risk to attach only from Gibraltar. He said he would take it up if he might write the words "on a voyage from" in the slip. The point was one of substance, because there was a danger of stranding in Spanish ports, and both parties understood what was meant. The plaintiff's agent finally agreed to the insertion in the slip of the words "on a voyage from."

The evidence showed that by a well-established usage of the marine insurance market the words "on a voyage" were used where it was desired that the risk should only attach from a named port in the course of a voyage. In its full form the expression would be "at off or from A. on a voyage from X. to Y." The essential words were "on a voyage," and where they appeared on a slip they showed that the intention was that the risk should only begin from a particular point.

His LORDSHIP, in construing the slip in this case, said that he attached the greatest importance to the position of the brackets, which included the words "on a voyage" but excluded the word "from." He thought that the true reading of the slip was, "Gibraltar, on a voyage," and the intention was to limit the risk to the voyage from Gibraltar.

By the insertion of the words "on a voyage from" the slip was modified from its original form and became an entirely different document. The provisions of the slip were then by mistake put into the policy without the modification, and he was satisfied that, owing to the common mistake, the policy was not in accordance with the true contract, which was that appearing on the slip. Both parties intended that the risk should attach only from Gibraltar, and the policy must be rectified accordingly. There must, therefore, be judgment for the defendant, both on the claim and on the counter-claim.

SILVERMAN v. IMPERIAL LONDON HOTELS, LIMITED.*

Contract — Turkish baths — Obligations of proprietor.

The keeper of Turkish baths, who allows persons to use them in return for payment, impliedly warrants that the couches are reasonably fit for reclining on, and he owes a duty to those persons to take reasonable care that no dangerous insects infest his premises.

This was an action by Mr. M. L. Silverman, manufacturer's agent, of Forest Gate, against the Imperial London Hotels, Limited, for damages for personal injuries. He alleged that he had been bitten by an insect while using the defendants' Turkish baths at Russell-square on August 25, 1925.

Mr. B. B. Stenham appeared for the plaintiff; Mr. E. F. Lever and Mr. F. Peregrine for the defendants.

The evidence for the plaintiff was that he and his brother, after spending a night in the baths, suffered from irritation and lumps, which they attributed to insect bites. A witness named Praegar stated that he was bitten by an insect on the night following the night of the plaintiff's visit. He brought an action for damages against the present defendants. The late Judge Parfitt decided that Praegar was bitten while he was on the couch, but gave judgment for the defendants on the ground that reasonable care had been taken.

Mr. LEVER submitted that there was no case, contending that the onus of proving absence of reasonable care was upon the plaintiff. He relied upon Maclenan v. Segar (33 The Times L.R., 351; [1917] 2 K.B., 325).

His LORDSHIP said that the defence must show that the insects were there in spite of precautions taken as distinct from lack of precautions.

Mr. Townsend, now assistant secretary, and previously manager, of the baths, said that since the complaints of the plaintiff the wooden couches had been replaced by iron bedsteads. At the time of the plaintiff's visit the baths were infested by mosquitoes; he saw two or three dozen.

The plaintiff's doctor was recalled. He stated that the bites had not been caused by mosquitoes, and Mr. PEREGRINE admitted that it was no part of the defence that the bites were by mosquitoes.

Attendants at the baths stated they had never seen any verminous insects, but had seen mosquitoes. The baths were used by 71 men on the day in question, and there were no other complaints.

Dr. Gardiner, who examined the plaintiff in February and March, 1926, said that the most probable cause of the bites described by the plaintiff was a verminous insect rather than a mosquito. In his opinion the cleansing precautions were quite inadequate.

Mr. Knott, secretary and assistant manager, said that there had been complaints of bites by mosquitoes.

In cross-examination he denied that a Captain Percy brought him specimens of verminous insects stated to have been found in the baths.

Three men who heard of the case in the morning came forward in the afternoon as witnesses. Captain Harry Percy, veterinary surgeon, stated that on one occasion he found three verminous insects on a couch. He drowned them in his cup of tea and afterwards mounted them on cardboard. Later he produced them to Mr. Townsend. When he complained he was given a free ticket.

Mr. C. Solomon said that he captured one of the insects on the bed and carried it to an attendant, who said that it was a young cockroach.

Mr. LEVER contended that the plaintiff had on the day and night in question visited a number of places where the possibilities of collecting certain insects were considerable. The baths, which the plaintiff's witnesses had used many times without any complaint, were entitled to be placed among the finest baths in this or any other country. Certainly no expense had been spared to make them all that could be desired. In the period covered by the plaintiff's witnesses the baths had been used by some 200,000 people. From that huge number it had been possible to bring only some half a dozen persons with complaints to support an allegation of negligence, and one of those witnesses had been a client for five years. Since the complaint made in this case the wooden couches had been replaced by iron bedsteads, but an improvement of appurtenances after a complaint ought not to be regarded as evidence of prior negligence (Hart v. Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company, Limited, 21 L.T., 261). There was here special reason for receiving the plaintiff's evidence with care, because he was claiming £10 per week for loss of income, and had admitted that he did not pay income-tax.

* Reported by G. G. BEAGLEY and J. W. HALL, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

MR. JUSTICE SWIFT delivered the following considered judgment :—

In the month of August, 1925, Mr. Maurice Silverman, who is a manufacturer's agent, was staying with his brother Mark Silverman at a furnished house hired by them jointly for the occupation of their families for a summer holiday at Margate. On the 25th of that month the two brothers both had occasion to visit London and to stay the night there. They left Margate some time in the morning, they arrived in London about midday, they then separated and went about their several businesses, meeting again in order that they might dine together in the evening. They dined at a restaurant in the West End and then proceeded to witness a boxing competition at the Ring, Blackfriars, and about 10.30 in the evening they went to the Imperial Turkish Baths, situate in Russell-square, for the purpose of having a Turkish bath, and afterwards staying there until the following morning. From the evidence before me it appeared that the Imperial Turkish Baths, belonging to the Imperial London Hotels, Limited, were established in 1913 and were constructed on the most scientific, hygienic and up-to-date principles, and it is claimed by their proprietors that they "are without doubt the finest in the world." Apart from the matters which form the subject-matter of complaint in this action, the evidence was unanimous that the defendants' baths were extremely well managed and in every way well appointed and up-to-date. When a customer visits the building for the purpose of a Turkish bath it appears that he is shown into a large hall partitioned off into cubicles containing beds or couches with cupboards for the reception of clothing; and in those cubicles the customer undresses, and, wrapping himself in towels provided by the bath attendants, he then walks into the room or series of rooms comprising the Turkish baths, and afterwards, returning to his cubicle, reclines on the bed or couch wrapped up in a sheet until he has sufficiently rested and cooled to be able again to go out into the open air. It appears that customers of the baths who go there late in the evening are allowed to remain in the cubicle until early the next morning. For the use of the cubicle by them before and after the bath and the bath and attendance the customer is charged an inclusive sum of 5s. On the morning of August 26, when they left the Turkish baths, both Mr. Maurice Silverman and his brother found themselves to be suffering from an irritation of the skin which was afterwards diagnosed to be occasioned by the bites of bugs. In consequence of that irritation the plaintiff, Mr. Maurice Silverman, suffered considerable pain and inconvenience. He was for a time incapacitated from following his business and he incurred some medical expenses. He brings this action alleging that he sustained personal injuries with consequent damage to himself from bug bites received by him whilst on the defendants' premises, and he alleges that the defendants are liable to compensate him for the damage which he has suffered because they have either broken their contract with him or they have been guilty of negligence which has resulted in the injuries which he alleges he sustained. I am quite satisfied that on August 26 the plaintiff was suffering from the effects of recently inflicted bug bites, and I am quite satisfied that the effect of those bites was to cause him the pain and suffering and the monetary loss which I hereafter deal with. The questions which I have to decide are whether those bug bites were sustained by the plaintiff in the defendants' Turkish baths, as he alleges, and, if so, whether the defendants are in such a way responsible for them as to be liable in law to compensate the plaintiff for the injury which he sustained.

The evidence is that when the plaintiff and his brother went to the baths about 10.30 on the night of August 25 there was no mark or sign of any sort on their bodies indicating the bite of any insect. They were stripped and in that condition saw each other, and they were also under the observation of the bath attendant, who waited upon them whilst they were in the baths. They have both sworn that neither had any mark upon him and they felt no irritation, and I am quite satisfied and find as a fact that when they went to the baths they had not been bitten. I am equally satisfied that when they left the baths in the morning both of them had been bitten and bitten very extensively. I do not think that either of them at first realized the extent of his own or his brother's injuries. The plaintiff says that from the time when he woke up he felt considerable irritation, but he did not think anything of it, and his brother had not begun to appreciate that he had been bitten until later on in the day, but I am quite satisfied that they had both been bitten when they left the baths in the early morning of August 26. It follows, therefore, that in my view the plaintiff and his brother were bitten by bugs whilst on the defendants' premises during the night of August 25 and 26, 1925.

This, of course, does not dispose of the case. In the first place it was contended by the defendants that even assuming that the plaintiff was bitten on their premises it did not follow that he was bitten by a bug or bugs which were on those premises before he went there. It was contended that coming from a furnished house in Margate in a third-class railway carriage, spending the afternoon and evening in London, dining in a crowded restaurant and afterwards visiting a boxing competition he might easily have picked up and carried with him to the Turkish baths the insect or insects which subsequently caused his injury. I think this contention would have been of great weight had the plaintiff alone been bitten whilst on the defendants' premises. But there was the clearest evidence before me that not only was the plaintiff bitten on the night of August 25, but that his brother also was bitten, and that two other persons, quite independently of and quite unknown to the plaintiff, had been bitten in the same way in the defendants' hall on the previous night. There was also evidence before me, quite apart from the allegation of the plaintiff, that there have been complaints made to the defendants' servants of persons having been bitten upon previous occasions, and there was evidence that bugs had been seen by at least two people in the defendants' premises on occasions other than that upon which the plaintiff visited them. In these circumstances I am satisfied, and I find as a fact, that the injuries which the plaintiff sustained were occasioned by bug bites inflicted upon him by bugs which were in the defendants' premises on the night of August 25 and that the plaintiff was in no way instrumental in taking these bugs there or responsible for their being there. It was then contended by counsel for the defendants that they had not been shown to be in any way responsible to the plaintiff for the injuries which he had sustained, because there was no implied warranty in the contract which they had entered into with him that he should not be bitten, and there was no negligence on their part which resulted in the plaintiff's injuries, inasmuch as they had taken all reasonable steps to see that their premises were free from bugs. In my opinion by the contract made between the plaintiff and the defendants the latter impliedly warranted that their premises were reasonably fit for use as Turkish baths in the way in which such baths are ordinarily used, and amongst other things that the beds or couches in the cubicles were reasonably fit for reclining or sleeping on after the bath had been taken. I am also of opinion that the defendants owed a duty to the plaintiff to take reasonable care that no bugs or other dangerous insects should infest their premises. The contract made between the plaintiff and the defendants was that for the sum of 5s. the defendants should, inter alia, provide the plaintiff with a place in which he could spend the night. It seems to me that such a contract implies a term that the place provided shall be reasonably fit for that purpose. I accept the definition of an implied contract laid down by Lord Justice Bowen in the case of The Moorcock (5 The Times L.R., 316 ; 14 P.D., 64, at p. 68) cited to me by Mr. Lever on behalf of the defendants : "Now an implied warranty, or, as it is called, a covenant in law, as distinguished from an express contract or express warranty, really is in all cases founded on the presumed intention of the parties, and upon reason. The implication which the law draws from what must obviously have been the intention of the parties, the law draws with the object of giving efficacy to the transaction and preventing such a failure of consideration as cannot have been within the contemplation of either side ; and I believe if one were to take all the cases, and they are many, of implied warranties or covenants in law, it will be found that in all of them the law is raising an implication from the presumed intention of the parties with the object of giving to the transaction such efficacy as both parties must have intended that at all events it should have. In business transactions such as this, what the law desires to effect by the implication is to give such business efficacy to the transaction as must have been intended at all events by both parties who are business men ; not to impose on one side all the perils of the transaction, or to emancipate one side from all the chances of failure, but to make each party promise in law as much, at all events, as it must have been in the contemplation of both parties that he should be responsible for in respect of those perils or chances."

Applying those words I cannot come to any other conclusion but that the parties in this case contemplated that the cubicle and bed or couch in which and on which the plaintiff was invited to lie should be free from bugs or other insects which might inflict harm upon the plaintiff, and I am of opinion that in the contract between them there was implied a term that the premises should be so free from bugs as to be reasonably fit for the purpose for which they were to be used. If there was such an implied contract it matters nothing what steps the defendants had taken to render their premises fit ; they have contracted that they shall be reasonably fit, and if the premises are not so and the plaintiff is thereby injured it avails the defendants nothing although they have taken every possible step in an endeavour to make them fit.

Apart from contract the defendants were, in my opinion, under an obligation to a person using their premises to abstain from negligence—and if they did not and the plaintiff was injured thereby he can recover. The plaintiff was, in my opinion, in a better position than a mere invitee, he was a person using the defendants' premises for payment. The defendants therefore owed to him a wider duty than that laid down by Mr. Justice Willes in Indermaur v. Dames (L.R. 1 C.P. 274, at p. 288) as the duty owed to a person going to premises upon business which concerns the occupier and upon his invitation, express or implied, where they are bound to see that the premises which they invite the plaintiff to use for payment are reasonably safe, and if they are not safe and the owners could know of the dangerous condition and negligently did not know of it they are liable for damages caused. See per Lord Justice Scrutton in Hayward v. Drury Lane Theatre (33 The Times L.R., 557 ; [1917] 2 K.B., 899, at p. 914) and Mersey Docks and Harbour Board v. Gibbs (L.R., 1 H.L. 93, at p. 104), and Parnaby v. Lancaster Canal Company (11 Ad. and E., 223). A fortiori the defendants would be liable to the plaintiff if they knew of the dangerous condition of the premises and did not rectify it, but allowed the plaintiff to use them without warning whilst the danger continued. From the evidence as to the statement made by the defendants' manager at the interview with the plaintiff and his brother on the Tuesday after the plaintiff had been bitten, I am satisfied that the defendants knew of the danger, and they allowed the plaintiff to use the premises without rectifying it or warning him of it. I think that in many ways the defendants took great precautions to ensure the cleanliness of their premises and the freedom of the latter from dirt or insects. Detailed evidence was given to me of elaborate brushing, washing, spraying and disinfecting of the beds and couches and of the cubicles and hall which contained them. In my opinion, those precautions were not sufficient. A witness for the plaintiff, Miss Charlotte Mahoney, who is a domestic servant, told me that "you do not get bugs in a house which is kept clean," and a witness for the defendants, a bath attendant named Bampton, said, "If you keep the place clean you do not get bugs." Now the evidence before me is : so far back as 1922 a witness named Hillain was badly bitten by bugs and he killed "well over a dozen" ; that in May or June, 1926, Captain Percy, a veterinary surgeon, was bitten by bugs and that he caught three, which he took to the defendants' manager; that in July or August, 1926, a Mr. Solomon caught a bug and took it to one of the defendants' servants ; and that on August 24, 1925, a Mr. Prague and another man (unidentified) were badly bitten by bugs in the defendants' premises, and complained to the attendants. When the plaintiff and his brother complained some days after August 25 to the defendants' manager the latter stated that he had had complaints before, and asked the plaintiff to send in a medical report. I am forced by this evidence to the conclusion, and I find as a fact, that bugs were on August 25, 1925, in the cubicle occupied by the plaintiff and his brother in such quantities as to render that cubicle unfit for use, and I find that they were there in such quantities because the defendants had not taken all reasonable steps to get rid of them after they had received numerous complaints that they were there. I do not think that it could be urged that the presence of one bug upon one occasion would be proof of a breach of this warranty or neglect of their duty, and it seems to me that what I have to determine in this case is whether on the night of August 25 bugs were present in such quantities as to render the premises unfit for use as Turkish baths or so as to show that the defendants had failed to take reasonable care that such dangerous insects should not be upon their premises. Taking the whole of the evidence into consideration, I have come to the conclusion that upon that night there were upon the defendants' premises bugs in such quantity as to render the cubicle which was assigned to the plaintiff and his brother unfit for use as a sleeping or reclining place, and that they were there in breach of the defendants' warranty and because of the defendants' negligence, and that the plaintiff had suffered damage in consequence of such breach of warranty and negligence.

I now come to consider the damages which the plaintiff is entitled to recover in consequence of the injuries he sustained. I am quite satisfied on the evidence that he was very severely bitten about the face, chest, back, and arms, and that in consequence he suffered very considerable pain, irritation, and annoyance; after obtaining some lotion from a chemist in an effort to alleviate his sufferings he on August 30 consulted a doctor. Acting upon medical advice which I cannot say was unreasonable or improper, he was away from his work for about a fortnight, and he incurred medical expenses. It is a little difficult to estimate the amount which he lost at his business as he keeps no books and had no figures relating to his earnings. He himself says that they average between £5 and £10 per week. In January, 1926, the plaintiff was again ill, and received medical treatment, but I am not satisfied that that illness was in any way occasioned by the injuries which he had received on the defendants' premises. Giving full weight to the whole of the plaintiff's special damage as I find it to be proved, and compensating him as I think adequately for his pain and suffering and inconvenience, I award to him the sum of £52 10s., and I give judgment for him for that amount, with costs. In my view, on the authority of Kelly v. Metropolitan Railway Company (11 The Times L.R., 366; [1895] 1 Q.B., 944) that judgment will carry with it costs upon the High Court scale, but in order to obviate any question on the matter, I state that I am satisfied that there was sufficient reason for bringing the action in the High Court, and I make an order allowing the costs on the High Court scale.

REX v. MINISTER OF HEALTH—EX PARTE DORE.*

Local Government—Disallowance and surcharge by auditor—Persons aggrieved—Remedies—Certiorari—Appeal to Minister of Health—Application for certiorari—Refusal—Subsequent application to Minister—Order of remittal—Jurisdiction—Poor Law Amendment Act, 1844 (7 and 8 Vict., c. 101), ss. 35, 36—Poor Law Audit Act, 1848 (11 and 12 Vict., c. 91), s. 4.

Where a party aggrieved by a disallowance or surcharge by a district auditor applies for a writ of certiorari to quash it and fails in his application, there is no subsequent appeal to the Minister of Health for an order remitting the disallowance or surcharge.

This was a rule nisi for a certiorari to quash an order of the Minister of Health.

* Reported by J. W. Hall, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

On June 6, 1923, Mr. A. Carson Roberts, the district auditor, disallowed to the extent of £5,000 the wages charges of the borough of Poplar for the year ending March 31, 1922, and surcharged that sum upon a number of councillors of the borough.

The surcharged councillors obtained a rule nisi for a certiorari to quash the disallowance and surcharge. The rule was discharged by the Divisional Court on November 21, 1923 (Rex v. Roberts—Ex parte Scurr and Others, 40 The Times L.R., 116; [1924] 1 K.B., 514). On June 23, 1924, the Court of Appeal, by a majority, reversed the Divisional Court's decision and quashed the surcharge (40 The Times L.R., 769; [1924] 2 K.B., 695). The House of Lords on April 3, 1925, reversed the decision of the Court of Appeal and restored the order of the Divisional Court (Roberts v. Hopwood and Others, 41 The Times L.R., 436; [1925] A.C., 578).

On April 14, 1925, Mr. W. H. Thompson, the solicitor who had acted in the proceedings for the surcharged councillors, wrote to the Minister of Health asking for a remission of the surcharges. Mr. Thompson's letter went on to say:—

"With reference to the future attitude of the council upon the question of wage payments I am desired to say that the council under protest and with great reluctance propose to consider the whole question of the wages with a view to bringing the wages into conformity with the decision of the House of Lords."

The Minister of Health on July 14, 1925, wrote to the Town Clerk of Poplar notifying him of the application made on behalf of the councillors and stated:—

"In view of the fact that the proceedings before the Courts were in the nature of a test case, the Minister is not unwilling to entertain the application, provided that he receives a satisfactory indication of the intention of those concerned to place the matter for the future on a footing which would prevent the constant recurrence of similar incidents."

After further negotiations with the Ministry, the council having adopted reduced scales of wages and paid the auditor's costs, the Minister on May 20, 1926, remitted the surcharges.

On July 29, 1926, Mr. John Buchanan Dore, a ratepayer of the borough, obtained a rule nisi for a certiorari to bring up and quash the order of the Minister of Health remitting the surcharges, on the grounds, that (1) the persons surcharged had moved the King's Bench Division to quash the surcharge and there was thereafter no right of appeal to the Minister of Health; (2) no appeal against the disallowance and surcharge was in fact made to the Minister of Health; (3) if there was a right of appeal to the Minister of Health, and if an appeal was in fact made, and/or if it was in his power to entertain and decide upon an application for a remission of the surcharge, his decision upon the appeal and/or application for remission of the surcharge was ultra vires and in excess of the powers conferred upon him, inasmuch as (a) it was not made on a consideration of the question whether the subject-matter of the disallowance was incurred in such circumstances as made it fair and equitable that the disallowance should be remitted, and/or (b) he proceeded upon the view that he could take into consideration promises made by the council as to the action to be taken by it in the future.

By the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1844:—

"Section 35 . . . it shall be lawful . . . for every person aggrieved by such disallowance or surcharge

. . . to apply to the Court of Queen's Bench for a writ of certiorari to remove into the said Court the said . . . disallowance or surcharge. . . .

"Section 36. Provided always that it shall be lawful for any person aggrieved as aforesaid, by any allowance, disallowance, or surcharge, in lieu of making application to the Court of Queen's Bench for a writ of certiorari to apply to the said Commissioners—[now the Minister of Health]—to inquire into and to decide upon the lawfulness of the reasons stated by the auditor for such allowance, disallowance, or surcharge, and it shall thereupon be lawful for the said Commissioners to issue such order therein under their hands and seal as they may deem requisite for determining the question."

By the Poor Law Audit Act, 1848, section 4 :—

"Where any appeal shall be made to the said Commissioners against any allowance, disallowance or surcharge made by any auditor in the accounts of any guardians, overseers, or their officers, it shall be lawful for the said Commissioners to decide the same according to the merits of the case ; and if they shall find that any disallowance or surcharge shall have been or shall be lawfully made, but that the subject-matter thereof was incurred under such circumstances as make it fair and equitable that the disallowance or surcharge should be remitted, they may, by an order under their seal, direct that the same shall be remitted upon payment of the costs, if any, which may have been incurred by the auditor. . . ."

By the Public Health Act, 1875, section 247, sub-section 8 :—

"Any person aggrieved by disallowance made may apply to the Court of Queen's Bench for a writ of certiorari to remove the disallowance into the said Court, in the same manner and subject to the same conditions as are provided in the case of disallowances by auditors under the laws for the time being in force with regard to the relief of the poor . . . or in lieu of such application any person so aggrieved may appeal to the Local Government Board—[now the Minister of Health]—which Board shall have the same powers in the case of appeal as it possesses in the case of appeals against allowances, disallowances and surcharges by the said poor-law auditors."

The Attorney-General (Sir Douglas Hogg, K.C.) and Mr. W. Bowstead showed cause for the Minister of Health ; Mr. Croom-Johnson appeared for the Poplar Borough Council, who had been served with the rule through their Town Clerk ; Mr. Scholefield, K.C., and Mr. H. A. Hill supported the rule.

Mr. Bowstead referred the Court to the sections set out above, and said that no doubt the applicants would rely on the words "in lieu of making application" in section 36 of the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1844. Those words might have constituted a formidable obstacle, but the view taken by the Minister was supported by a very weighty dictum of a most careful and experienced Judge. In the case of Reg. v. Cockerton (17 The Times L.R., 165 ; [1901] 1 K.B., 322, at p. 350), Mr. Justice Wills, in a considered judgment, said :—

"I do not suppose that anyone will ever wish that the gentlemen surcharged, who, I do not doubt for a moment, honestly did what they conceived to be their duty, should be mulcted in the amounts surcharged or in any other amounts. There can be no doubt that the importance of the subject demands that the questions raised should be decided by the House of Lords. Until that is done there can hardly be any disturbance of the existing order of things without the most enormous inconvenience. When the question is finally set at rest, if the views I have expressed be maintained, I can see nothing whatever to prevent the appellants from applying to the Local Government Board under the provisions of 11 and 12 Vict., c. 91, section 4, to remit the surcharges."

Counsel said that that case went to the Court of Appeal (17 The Times L.R., 402 ; [1901] 1 K.B., 726), but that dictum was not differed from, and had since been acted upon regularly. Clearly there could be no appeal to the Minister on a point of law after the decision of the Court on a writ of certiorari.

The Attorney-General supplemented the argument for the Minister. If the view was taken that an application for a certiorari destroyed the Minister's power to remit, obviously no one would go to the Court, and the inconvenience would be great. The Court should be slow to depart from a construction that had been followed for 80 years and judicially recognized 27 years ago, though he did not deny that there was a difficulty.

Mr. Scholefield contended that the power to remit was merely ancillary to the right of appeal, and that when once the appellate jurisdiction of the Court was invoked the right to go to the Minister had gone.

Mr. Justice Avory read the considered judgment of the Court :—On July 29, 1926, this Court granted a rule nisi on the application of John Buchanan Dore, a ratepayer of the Metropolitan borough of Poplar, calling upon the Minister of Health to show cause why a certain certificate of remission of surcharge of the sum of £5,000, made by the district auditor upon certain councillors of the borough, should not be removed into this Court with a view to its being quashed upon the grounds, (1) that, the persons surcharged having moved the King's Bench Division to quash the surcharge, there was thereafter no right of appeal to the Minister of Health ; (2) that no appeal against the disallowance and surcharge was in fact made to the Minister of Health ; and (3) that if there was a right of appeal to the Minister of Health, and if an appeal was in fact made and/or if it was in his power to entertain and decide upon an application for a remission of the surcharge, his decision upon the appeal and/or application for remission was ultra vires and in excess of the powers conferred upon him.

The material facts are that on June 6, 1923, the district auditor certified that in the accounts of the council of the borough for the year ended March 31, 1922, he had disallowed to the extent of £5,000 charges in respect of wage payments made by the council, and had surcharged the £5,000 upon certain of the councillors named in his certificate. On June 26, 1923, this Court granted, on the application of the persons surcharged, a rule nisi for a writ of certiorari to remove into this Court the said certificate of disallowance and surcharge with a view to its being quashed. On November 21, 1923, this Court, after argument, discharged the rule nisi and affirmed the decision of the district auditor (Rex v. Roberts, 40 The Times L.R., 116 ; [1924] 1 K.B., 514). On June 23, 1924, the Court of Appeal reversed this decision (40 The Times L.R., 769 ; [1924] 2 K.B., 695), but on appeal to the House of Lords the order of the Court of Appeal was, on April 3, 1925, reversed, and the order of this Court restored (41 The Times L.R., 436 ; [1925] A.C., 578). An April 9, 1925, the borough council of Poplar, purporting to act on behalf of the surcharged councillors, made an application to the Minister of Health that the surcharge should be remitted, and, after negotiation with the council, the Minister, on May 20, 1926, made an order remitting the surcharge of £5,000.

The question to be determined is whether he had power in the circumstances to make this order of remission.

Section 32 of the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1844, provides for the disallowance by the auditor of items in the accounts and for the surcharge of moneys improperly or illegally expended upon the persons authorizing the payment or otherwise answerable for such moneys. By section 35 any person aggrieved by such disallowance or surcharge is empowered to apply to the King's Bench Division for a writ of certiorari to remove the disallowance or surcharge into the said Court. By section 36 of the same Act it is provided that any person aggrieved by such disallowance or surcharge may, in lieu of making application to the Court for a writ of certiorari, apply to the Poor Law Commissioners (now the Minister of Health) to inquire into and decide upon the lawfulness of the disallowance or surcharge, and thereupon the Commissioners may make such order therein as they deem requisite for determining the question.

Section 4 of the Poor Law Audit Act, 1848, provides that where an appeal is made to the said Commissioners against any such disallowance or surcharge, and they find that it has been, or may be, lawfully made, they may, under certain conditions, remit the same, and it is under the power conferred by this section, if any, that the Minister of Health purports to have made the order of remission in this case.

In the present case there was no appeal to the Minister of Health under section 36 of the Act of 1844, or under section 4 of the Act of 1848 against the disallowance or surcharge, the persons aggrieved having chosen the alternative remedy by certiorari under section 35 of the Act of 1844 ; and, as the jurisdiction to make an order of remission only arises upon such an appeal to the Minister of Health, the order in this case appears to have been made without jurisdiction and cannot be supported.

This view is confirmed by reference to section 247, subsection 8, of the Public Health Act, 1875, which applies to urban authorities that are not the council of a borough, and provides the same alternative remedies in the case of a disallowance or surcharge, and confers upon the Local Government Board (now the Minister of Health) the power to remit, but only in the event of an appeal to the Local Government Board against the disallowance or surcharge.

Our attention was called to an observation made by Mr. Justice Wills in Reg. v. Cockerton (17 The Times L.R., 165 ; [1901] 1 K.B., 322, at p. 350), to the effect that there was nothing in that case to prevent the applicants from applying to the Local Government Board under the provisions of 11 and 12 Vict., c. 91, section 4, to remit the surcharge, but the point had not been argued. The difficulty that arises in the present case was clearly not present to the mind of the Judge in that case, and this obiter dictum cannot, we think, be accepted as authority to support the respondents' contention.

Having come to the conclusion that the rule should be made absolute on the ground that the Minister of Health had no jurisdiction to make the order of remission, it is unnecessary for us to consider whether, in the circumstances of this case, the order could properly be made.

K.B. Div. (Talbot, J.) 1927. Feb. 3.

PALMER v. CRONE AND OTHERS.*

Justices—Jurisdiction—Distress warrant—Poor rate—Weekly tenant—Summons — Failure of tenant to appear at hearing — Seizure of tenant's furniture — Act of justices in excess of jurisdiction — Error on question of fact on proper evidence — Action for trespass — Liability of justices—Justices' Protection Act, 1848 (11 and 12 Vict., c. 44), ss. 1, 2—Poor Rate Assessment and Collection Act, 1869 (32 and 33 Vict., c. 41), s. 2.

A poor rate was declared against a weekly tenant of certain premises, and a demand made for an amount in excess of the amount which the tenant was liable to pay under s. 2 of the Poor Rate Assessment and Collection Act, 1869. On the failure of the tenant to comply, a summons was issued. The tenant did not appear at the hearing, and the justices, after hearing the evidence of the overseers, issued and signed a distress warrant against the tenant's goods, which were accordingly distrained upon and sold. The tenant appealed to quarter sessions, and his appeal was allowed. He then brought an action in trespass against the justices for issuing the warrant that had authorized the distress.

Held, that the justices were not liable, as they had merely come to an erroneous decision in regard to their jurisdiction on a question of fact on evidence properly before them, as distinct from a wrong decision of law in regard to such jurisdiction.

Calder v. Halket (3 Moo. P.C., 28) applied.

This was an action brought by Mr. Arthur Robert Palmer, of 37, Litchfield-gardens, Willesden Green, Middlesex, in respect of an alleged illegal distress of his goods. The defendants were Dr. J. S. Crone and Mr. P. Hewlett, two justices of the peace for the county of Middlesex ; the overseers of the poor for the parish of Willesden ; James Carless, a constable ; and Messrs. Flood and Sons, auctioneers. The two justices were sued for issuing the warrant which authorized the distress, the overseers for seizing the plaintiff's goods by their servant or agent Carless ; and the auctioneers for selling and converting the goods so seized. The defendants, other than the two justices, relied on the Constables' Protection Act, 1750. The justices denied that they issued the warrant wrongfully and/or without jurisdiction, and contended that the action was not maintainable against them by reason of sections 1 and 2 of the Justices' Protection Act, 1848.

The plaintiff at all material times was the weekly tenant of the ground floor of the premises referred to above. On April 3, 1924, a poor rate was duly made for the parish of Willesden to meet expenses incurred before March 31, 1925. It was made leviable in two instalments, the second instalment becoming due on October 1, 1925. The overseers, in November, 1924, issued a demand note upon the plaintiff for £4 1s., being as to £2 15s. the amount of the second instalment, claimed in advance. At the same time they served a typewritten notice, addressed to weekly tenants generally, notifying them of their option to pay the rate by weekly instalments, and to deduct the same from the rent due to the landlord.

Relying upon section 2 of the Poor Rate Assessment and Collection Act, 1869, the plaintiff did not comply with the demand, and a summons was issued against the plaintiff on February 5, 1925. The summons came on for hearing before the justices on February 14. At the hearing Miss Winifred Rush, daughter of the plaintiff's landlord, desired to give evidence that the plaintiff's tenancy was a weekly tenancy only, but the justices declined to hear her. The plaintiff did not appear, and, evidence having been given on the part of the overseers, the justices signed and issued a distress warrant against the plaintiff's goods.

On May 13, 1925, the overseers, by Carless, a constable acting on their behalf, entered the plaintiff's premises and seized and took possession of certain furniture, the property of the plaintiff. On May 25, 1925, Messrs. Flood and Sons sold the furniture by public auction. On July 20, 1925, the plaintiff appealed to the Middlesex Quarter Sessions against the distress warrant, and the appeal was allowed, but without costs.

The plaintiff claimed as special damages £38 15s. 8d., the costs of the appeal, and £10, the value of the furniture sold.

At the trial it was admitted by the plaintiff's counsel (1) that the plaintiff had not complied with section 6 of the Constables' Protection Act, 1750, which requires that a demand of the perusal and copy of the warrant shall be made in the manner prescribed by the Act and provides that an action shall not lie unless the same has been refused or neglected for six days, and (2) that in consequence the action against the overseers, the constable, and the auctioneers was not maintainable. Judgment was accordingly entered for the defendants other than the two justices.

With regard to the action against the justices, his Lordship left three questions to the jury :—(1) Did Miss Rush intimate to the justices that the plaintiff was a weekly tenant at the beginning of the proceedings ?—No. (2) Did she do so before the warrant was signed ?—Yes. (3) Damages ?—£50.

By the Justices' Protection Act, 1848, section 1 : ". . . Every action hereafter to be brought against any justice of the peace for any act done by him in the execution of his duty as such justice, with respect to any matter within his jurisdiction as such justice, shall be an action on the case as for a tort ; and in the declaration it shall be expressly alleged that such act was done maliciously, and without reasonable and probable cause ; and if at the trial of any such action, upon the general issue being pleaded, the plaintiff shall fail to prove such allegation, he shall be nonsuit, or a verdict shall be given for the defendant."

By section 2 : " . . . For any act done by a justice of the peace in a matter of which by law he has not jurisdiction or in which he shall have exceeded his jurisdiction, any person injured thereby, or by any act done under any . . . warrant issued by such justice in any such matter, may maintain an action against such justice in the same form and in the same case as he might have done before the passing of this Act, without making any allegation in his declaration that the act complained of was done maliciously, and without reasonable and probable cause : . . ."

By the Poor Rate Assessment and Collection Act, 1869, section 2 : "No such occupier [including weekly tenants] shall be compelled to pay to the overseers at one time or within four weeks a greater amount of the rate than would be due for one quarter of the year."

Mr. Wilfrid Rutherford and Mr. A. E. Phelps appeared for the plaintiff ; Mr. Konstam, K.C., and Mr. Villiers Bayly for the justices ; and Mr. R. T. Monier-Williams for the other defendants.

His Lordship reserved judgment.

Mr. Justice Talbot delivered a considered judgment as follows :—

This action was brought to recover damages for an alleged illegal distress of the plaintiff's goods. The defendants were two justices of the peace for the county of Middlesex ; the overseers of the poor for the parish of Willesden ; James Carless ; and Flood and Sons. The two justices were sued for issuing the warrant which authorized the distress ; the overseers for seizing the plaintiff's goods by their servant or agent Carless ; and Flood and Sons, who are auctioneers, for selling the goods so seized. The defendants, other than the two justices, relied on the Constables' Protection Act, 1750. Section 6 of that Act protects "any constable, headborough, or other officer" and anyone acting "by his order and in his aid" against any action "for anything done in obedience to any warrant under the hand or seal of any justice of the peace," until a demand of the perusal and copy of such warrant has been made in the manner prescribed by the Act and the same has been refused or neglected for six days. It has been decided in Harper v. Carr (7 T.R., 270) that overseers are officers within the protection of this statute, and the other defendants are clearly persons acting by their order. It was admitted that the demand required by the statute as a condition precedent to an action against these defendants was not made. I therefore gave judgment for them at the hearing.

On the question of the liability of the justices for issuing the distress warrant, I had the assistance of an argument in which many authorities were cited by counsel for the defendants. Counsel for the plaintiff did not think it necessary to discuss these, and I took time to consider them. [After referring to the facts, his Lordship continued.]. When the plaintiff appealed to quarter sessions on July 20, 1925, under section 7 of the Poor Relief Act, 1743, the appeal was allowed, but costs were refused on the ground that the contention that the distress was illegal had not been made before the justices. The contention depends on the Poor Rate Assessment and Collection Act, 1869, by which, under sections 1 and 2, the occupier of a rateable hereditament let to him for a term not exceeding three months shall not be compelled to pay to the overseers at one time a greater amount of the poor rate than would be due for one quarter of the year. It has been decided (Hammond v. Farrow, 20 The Times L.R., 497 ; [1904] 2 K.B., 332) that a weekly tenant is a tenant for a term not exceeding three months within this statute.

The poor rate on the plaintiff's tenement for the year in respect of which the distress in question was levied was £5 10s., a quarter of which is £1 7s. 6d., and it follows that a distress for £2 15s. was in fact contrary to the statute. The demand for the half-year's rate was good (Walton-on-the-Hill Overseers v.

Jones, [1893] 2 Q.B., 175), but, if the plaintiff had proved before the justices that the tenancy was a weekly one, it would have been their duty to issue a warrant for £1 7s. 6d. only. See Mansel v. Itchen Overseers (22 The Times L.R., 228 ; [1906] 1 K.B., 221). Moreover, as between these parties the contention that the distress warrant was wrongly issued is res judicata by the judgment of the quarter sessions. The question remains whether the defendant justices are liable to the plaintiff in an action of trespass for issuing it. If they are, the damages found by the jury are £50.

The justices' first defence was that whatever was in fact their knowledge on the subject, and although Miss Rush did inform them of the weekly tenancy before the warrant was actually signed, they were not entitled to regard anything not regularly proved before then, and that, as the plaintiff had not called any evidence and, indeed, had not appeared to claim the protection of the statute, they did right, and not wrong, in issuing the warrant. Apart from the judgment of quarter sessions, this appears to me to be right. See Reg. v. Tompkins (31 J.P., 470.) But, as I have said, the question is, in my opinion, res judicata on this point and is not open to the defendants.

They next rely on the Justices' Protection Act, 1848. The effect of section 1 is that in an action against a justice for any act done by him in the execution of his duty as such justice with respect to any matter within his jurisdiction, malice must be alleged and proved. The plaintiff on his part denies that, in issuing the warrant, the justices acted within their jurisdiction. He says that, on the contrary, they acted without jurisdiction, and that having been injured by what they did he has, by section 2, the same right of action, without alleging or proving malice or want of reasonable and probable cause, as he would have had before the passing of the Act. It is unnecessary to consider the provisos to section 2 of the Act, as it is admitted that they do not apply to this case. The principle of the law is plain. If a judicial officer acts outside his jurisdiction he is not acting as a judicial officer at all, and is in no better position than anyone else. But it does not follow that, because the enforcement of an order of a Court of limited jurisdiction will be prevented on the ground that in fact the matter was not within its limited jurisdiction, an action lies against the Judges of the Court for something done in obedience to the order. See per Mr. Justice Blackburn in Pease v. Chaytor (3 B. and S., 620, at pp. 640-4). There are many cases which illustrate this distinction. If justices have before them a matter apparently within their jurisdiction, and then it is alleged that, because of some fact collateral to the merits of the case, they have no jurisdiction, though they must inquire into the truth of the fact alleged in order to see whether they are to proceed or not, their decision is always open to review by the High Court, and will be corrected, if erroneous, by the appropriate writ. See Bunbury v. Fuller (9 Ex., 111, at p. 140) ; Rex v. Bradford (24 The Times L.R., 195 ; [1908] 1 K.B., 365). But in an action of trespass the justices are not liable because they have come on evidence properly before them to an erroneous decision on their jurisdiction on a question of fact (Calder v. Halket, 3 Moo. P.C., 28, at p. 77), though it is otherwise if upon the facts so found they have decided wrongly in point of law (Houlden v. Smith, 14 Q.B., 841). So in the present case if the plaintiff had appeared before the justices, and it had been proved or admitted that he was a weekly tenant, and they had nevertheless issued a distress warrant for £2 15s. poor rate, they would have been liable in damages for the distress levied under it, inasmuch as by the Act of 1869 they had no jurisdiction to issue it. But in fact there was before them evidence sufficient prima facie to found their jurisdiction, and no evidence of any fact ousting their jurisdiction, because the true facts were not proved (Pease v. Chaytor, 3 B. and S., at p. 643, following Lowther v. Earl of Radnor, 8 East, 113 ; Pike v. Carter, 3 Bing., 78).

The justices were, in my opinion, right in disregarding statements made to them irregularly, and the finding of the jury as to what was said to them by Miss Rush is, therefore, immaterial. What is said in some of the cases in regard to facts which were known to the justices or which they had the means of knowing refers, I think, to knowledge or means of knowledge which they had in their judicial capacity, that is, based on materials regularly before them.

For these reasons judgment must be entered for all the defendants with costs.

GULBENKIAN v. GULBENKIAN.*

Divorce—Variation of settlements—Assurance on husband's life—Policy moneys to be paid to wife if surviving—Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925 (15 and 16 Geo. V., c. 49), s. 192.

On this motion his Lordship held that a policy of assurance, under which money was to be paid to the wife of the assured if she survived him, was a settlement within the meaning of section 192 of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925. After the petitioner, Nurses Gulbenkian, and the respondent, Satenig Gulbenkian, were married, the petitioner took out two policies of assurance upon his life, the first with the New York Life Insurance Company for £2,000, payable to him on May 14, 1940, if he were then living, or on proof of his prior death to his wife, Satenig Gulbenkian ; and the second with the Equitable Life Assurance Society of the United States for £500, payable on June 14, 1936, to the petitioner if living, or upon proof of his prior death to his wife, if living, or if not, to the petitioner's executors, administrators, or assigns.

The husband obtained a decree nisi of divorce against the wife on December 7, 1925, and the decree was made absolute on June 14, 1926. He filed a petition for variation of settlements on September 9, 1926, and on January 31, 1927, the Registrar made a report in which he submitted that the policies be varied as post-nuptial settlements by extinguishing the interests of the respondent thereunder.

Section 192 of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, provides :—

"The Court may after pronouncing a decree for divorce or for nullity of marriage inquire into the existence of ante-nuptial or post-nuptial settlements made on the parties whose marriage is the subject of the decree, and may make such orders with reference to the application of the whole or any part of the property settled either for the benefit of the children of the marriage or of the parties to the marriage, as the Court thinks fit, and the Court may exercise the powers conferred by this subsection notwithstanding that there are no children of the marriage."

* Reported by Clifford Mortimer, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Mr. T. Bucknill moved to confirm the report. He said that there was no opposition. The insurance companies had been given notice of the motion and submitted to any order which the Court might make. He referred to Stedall v. Stedall (18 The Times L.R., 254).

Mr. Justice Hill.—Either this lady has no interest at all under these policies, or she has an equitable interest as prospective cestui que trust. If she has no rights at all under the policies, no harm is done to her by striking her name out of them. If she has rights, it can only be because by these documents her husband has settled sums of money on her in certain contingencies. The other parties to the contracts agree to the proposed variation, and I therefore confirm the report.

LORDEN v. BROOKE-HITCHING AND OTHERS.*

Landlord and Tenant — Covenant — Lessee's covenant—Trades not to be carried on—Alehouse, beerhouse, tavern, licensed victualling—Restaurant—Wine and beer licence—Condition—Consumption only at meals.

A covenant in a lease that the trades or businesses of alehouse keeper, beerhouse keeper, tavern keeper, or licensed victualler should not be carried on on the demised premises is not broken by the carrying on of a restaurant with a wine and beer on-licence subject to the condition that alcoholic liquor should only be served with meals.

This action was brought by Mr. John William Lorden, of Ravenswood, West Hill, Putney, to recover from the late Sir Thomas Brooke-Hitching, of 8, Hereford-gardens, Park-lane, W., and Messrs. Callard, Stewart and Watt, Limited, of 49, Old Bond-street, W., damages for the alleged breach of a covenant that the trades or businesses of alehouse keeper, beerhouse keeper, tavern keeper, or licensed victualler should not be carried on or exercised at Nos. 513, 515, Oxford-street, being part of the premises demised by an indenture of lease dated June 11, 1920, made between the plaintiff, as lessor, and the defendant, Sir Thomas Brooke-Hitching, as lessee. The material facts appear from the judgment.

Sir Leslie Scott, K.C., and Mr. Blanco White appeared for the plaintiff; Mr. J. D. Cassels, K.C., and Mr. N. L. C. Macaskie for the defendant Sir Thomas Brooke-Hitching; Mr. Jowitt, K.C., and Mr. H. H. King for the defendants Callard, Stewart and Watt, Limited.

Mr. Justice Salter delivered the following considered judgment:—This is an action by a landlord to enforce a covenant in the lease restricting the use of the demised premises. The question is whether the use of the premises as a restaurant with a beer and wine on-licence is a breach of a covenant not to use them for the trades of an alehouse keeper, beerhouse keeper, tavern keeper or licensed victualler.

By a lease dated May 31, 1920, the Duke of Westminster, the freeholder, demised to the plaintiff certain land and premises at the corner of Oxford-street and Park-lane for 88½ years from Lady Day, 1914. Clause 11 of the lease contains a covenant by the tenant enumerating various trades which are not to be carried on on the demised premises during the term without the permission of the lessor. The plaintiff spent a large sum of money in building on the demised land, and by a sub-lease dated June 11, 1920, he sub-let the premises, being Nos. 509, 511, 513 and 515, Oxford-street, and 40, Park-lane, to the defendant, the late Sir Thomas Brooke-Hitching, for 88½ years, less ten days, from Lady Day, 1914, at a rent of a peppercorn for the first six years, and thereafter rising from £10,000 to £14,000 a year. Clause 11 of this lease is identical with clause 11 of the head lease, except that the permission both of the lessor and the freeholder is required.

By a sub-lease dated November 8, 1920, Sir Thomas Brooke-Hitching sub-let a part of the premises, being Nos. 513 and 515, Oxford-street, to Maude and Co. This sub-lease contains a covenant by the tenants to use the premises only for the business of pastry-cooks, confectioners, tea rooms, and general restaurateurs and caterers unless with the lessor's consent, and that, in the event of such consent being obtained, they would not carry on any business which might depreciate the value of the premises, or become a nuisance or annoyance to the occupiers of any other part of the building, or which might affect the amenities and privacy of the residential portion of the buildings, nor use the premises for an illegal or immoral purpose.

Maude and Co. carried on a restaurant on these premises, and they obtained a licence dated April 1, 1921, to keep open the premises as a refreshment house. They had no licence for the sale of excisable liquor. Maude and Co. assigned their interest to the defendants, Callard, Stewart, and Watt, Limited. These defendants carry on the business of confectioners and restaurant keepers.

The benefit of the refreshment house licence obtained by Maude and Co. was transferred to them on June 8, 1921. They had no licence to sell excisable liquors, so that, if their customers desired such liquors with their meals, they had to send out for them.

To avoid this inconvenience their representative gave notice on January 3, 1922, of his intention to apply for a justices' licence authorizing the grant of an Excise licence to sell by retail wine and beer for consumption either on or off the premises. On March 3, 1922, the justices granted their licence authorizing the applicant to hold an Excise licence to sell beer and wine by retail at the premises known as Stewart's Restaurant for consumption on the premises, subject to the conditions endorsed on the licence. These conditions are as follow:—

"No bar to be erected. Wine or beer to be sold only with bona-fide meals. No wine or beer to be sold off the premises. The sum of £150 as a monopoly value to be paid to the Commissioners of Customs and Excise."

In pursuance of this licence the second defendants' representative obtained an Excise licence dated October 1, 1922, authorizing him to carry on the trades of retailer of beer, retailer of wine, and dealer in tobacco, "he having paid for this licence, being an ordinary restaurant licence, the undermentioned duties." Justices' and Excise licences have been obtained each year in the same terms and subject to the same conditions. The result is that since October 1, 1922, the defendants' customers, while still obliged to send out if they require spirits, can obtain beer or wine with their meals without sending out for it. The restaurant is admittedly well conducted and causes no annoyance to anyone.

* Reported by J. W. Hall, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The Finance (1909-1910) Act, 1910, section 45, provides that where premises are adapted for a restaurant and are bona-fide so used, and it is shown that the receipts from the sale of intoxicating liquor are less than a certain proportion of the total receipts, the licence duty payable shall be a reduced duty bearing the same proportion to the full duty as the receipts for the sale of intoxicating liquor bear to the total receipts. Under the provisions of this section these defendants have always paid a licence duty much less than the full duty. Before the Licensing (Consolidation) Act, 1910, the justices often imposed conditions in granting their licence, and, if such conditions were not observed, no doubt the renewal of the licence was imperilled, but the licence-holder ran no other risk. Now, however, breaches of such conditions can be dealt with summarily.

The justices have thus the power to grant a licence which is, in effect, useless except for a restaurant, and this power, coupled with the provision of a lower licence duty for restaurants, has, I think, created what may fairly be described (as it is described in the Excise licence here) as a "restaurant licence." It is a licence more limited and less costly than a regular, unconditional licence—a licence to sell drink, not as the main business of the licensee, but as ancillary to his main business.

The covenant is in a familiar form. The premises are not to be used, except with the permission of the lessor and the freeholder, as a place of public entertainment, or for the carrying on of a long list of trades, among which are those of alehouse keeper, beerhouse keeper, tavern keeper, and licensed victualler. The general words are :—

"Or any other art, trade, business or employment whatsoever which shall be dangerous or a nuisance or annoyance to the tenant or occupier of any messuage, suite, flat or any other hereditament in the neighbourhood of the premises hereby demised."

The object of the covenant is plainly to maintain the amenity of the neighbourhood and to prevent any annoyance to adjoining occupiers whether by noise, smell, dirt, dust, smoke, crowds, or disorder. The parties have spared no pains to make it clear that this is their object, and to make it clear that this is their only object. The use of the demised premises for business purposes is contemplated. There is no prohibition of retail trade and none of the sale of excisable liquor. The prohibition of each trade, or group of trades, must be read in the light of the general words which follow the enumeration.

The language of the clause is popular and untechnical, and trades are separately mentioned which are very similar if not identical. The words relied on by the plaintiff are : "alehouse keeper, beerhouse keeper, tavern keeper, licensed victualler." I think these words must be read, with the rest of the clause, in their ordinary and popular meaning. In Holt and Co. v. Collyer (16 Ch.D., 718) the covenant was not to use the house as a publichouse, tavern, or beerhouse. The tenant opened a grocer's shop and sold beer under an off-licence as ancillary to his grocer's business. Mr. Justice Fry held that there was no infringement of the covenant, and said :—

"Now is there anything here from which I can infer that the word 'beerhouse' was not used in its primary and popular sense? The covenant which the plaintiff desires to have enforced against the defendant is contained in an indenture of lease, which is not a trade instrument in any sense of the term. It is an ordinary lease by a landlord, who is not shown to be a brewer or connected with the brewing trade, to a person who was not, according to the plaintiff's own statement, connected with the business of selling beer at that time, and in respect of whom there is no evidence to show that he was engaged in any way with the business."

If the words "alehouse keeper and beerhouse keeper" have, or had, any technical meaning, I think they mean persons who held licences under the Alehouse Act, 1828, and the Beerhouse Act, 1830, respectively. I think "tavern keeper" never was a technical term. A tavern has been held to be an inn, and the tavern keeper subject to the liabilities and entitled to the rights of an innkeeper. (See the case of Thompson v. Lacey, 3 B. and Ald., 283.) In this sense the defendants are certainly not tavern keepers. As to the popular sense of the words, I think that "alehouse," "beerhouse," and "tavern" all imply a place where people can go and buy intoxicating drink and consume it without necessarily buying anything else.

The words most relied on were "licensed victualler." These defendants are certainly victuallers in the sense that they sell victuals, and they are licensed both to keep their premises open as a refreshment house and to sell beer and wine there on conditions. It was admitted that the refreshment house licence did not make them licensed victuallers within this covenant, but it was submitted that the beer and wine licence did. In my opinion they are not licensed victuallers within the meaning of this covenant, either in a technical or a popular sense.

In so far as these words ever had a technical meaning, they applied to a person who held a victualler's licence under the Alehouse Act of 1828. The corresponding modern licence is the publican's full on-licence. In Reg. v. Surrey Justices (4 The Times L.R., 540 ; 52 J.P., 423) a confectioner who held a wine licence and supplied luncheons obtained, without any condition, a justices' licence to hold a full on and off Excise licence. The question was whether he was a person about to keep a victualling house within 9 Geo. IV., c. 61, section 1. In dealing with this question Mr. Justice Wills refers to the expression "licensed victualler," and says :—

"The applicant came clearly within the description of a victualler, and when he got his licence he became a licensed victualler, the name usually given to those who hold this general licence."

In ordinary and colloquial language a licensed victualler means a publican, one who keeps a place where people can go to drink and for no other purpose. In Pease v. Coates (L.R., 2 Eq., 688) the covenant was not to carry on certain offensive trades, or any business which was or might be deemed a public or private nuisance, nor to use any building "as a publichouse for the sale of beer, wine, malt liquors, or spirits." It was held to be no breach to sell beer by retail under an off-licence.

Sir W. Page Wood, V.-C., said, among other grounds of his judgment :—

"Further than this, the covenant is directed against nuisances of a local character, arising from offensive smells, and the noise and disturbance that would be occasioned by a parcel of tipplers congregating about any of the houses or the property. I cannot, therefore, hold the sale of beer under a licence not to be drunk on the premises to be within the restriction contained in the covenant."

It must be admitted that the reading of the covenant which I have adopted gives much the same meaning to the terms "alehouse keeper" and "licensed victualler," but I feel no difficulty about this having regard to the terms in which the other prohibited trades are enumerated. In Stuart v. Diplock (6 The Times L.R., 104 ; 43 Ch.D., 343) the covenant was not to permit the business of ladies' outfitting. The defendants carried on business as hosiers, and sold articles the sale of which was usual with hosiers and was also part of the business of ladies' outfitters. It was held that there was no breach of the covenant. So here these defendants sell wine and beer, and licensed victuallers sell wine and beer, but this does not of itself make the defendants licensed victuallers.

In Duke of Devonshire v. Simmons and Another (11 The Times L.R., 52) the covenant was not to "use the premises as a publichouse or beershop, or for carrying on any offensive trade or business whatsoever." The defendant kept a private hotel, and to save her customers inconvenience she obtained from the justices a full on-licence subject to an undertaking to have no public bar and to supply only visitors to the hotel. At the hearing she further undertook not to sell beer. Mr. Justice Stirling, in refusing an injunction, relied on the limited and conditional character of the licence and on the Inland Revenue Act, 1880, section 43, subsection 4, which provided for lower licence duty in the case of premises structurally adapted for use as an hotel and mainly so used. This section is very similar to section 45, subsection 1, of the Finance (1909-1910) Act, 1910, which is referred to above. So far as decided cases can afford any guide to the construction of a document, the authorities seem to me to support the view of this covenant which I have expressed.

It was, however, urged that, whatever view I might take of the intention of the parties as expressed in these words, I was bound to hold that the second defendants were carrying on one or other of these four prohibited trades by reason of the provisions of section 31 of the Beerhouse Act, 1830, and section 44 of the Refreshment Houses Act, 1860. The former section provides that restrictive covenants in any lease or contract between landlord and tenant whereby the trade of victualler or publican is prohibited, or a place is prohibited from being used as a publichouse or alehouse, shall apply and extend, and shall be construed to apply and extend, to persons and places licensed under that Act.

When this section was enacted Parliament was creating a new form of licensed house. There were in existence many covenants between landlord and tenant referring in various terms to licensed persons and places as theretofore existing, and in the absence of some such enactment it would have been difficult to say whether the parties had covered by their language a form of licence which they could not then foresee. No such difficulty arises in regard to covenants made after the Act had passed.

If the section is to be applied to such covenants it must be read subject to a condition that the parties have not expressed a contrary intention. That is, it must be read with one meaning as applied to then existing covenants and with another meaning as applied to subsequent covenants. In my opinion the section applies only to covenants existing at the time of the passing of the Act. Similar observations apply to section 44 of the Refreshment Houses Act, 1860. I think there is nothing in either section to prevent me from gathering the intention of the parties from the words they have used.

The alleged breach of this covenant has not been proved, and there must be judgment for both defendants.

Court of Appeal.
(Lord Hanworth, M.R., Sargant and Lawrence, L.JJ.)

INLAND REVENUE COMMISSIONERS v. TRUSTEES OF ROBERTS MARINE MANSIONS.*

Revenue — Income-tax — Charity — Boarding-house at reduced charges—Claim to exemption —Income Tax Act, 1918 (8 and 9 Geo. V., c. 40), s. 37 (1) (b)—Finance Act, 1921 (11 and 12 Geo. V., c. 32), s. 30.

By a declaration of trust "a home or place of residence" was founded and endowed, "where persons requiring temporary rest and change of air for the benefit of their health may obtain the same." About half the income of the home came from payments from visitors, who included convalescents, persons needing rest and change, and holiday applicants. On a claim by the trustees for exemption from income-tax on the ground that the trust was established for charitable purposes only,

Held, that since, on the construction of the trust deed, there was throughout an overriding charity which fulfilled the character of a charitable convalescent home, the trustees were entitled to the exemption claimed.

Decision of Rowlatt, J. (43 The Times L.R., 52) reversed.

This was an appeal from a decision of Mr. Justice Rowlatt (43 The Times L.R., 52).

Mr. Justice Rowlatt, reversing a decision of the Commissioners for the Special Purposes of the Income Tax Acts, had held that the present appellants, the Trustees of the Roberts Marine Mansions, were not entitled to exemption from income-tax for the period of two years ending April 5, 1925, on the ground that the trust was not established for charitable purposes only.

The material words of the trust, which was established by Sir John Reynolds Roberts, draper, by a declaration of trust dated July 14, 1903, were as follow :—

"Whereas it is desired to found a home or place of residence where members of the drapery and allied trades and others requiring temporary rest and change of air for the benefit of their health may obtain the same . . . it is hereby agreed and declared . . . that . . . the trustees shall stand and be seised of [the Marine Hotel, Bexhill-on-Sea, Sussex] and any other property which may be conveyed to them . . . upon trust that the trustees do and shall permit such premises to be occupied and used as a home or homes or place or places of residence (primarily) for members of the drapery and allied trades and (secondarily) for members of other trades and professions where persons requiring temporary rest and change of air for the benefit of their health may obtain the same."

* Reported by G. T. Whitfield-Hayes and H. Langford Lewis, Esqs., Barristers-at-Law.

The home was supported by the income from investments, including the original endowment; by subscriptions and donations (mainly from firms in the drapery and allied trades); and by payments by visitors. The payments by visitors formed about one-half of the income of the home.

Letters of recommendation were issued to subscribers and donors to the institution, the number of such letters issued to each subscriber or donor depending on the amount of his contribution. Visitors to the home were admitted either with or without letters of recommendation, but only about 10 per cent. came without a letter. A visitor coming without one had to have a letter of introduction.

There were three categories of visitors to the home:—

(1) Convalescents from illness, who had to furnish a medical certificate; (2) persons resting, i.e., persons in need of rest and change of air for the benefit of their health; and (3) holiday applicants.

It was contended on behalf of the trustees, inter alia:—(1) That the trust was for the benefit of an important section of the community; (2) that the trust was for the relief of poverty; (3) that the trust was for the benefit of the health of the beneficiaries; and (4) that the trust was established for charitable purposes only and the income of the trust had been applied to charitable purposes only.

It was contended on behalf of the Crown, inter alia:—(1) That, as the benefits of the trust were not confined to poor persons, the trust was not one for the relief of poverty; (2) that, as the benefits of the trust were primarily confined to members of the drapery and allied trades, the trust was not one for the benefit of the community as a whole; (3) that, even if the trust could be regarded as a trust for the benefit of the health of the beneficiaries, such a trust was not necessarily a charitable trust; (4) that, as the trustees had power to admit and did, in fact, admit, purely holiday applicants irrespectively of considerations of health, the trust was not one exclusively for the benefit of the health of the beneficiaries; and (5) that the trustees were not a body of persons or trust established for charitable purposes only, and their income was not, by virtue of the declaration of trust, applicable to charitable purposes only.

The Special Commissioners held that the trust was one for charitable purposes only and that the claim for exemption succeeded.

Mr. Justice Rowlatt reversed that finding. He thought that there was nothing on the face of the deed to show that there was a paramount intention to relieve poverty. Moreover, the trustees could admit people to the home who were not ill. In cases where the law had recognized a valid charitable trust the relief of poverty had appeared prominently in the intention of the donor, but the present case failed to satisfy the requirements of the law in regard to charities.

The trustees appealed.

Mr. Raymond Needham appeared for the appellants; the Solicitor-General (Sir Thomas Inskip, K.C.), Mr. R. P. Hills, and Mr. Alan Bell for the Crown.

Mr. Needham said that for a scheme to be a good charity the element of poverty was not necessary. A scheme of benevolence for the relief of others and the furtherance of objects beneficial to the community would be enough. He referred, inter alia, to In re Pleasants—Pleasants v. Attorney-General (39 The Times L.R., 675), where a gift was made to provide prizes for the best kept cottage gardens; In re Estlin—Prichard v. Thomas (72 L.J., Ch., 687), where a fund was given to endow a home of rest for women teachers (each teacher to pay a small sum); In re Gray—Todd v. Taylor (41 The Times L.R., 335; [1925] Ch., 362), where a bequest of £300 was made to provide a sports fund for a cavalry regiment; and In re Wedgwood—Allen v. Wedgwood (31 The Times L.R., 43; [1915] 1 Ch., 113), where a residue was given "for the protection and benefit of animals." In each of these cases it was held that there was a good charitable gift.

The Solicitor-General said that he agreed that poverty was not an essential element; but it was not enough to find an object beneficial to the community to constitute it a charity. A trust might have an object of great liberality and great public utility, and yet not be charitable. The present trust was certainly not one for the relief of poverty; it was to provide a pleasant summer holiday at a specially cheap rate for persons engaged in drapery or an allied trade.

The Master of the Rolls, having stated the facts and read the opening recital of the trust deed and certain other clauses, said that the question raised was not the same as that which had been decided in In re Macduff—Macduff v. Macduff (12 The Times L.R., 233, 452; [1896] 2 Ch., 451). There the question was whether a gift could be charitable if it could be used for "philanthropic" purposes and the bequest failed. Nor was it the same as in Attorney-General v. National Provincial and Union Bank of England (40 The Times L.R., 191; [1924] A.C., 262), where it was held that a patriotic purpose was not necessarily charitable. The Court, in the recent case of In re Monk—Gifden v. Wedd (43 The Times L.R., 256), had discussed other cases in which an overriding charitable intention could be found. If it could be found, it was effective to deal with the property settled with that object.

Here it was said by way of criticism that, although the home was mainly provided for persons requiring rest and change of air, there were further powers given to the trustees which were inconsistent with these objects. But under clauses 21 and 22 the trustees might make alterations in the scheme for the purpose of more effectually fulfilling the objects of the trust. Lastly, it was said against the trustees that, if there was a balance of income not needed for the maintenance of the home, the surplus might be disposed of at the discretion of the committee either (a) for the benefit of the trust, or (b) for the benefit of the drapery and allied trades.

It would not, however, be possible for the trustees to select any object different from the object of the trust deed. The home at the Marine Mansions was to be conducted as a home of rest for persons who were or might have been suffering in their health but were now convalescent, but it was to be conducted on the lines of a boarding-house or hotel rather than on those of a convalescent home or hospital. That regulation was inserted in order to modify the strictness of the rules of a hospital, which some might regard as irksome. The place was to be run, not by segregating people in a ward, but on more homelike lines. It was a regulation wholly consistent with the Marine Mansions having the character of a convalescent home, but with a greater degree of privacy and freedom than would generally be allowed.

His Lordship then referred to the rules for the selection of visitors and to the statement in the case that visitors were divided into three different classes. Proceeding, he said that in respect of all these persons their payments formed only one-half of the income of the home. The visitors were given, by the bounty of the founder, advantages beyond their real means. It was said that such an institution should be treated as a boarding-house—perhaps a cheap though happy one. But, for the reasons which he (his Lordship) had given, when the system was examined it appeared that there was throughout an overriding charity which fulfilled the character of a charitable convalescent home.

On that point it was important to consider the decision of the Special Commissioners, who, following In re Estlin—Prichard v. Thomas (72 L.J., Ch., 687), thought that the home was a charitable institution. He considered that their view was well founded. The holiday applicants had to come to the home with letters either of recommendation or of introduction. The case therefore fell into the group of cases in which relief had been allowed for income-tax purposes under section 30 of the Finance Act, 1921, and section 37 (1) (a) and (b) of the Income Tax Act, 1918. In In re Estlin—Prichard v. Thomas (supra) it was decided that a home of rest for women teachers who contributed something to their own support was a charity, and the present case fell into the same class. The Court regretted to have to differ from Mr. Justice Rowlatt, who felt that the case was a difficult one and lay on the border line. They did not differ from him on any question of law, but only on the construction of the trust deed.

Lord Justice Sargant and Lord Justice Lawrence delivered judgment to the same effect, both agreeing that the question to be decided depended entirely on the construction of the trust deed, and did not raise any general principle.

Court of Appeal.
(Lord Hewart, C.J., Bankes and Scrutton, L.JJ.)

1927. Feb. 9.

ALBERT E. REED AND CO., LIMITED v. PAGE, SON, AND EAST, LIMITED, AND ANOTHER.*

Ship — Seaworthiness — Warranty — Bad stowage.

The plaintiffs employed the first defendants, who were lightermen, to provide barges to convey wood pulp from a ship at Erith to Farncombe and to stow the pulp in the barges. The first defendants employed the second defendants, who were stevedores, to do the stowage. The quantity of pulp put on board one of the barges was in excess of her capacity, and the result was that cracks in her upper structure admitted water and she sank while still alongside the ship and the pulp became a loss. In an action for damages the Judge at the trial held that the first defendants were liable, as the bad stowage, making the barge in question unfit to undergo the ordinary perils which might arise at all stages of the work contracted for, was a breach of the warranty of seaworthiness, but that the second defendants were not liable, as they had no knowledge of the capacity of the barge and had merely acted according to the instructions of the first defendants. On an appeal by the first defendants,

Held, that there was evidence to support the Judge's finding against the first defendants, and the appeal failed.

Decision of Roche, J. (42 The Times L.R., 744) affirmed.

This was an appeal by the first defendants against a decision of Mr. Justice Roche (42 The Times L.R., 744).

The plaintiffs claimed damages for the loss of a quantity of wood pulp which had been sunk in a barge in the Thames.

The wood pulp had been brought by a steamer, the Borgholm, from Oslo to Erith. The plaintiffs employed the first defendants, a firm of lightermen, to provide barges to convey the pulp from Erith, where the steamer unloaded, to Farncombe; and the second defendants were the stevedores who carried out the unloading and stowed the pulp on the barges.

One of the barges, the Jellicoe, had a capacity of 170 tons, but by some negligence a quantity of pulp exceeding 190 tons was placed on her. That made her so low in the water that certain cracks in her upper structure admitted water, and during the night, after being loaded, she sank while still alongside the Borgholm. The persons actually responsible for stowing the pulp on the barge were the first defendants, but they employed the second defendants to do the work for them. The plaintiffs claimed against both defendants alternatively.

Mr. Justice Roche held that the first defendants, the lightermen, were liable, because the bad stowage which made the barge unfit to undergo the ordinary perils that might arise at all stages of the work contracted for was a breach of the warranty of seaworthiness; but that the second defendants were not liable because they had no knowledge of the capacity of the barge and had merely acted according to the instructions of the first defendants.

The first defendants appealed.

Mr. S. L. Porter, K.C., and Mr. Wilfrid Lewis appeared for the appellants; and Mr. A. T. Miller, K.C., and Mr. H. Atkins for the respondents.

The Lord Chief Justice, in delivering judgment, said that the appeal was from the judgment of Mr. Justice Roche on a claim by cargo-owners against two sets of defendants for damages for loss of the plaintiffs' cargo. Mr. Justice Roche found in favour of one set of defendants, the stevedores, but against the other defendants, the lightermen, who now appealed.

His Lordship stated the material facts, and said that it had been made clear by the evidence, and it was not disputed, that the barge—the Jellicoe—exhibited certain cracks. As the process of loading went on, those cracks became—through, perhaps, more causes than one—both larger and more dangerous. The Judge in the Court below found that there were certain cracks exposed, as they ought not to have been, to the presence and action of river water which was consequently let in. The Judge went on to say:—

"I am not prepared to find that of themselves the presence of those cracks on the upper part of the deck of this lighter constituted unseaworthiness. The test applied, and I think rightly applied, by Mr. Justice Channell in McFadden Bros. and Co. v. Blue Star Line (21 The Times L.R., 345; [1905] 1 K.B., 697, at p. 706), if and when put to myself here, must be answered in a sense favourable to the lighter. 'If the defect existed the question to be put is, would a prudent owner have required that it should be made good before sending his ship to sea had he known of it? If he would, the ship was not seaworthy within the meaning of the undertaking.' Applying that to this case, in my view a prudent lighterman would not have refrained from sending his lighter to do this job of work had he known and realized that the cracks on the deck were open to the limited extent to which I find they were open. The truth is that those parts became of that importance owing to the overloading of the Jellicoe which they had never assumed before. It was the overloading which was the real cause of the loss of the Jellicoe, and it was the overloading which made the cracks significant as they would not otherwise have been."

* Reported by E. J. M. Chaplin and T. W. Morgan, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

In this case the conclusion at which the Judge arrived was as follows :—

"I think that, inasmuch as wrong loading, excessive loading, can amount to unseaworthiness and constitute unseaworthiness if the vessel is, at the end of the loading stage, so overloaded as to be a danger to herself and her cargo, there is a breach of the warranty, which I find exists, that she shall be fit to complete, or enter upon and carry out, the next stage of the contract. . . . I hold, as was held in the case of The Galileo (30 The Times L.R., 612 ; [1915] A.C., 199) . . . that, as there the imposition of all risks upon the cargo owners, so here the imposition upon the cargo owners of responsibility, is not sufficient or effective to obliterate the responsibility on the part of the lightermen for the underlying or overriding obligation on them to provide a vessel or lighter, when the various stages of the contract of employment are entered upon, which shall be fit and seaworthy for the purpose of the work the subject-matter of the contract."

In his (the Lord Chief Justice's) opinion the Judge came to a right conclusion in law. The doctrine of stages had been explained in a case decided over 60 years ago—namely, Bouillon and Others v. Lupton (33 L.J., C.P., 37), where Mr. Justice Willes said, at page 42 :—

"Let us see, therefore, what the assured undertake by the policy. In the first place they undertake that the vessel shall be seaworthy. Now, that means different things on different parts of the voyage ; a vessel that was seaworthy for the voyage down the Rhône would not be seaworthy when she left Marseilles. And, indeed, there is an intervening part of the voyage, which gives rise to a third set of considerations—namely, that between Arles and Marseilles ; you are here not in the river, but you are still not on the open sea. The question, therefore, arises—inasmuch as change was necessary, where was the proper place to make it? That is a question of evidence."

It was urged on behalf of the respondents in this case that, in the true sense of the term, the barge was unseaworthy at the commencement of the adventure. In Atlantic Shipping and Trading Company, Ltd. v. Louis Dreyfus and Co. (38 The Times L.R., 534 ; [1922] 2 A.C., 250), Lord Sumner said, at p. 260 :—

"Underlying the whole contract of affreightment there is an implied condition upon the operation of the usual exceptions from liability—namely, that the shipowners shall have provided a seaworthy ship. If they have, the exceptions apply and relieve them ; if they have not, and damage results in consequence of the unseaworthiness, the exceptions are construed as not being applicable for the shipowners' protection in such a case."

In this case the contract was to collect and to carry, and it was clearly open to the Judge, on the evidence, to come to the conclusion that the stage of loading had been completed and that the next stage had begun. The next stage had begun as soon as the loading stage had been completed. The Judge found that at the beginning of the second stage this vessel was unseaworthy. He was entitled so to find and the appeal must be dismissed.

Lord Justice Bankes, in concurring, said :—The defendants contended that the warranty of seaworthiness attached to the barge only at the commencement of the voyage, and that it was not a continuing warranty. That was not disputed as a matter of law. The defendants then alleged that the voyage of the barge in question here commenced when she was sent to Erith to take delivery of this cargo under the contract, and the learned Judge has found that she was seaworthy at that time, and they contended that in those circumstances the plaintiffs had failed to prove any breach of that warranty. Then it was contended, on the other side, that this is a case in which there were stages in this voyage, and that the barge was not seaworthy at the commencement of one of these stages. The answer to that was that assuming that there were stages, and assuming that one of the stages was the loading stage, the barge was seaworthy at the beginning of the loading stage, though unfortunately she sank before that stage was completed, or, at any rate, before the next stage began ; and that in those circumstances there is a failure to prove any breach of this warranty of seaworthiness. That was the case on the one side and on the other.

It assists one very much, in the determination of this question of law, to look at the contract as a whole and to realize that in this particular contract, even if there are not stages, there are a number of different operations to be performed ; and, in my opinion, it is misleading, for the purpose of determining when the warranty of seaworthiness attached to this barge, to speak of the voyage commencing when the barge was dispatched to Erith to load. I agree entirely with what Lord Justice Vaughan Williams said in the case of Wade v. Cockerline (21 The Times L.R., 296 ; 10 Com. Cas., 115), that it is a much more correct way to look at the matter to ask oneself what were the stages in what he calls the transaction, or what I would prefer to call the contract undertaken ; and when one considers the contract which was undertaken in this case, namely, to send the barge from wherever she was lying to Erith, to place her in a position in which she could load, and to look after her in a proper way while she was being loaded, and to do whatever was necessary while she was lying there before the tug came to pick her up, and then when one considers that the barge had to be towed to Nine Elms, and at Nine Elms the proper steps had to be taken to moor her in a position to be unloaded —when one considers that all these operations were covered by this contract, it seems to me that it assists one in taking a clear view of the liability of a person who enters into a contract such as that, to speak of the stages of the contract undertaken rather than the stages of the voyage. And from that point of view I think that Mr. Justice Channell's judgment in McFadden Brothers and Co. v. Blue Star Line (21 The Times L.R., 345 ; [1905] 1 K.B., 697), and Lord Justice Vaughan

Williams's judgment in Wade v. Cockerline (supra), are in no conflict, because they both point out that there are stages in the contract undertaken, and that in many of those stages it seems more appropriate to speak of the fitness of the vessel than the seaworthiness of the vessel; and that, in considering whether or not a vessel is fit to load, one has to take different matters into consideration from those which must be taken into consideration when one is considering whether she is fit to proceed to sea; because, as Mr. Justice Channell points out in McFadden Brothers and Co. v. Blue Star Line (supra), there may be many things that would have to be done to a vessel that was fit to load, before she would be fit to proceed to sea.

But no difficulty of that kind arises here, because it seems to me to be quite plain that in this contract undertaken there was a stage in which it was necessary that the vessel should be fit for loading, and if she was fit for loading when the loading commenced, and she sank before the loading was completed, I agree with what Lord Justice Vaughan Williams pointed out in the case of Wade v. Cockerline (supra), that it becomes immaterial to consider whether she would or would not be fit when the next stage commenced.

In this case, however, there is no doubt about the matter. The learned Judge has found, upon the clearest evidence, that the loading was completed before the barge sank. He finds it in terms, and he had before him the evidence of the lighterman, who said that he had gone ashore for his tea, because the loading was completed, and in order to telephone to his superior officer that the vessel was ready to be towed to Nine Elms, clearly indicating that the loading was in fact completed.

If it was in fact completed, it seems to me that there cannot be any intermediate stage, which was not for this purpose a stage at all. The next stage must be either a separate stage of lying ready to commence her voyage in the ordinary sense, as the learned Judge seems to treat it, or, as it seems to me rather more accurate to say, as soon as this particular barge was loaded the stage commenced when she must be seaworthy in the sense of being ready to be towed to Nine Elms. And whichever way you treat the matter, whether you treat it as a stage of lying in the river ready to be picked up by a tug, or whether you consider that the stage of actually commencing the voyage in the ordinary sense had commenced, is immaterial, because it seems to me that when once you come to the conclusion that the stage of loading was completed and that the vessel sank in the next stage of this contract undertaken, whatever it was, you must come to the conclusion that the learned Judge took the right view in law and that he decided rightly in awarding the plaintiffs the damages that they claimed.

Lord Justice Scrutton also agreed. His Lordship said:—There is some confusion in the authorities with regard to the warranty of seaworthiness, due, I think, to two causes: First, the word "seaworthiness" is used in two senses, (a) fitness of the ship to enter on the contemplated adventure of navigation, and (b) fitness of the ship to receive the contemplated cargo, as a carrying receptacle. A ship may be unfit to carry the contemplated cargo, because, for instance, she has not sufficient means of ventilation, and yet be quite fit to make the contemplated voyage, as a ship; secondly, the fact that there are these two meanings of seaworthiness, and that there may be different stages of seaworthiness according to different stages of the adventure, has led to some confusion of statement.

As the Court said in Cohn v. Davidson (2 Q.B.D., 455, at p. 461), "Seaworthiness is well understood to mean that measure of fitness which the particular voyage or particular stage of the voyage requires." A ship, when she sails on her voyage, must be seaworthy for that voyage, that is, fit to encounter the ordinary perils which a ship would encounter on such a voyage.

But she need not be fit for the voyage before it commences, and when she is loading in port. It is enough if, before she sails, she has completed her equipment and repair. But she must be fit as a ship for the ordinary perils of lying afloat in harbour, waiting to sail. She must, in my view, be fit as a ship, as distinguished from a carrying warehouse, at each stage of her contract adventure, which may, as in Cohn v. Davidson (supra), commence before loading. And she may as a ship after loading be unfit to navigate because of her stowage, which renders her unsafe as a ship. The case of Kopitoff v. Wilson (1 Q.B.D., 377) is a good example of this; there armour plates were so stowed that there was danger of their going through the ship's side, and they did. As Lord Sumner says in Elder Dempster and Co., Limited v. Paterson, Zochonis and Co., Limited (40 The Times L.R., 464; [1924] A.C., 522 at p. 561: "Bad stowage, which endangers the safety of the ship, may amount to unseaworthiness, of course, but bad stowage, which affects nothing but the cargo damaged by it, is bad stowage and nothing more, and still leaves the ship seaworthy for the adventure, even though the adventure be the carrying of that cargo."

Wade v. Cockerline (21 The Times L.R., 296; 10 Com. Cas., 115) illustrates the latter part of the quotation. The ship was quite fit as a ship to carry the cargo that she had on board if properly stowed; the bad stowage did not make the ship unfit as a ship, but did endanger the cargo. Looked at from the point of view of a ship to sail the sea, the highest measure of liability will be when she starts on her own voyage, and this is often spoken of as the stage when the warranty attaches, but what is meant is that it is the time when that highest measure of liability attaches. There are previous stages of seaworthiness as a ship, applicable to proceeding to the loading port, loading, and waiting to sail when loading is completed.

On the other hand, the highest measure of liability as a cargo-carrying adventure, that is, of "cargo-worthiness," is when cargo begins to be loaded. It has been decided that, if at this stage the ship is fit to receive her contract cargo, it is immaterial that when she sails on her voyage, though fit as a ship to sail, she is unfit by reason of stowage to carry her cargo safely.

Thus, in The Thorsa ([1916] P., 257), when the ship sailed with chocolate and cheese stowed together, so that the chocolate was damaged, the Court of Appeal declined to hold the ship unseaworthy. This case was approved in Elder Dempster and Co., Limited v. Paterson, Zochonis and Co., Limited (supra) in the House of Lords, where stowage of oil in casks, so that it was damaged by the weight of cargo on top, the stowage not affecting the sailing of the ship, was held not to be unseaworthiness for sailing. This limitation of the warranty of cargo-worthiness is expressly made because negligent stowage of a seaworthy ship is something happening after the warranty of cargoworthiness has been complied with, and, so long as the negligent stowage does not make the ship unseaworthy as a ship, does not affect a warranty which has already been complied with.

It was argued that the doctrine of stages was only a question of difference of equipment, and that overloading was not equipment. But damages unrepaired at the commencement of a new stage, collision during loading, and starting on the voyage with that damage unrepaired, may obviously be unseaworthiness at the commencement of the voyage stage. I see no reason for defining stages only by difference of equipment.

Applying the above statement to the facts of the present case, the barge was sent to the ship's side to carry 170 tons, and she was fit to carry that quantity. The warranty of cargoworthiness was complied with when loading commenced. But then 193 tons were put into her, some 14 per cent. more than her proper load. With that cargo in, she had a dangerously low freeboard in calm water. I think that at any rate one of her gunwales was awash, and water could continuously enter through cracks, which would be only an occasional source of leakage if she were properly loaded. She had to lie so loaded for some unascertained time in the river till a tug came. The ship was not bound to let the barge lie moored to the ship's side. She might have to navigate under oars to a barge road. She was exposed to all the wash of passing vessels, and the more water she took on board, the more dangerous she would become. It is clear that she was quite unfit to lie in the river for any time exposed to the wash of passing vessels and the natural "send" of the water. It is still clearer that she was quite unfit to be towed, and that she was in such a condition that she would soon go to the bottom. I am clearly of opinion that the barge was unseaworthy as a barge from the time when loading finished, unfit to be in the river, and still more unfit to be towed.

I accept the view of Mr. Justice Channell in McFadden Bros. and Co. v. Blue Star Line (21 The Times L.R., 345; [1905] 1 K.B., 697) that the warranty of cargoworthiness, if complied with at the commencement of a stage, is not continuous during the stage, but this view does not negative the position that at the commencement of a new stage of the adventure there is a renewed warranty of seaworthiness as a ship. It seems to me clear that there would be a renewed warranty when the towing started, and that this overloading would be a breach of the warranty. If the three leaks found by Mr. Justice Channell in McFadden Bros. and Co. v. Blue Star Line (supra), had admitted so much water that the safety of the ship was endangered, and if the leaks were incapable of being remedied on the voyage, there would clearly have been a breach of the warranty of seaworthiness as a ship, on sailing on the voyage. It seems equally clear that if an overloaded barge, seaworthy in the calm waters of a dock, went out into the river to wait for a tug, there would be a renewed warranty of fitness to navigate and wait, which would be broken by overloading rendering the barge unfit to lie waiting in the river. And I think that in the present case, when the loading was finished and the man in charge, apparently in the ordinary course of his business, left her unattended in the river waiting for a tug, and unfit in fact either to lie in the river or to be towed, there was a new stage of the adventure, a new warranty of fitness for that stage, and a breach of that warranty which prevented the exceptions from applying.

The appeal was accordingly dismissed with costs.

Court of Appeal.
(Lord Hanworth, M.R., Sargant and Lawrence, L.JJ.)
1927. Feb. 18.

TODD v. EGYPTIAN DELTA LAND AND INVESTMENT COMPANY, LIMITED.*

Revenue — Income-tax — Company—Residence —Management abroad—Whether resident in this country—Income Tax Act, 1918 (8 and 9 Geo. V., c. 40), Sched. D, Cases IV. and V.

Although a company, which is registered in this country but has its control and management abroad, resides where it is controlled and managed, yet it does not reside there exclusively, but it necessarily resides in this country so as to be liable to income-tax, because it is obliged by law to perform in this country certain duties which cannot be performed abroad, such as having a registered office and keeping a register of shareholders.

Decision of Rowlatt, J. (43 The Times L.R., 70), affirmed.

This was an appeal by the company from a decision of Mr. Justice Rowlatt (43 The Times L.R., 70).

The Egyptian Delta Land and Investment Company, Limited, whose registered office was at 211-214, Gresham House, Old Broad-street, appealed to the General Commissioners of Income Tax for the City of London against assessments to income-tax under Cases IV. and V. of Schedule D in respect of the years 1919, 1920 to 1924, and 1925.

The company was incorporated in England in 1904, and among its objects were the purchase of lands in Egypt and the development of the resources of those lands. In 1907 by a special resolution of the company it was resolved:—"That it is desirable that the business and affairs of the company should henceforth be managed and directed entirely from Egypt and that accordingly the articles of association be varied."

In pursuance of that resolution the business of the company was in 1907 transferred to Cairo and had since been controlled, managed, directed, and carried on entirely in Cairo. All the London directors retired in that year and a new board, the members of which were all permanently resident in Cairo, was appointed. No directors' meeting had since been held in the United Kingdom. The secretary resided in Egypt, and the seal and all books of the company were kept in Egypt. The company's banking account was with the National Bank of Egypt at Cairo, the company's account with the London agency not being entirely closed, but being used only for the payment of small disbursements, to the amount of £8 or £9 annually, made by the agency on instructions from Egypt. The register of transfers was kept in Cairo, where transfers of shares were passed before being registered in London. The accounts were made up and audited, and dividends were declared and paid, exclusively from Cairo.

In order to comply with the requirements of the Companies Acts there was a registered office of the company in London at which the registers of members and directors and bearer warrants were kept. To meet those statutory requirements the company paid a fee to Mr. F. J. Horn, who provided them (together with several other companies) with a registered office at his address at Gresham House, where their name appeared on the door. No room or part of a room was appropriated to the company, and there were in fact more companies than rooms.

The London secretary performed the statutory duties of filing the annual summary with the Registrar (after it had been checked and signed in Egypt), and also dealt with correspondence from shareholders and transmitted to Cairo applications for share warrants and transfers which might be sent to the registered office. His position was purely formal; he had no power of attorney and no power to do anything more than the law required the company to do here.

The company contended that the case of Swedish Central Railway Company, Limited v. Thompson (41 The Times L.R., 385; [1925] A.C., 495) was distinguishable; that the company was resident in Egypt and not in the United Kingdom; and that the mere fact that it had a registered office here and complied with the statutory requirements of the Companies Acts did not constitute residence for the purposes of the Income Tax Acts.

The Crown contended that the case was not distinguishable from Swedish Central Railway Company, Limited v. Thompson (supra); that the essential and important elements of incorporation in this country, of the situation of the registered office here, and of the activities required by law to be performed here, were present in this case; and that the activities of the London secretary were appreciable and important.

The General Commissioners held that Swedish Central Railway Company, Limited v. Thompson (supra) was distinguishable, and that the company was not resident here.

Mr. Justice Rowlatt reversed that decision. On the facts he held that, wherever it might be actually managed, the company was always "at home" in this country. Having an establishment and keeping a register in this country constituted the idea of residence.

The company appealed.

Sir John Simon, K.C., and Mr. Bremner appeared for the appellants; the Attorney-General (Sir Douglas Hogg, K.C.) and Mr. R. P. Hills for the Crown.

The MASTER OF THE ROLLS, in delivering judgment, said that the obligations and duties of a company registered here involved having a registered office in London at which the registers of members and bearer warrants would be kept. There was also the annual summary to be filed with the Registrar, and various statutory duties as to the registration and inspection of mortgages had to be performed.

Mr. Justice Rowlatt had held that a company incorporated and registered here which performed the duties laid upon it by Parliament must be held to reside in this country, even though the facts showed that its activities were carried on elsewhere. The question at issue had been fully discussed in Swedish Central Railway Company v. Thompson (41 The Times L.R., 385; [1925] A.C., 495). Until that decision, no case had decided that a company could have more than one residence. In that case the Lord Chancellor (Lord Cave) said, at p. 501:—

"When the central management and control of a company abides in a particular place, the company is held for purposes of income-tax to have a residence in that place; but it does not follow that it cannot have a residence elsewhere. An individual may clearly have more than one residence (see Cooper v. Cadwalader, 5 Tax Cas., 101), and on principle there appears to be no reason why a company should not be in the same position. The central management and control of a company may be divided, and it may 'keep house and do business' in more than one place; and if so, it may have more than one residence."

That judgment was concurred in by Lord Dunedin and Lord Sumner, and supported by Lord Buckmaster.

In the cases of Calcutta Jute Mills Company, Limited v. Nicholson, and Cesena Sulphur Company, Limited v. Nicholson (1 Ex. D., 428) each company carried on business abroad. The Cesena Company worked mines in Italy; the Jute Company had mills near Calcutta. Both were held to be resident here, because their activities were directed from London. The question of dual residence was referred to but not decided, the decision turning on the answer to the question—to quote Baron Huddleston's phrase—Where was le centre de l'entreprise? He said (at p. 453):—

"Registration, like the birth of an individual, is a fact which must be taken into consideration in determining the question of residence. It may be a strong circumstance, but it is only a circumstance."

Those two cases were said to decide that the true test of residence was the place of the control of the business. That, no doubt, was the test applied, but the possibilities of a dual residence were left open. Those cases did not decide that the place of control was the only possible test of residence.

In De Beers Consolidated Mines, Limited v. Howe (22 The Times L.R., 756; [1906] A.C., 455) it was decided that a foreign corporation registered abroad might reside here and be subject to tax. Lord Loreburn said (at p. 459):—

"It is clearly established that the majority of directors and life governors live in England, that the directors' meetings in London are the meetings where the real control is always exercised in practically all the important business of the company except the mining operations."

Lord Loreburn rejected the test that a company resided where it was registered and nowhere else, but it would not be proper to treat that rejection as connoting a decision that the incorporation and registration of a company could not indicate the residence of a company. Dual residence was not considered. What was advanced was that a company could have only one residence, the place of its foundation; but, without over-ruling the Cesena and Calcutta cases (supra), that argument could not have been accepted. He (the MASTER of the ROLLS) could not accept the De Beers case (supra) as affirming the proposition that a company could have only one residence, and that that residence was where the central management and control of the business might abide.

The case of Egyptian Hotels, Limited v. Mitchell (30 The Times L.R., 457; [1914] 3 K.B., 118; 31 The Times L.R., 546; [1915] A.C., 1,022) was much discussed in the Swedish Railway case (supra) and in the present case. In Egyptian Hotels, Limited v. Mitchell (supra) Lord Justice Buckley said in the Court of Appeal ([1914] 3 K.B., at p. 132):—"This company is incorporated in the United Kingdom; it is therefore resident 'here.'" An attempt was made to show that he had modified his opinion by what he said in Bradbury v. English Sewing Cotton Company, Limited (39 The Times L.R., 590; [1923] A.C., 744, at p. 767), but his later words did not seem to indicate that he had really changed it. Further, in the Swedish Railway case (supra) Lord Dunedin said that it was impossible to hold that the test of where the business was really managed alone afforded a test of the sole residence possible in the case of a company.

Those authorities suggested that on the question of the dual residence of a company there was no sufficient authority for holding the seat and control of the business to be the only test of residence; and there certainly seemed authority for holding that the place of incorporation, the place whose laws determined the company's status and the social contract between the shareholders, ought to be held to be one of a company's residences.

In the Swedish Railway case (supra) Lord Justice Warrington said in the Court of Appeal ([1924] 2 K.B., at p. 268) that he was prepared to hold that "the registered office is a residence of the company, and that it must be regarded as residing there, at whatever other place, at home or abroad, it may also reside."

Lord Justice Atkin said that, in principle, he would have thought that the place of incorporation and of the registered office was conclusive of residence.

In the House of Lords the Lord Chancellor said (41 The Times L.R., at p. 388; [1925] A.C., at p. 505):—

"I am not at present prepared to say that registration in the United Kingdom would itself be sufficient proof of residence here."

But those words did not exclude the possibility that registration, coupled with the functional activity required by law, would be held by him to be sufficient.

Where a company incorporated and registered here owed its status to the laws of this country; where it had to do, and did, certain acts in conformity with those laws, and could not cast those duties aside; where its shareholders' rights and its own dissolution were governed by those laws—was it possible to hold in such a case that the company could claim to be non-resident here? So, by analogy, it would seem that a man with a local habitation, bound by and compelled to do certain acts in accordance with the local laws, even if his compliance with them was in some measure formal, could hardly prevent the inference from being drawn that he "kept house" in that locality. The appeal must therefore be dismissed, with costs.

Lord Justice Sargant said that the Crown had throughout relied on the broad general proposition that the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, imposed continuing obligations on all companies registered under that Act, at any rate on all companies limited by shares, and that those obligations necessarily involved a residence here on their part sufficient to render them liable to income-tax. The Master of the Rolls had dealt with the authorities, and it was unnecessary to do so again, but they seemed to tend strongly in favour of the Crown and to be almost if not quite conclusive. In the Swedish Railway case ([1924] 2 K.B., 255) Lord Justice Warrington distinctly expressed the view, as one of the foundations of his judgment, that a company registered under the Companies Acts must necessarily have a residence here for the purposes of income-tax; and Lord Justice Atkin appeared to take the same view, though to express it somewhat less emphatically. In the House of Lords (41 The Times L.R., 385; [1925] A.C., 495) the Lord Chancellor, in an opinion concurred in by the majority, preferred to base his decision on the view that the fact of registration, together with certain other trifling circumstances, entitled the Court to find that the Swedish company had a residence here, but it did not seem as if he intended to cast any doubt on the views of Lords Justices Warrington and Atkin, or to do more than keep the general question open so far as the ultimate tribunal was concerned.

The important difference between the present case and the Swedish Railway case (supra) was that there the Special Commissioners had found as a fact that the company had a residence in England, whereas here the General Commissioners had found that the company "was not resident in this country for the purposes of the Income Tax Acts."

His Lordship dealt with the requirements of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, in regard to companies registered in the United Kingdom, from section 2, as to the initiation of the company, to section 131, dealing with the Court's jurisdiction to wind up companies, and said that in his view the cumulative effect of those sections was decisive, and led irresistibly to the conclusion that a company regulated by that Act had a residence, though not necessarily a sole residence, in this country, analogous to the residence of an individual. Such a company from its birth onwards was subject to continuing statutory regulations which defined the limits of its powers towards others and controlled the relations of the company with its members, and of members inter se, in vital respects. Though the centre of its business activities and management might be in Egypt, the centre of its constitution as a company and of its domestic arrangements was definitely fixed in this country and at its registered office. That Act of 1908 enabled the company to be born, and necessarily kept it domiciled here throughout its existence, and though residence might be less than domicile and might often occur without domicile, yet it seemed doubtful whether an obligatory and continuous domicile in England, resulting from that Act of 1908, did not necessarily involve residence at the place of domicile. In his (Lord Justice Sargant's) view, the requirements of the Act kept the company here, and made it "at home" here, to such an extent as to give it a notional residence in this country sufficient to create a liability to income-tax. The appeal must be dismissed.

Lord Justice Lawrence said that the cases cited during the hearing had illustrated the difficulty of determining the residence of a company by analogy from the residence of a human being. In view of the judgment of Lord Justice Warrington in the Swedish Railway case ([1924] 2 K.B., 255) and the judgments delivered in the present case, with which he concurred, he (Lord Justice Lawrence) did not propose to state at any length his reasons for concurring. But it seemed to be one of the basic conceptions of the Companies Acts that a company incorporated under them should, during its entire existence, have a permanent home in that part of the United Kingdom where its registered office was situate, where it must always be in residence, wheresoever else it might reside in order to carry on its business. There, at its registered office in the United Kingdom, it must always be found in residence by its creditors, its shareholders, the Registrar of companies and the Board of Trade. That was shown by the elaborate provisions contained in the Acts for safeguarding the interests of creditors and shareholders, many of which provisions would be rendered more or less futile if the company could remove itself from the country where it was incorporated and could set up its abode exclusively in some distant foreign land. To mention a few of those provisions, the company and its responsible officials were subjected to the jurisdiction of the Courts of this country, and all offences made punishable by fines might be prosecuted under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts ; shareholders' rights and liabilities were defined by reference to our Courts ; the company was bound to keep its register of members and charges, and to give facilities for inspection. The company could only reduce its capital by leave of the Court, and must keep in close touch with the Registrar ; while the Board of Trade could cause an investigation to be made into the company's affairs. In contrast to this, however, was the power given to a company to keep a branch register in any colony where it transacted business.

The analogy of the birth in England of a human being who subsequently went to reside permanently and exclusively abroad did not seem to be at all applicable to an English company incorporated under the Companies Acts. It would seem therefore that every company incorporated under the Acts resided at its registered office for the purposes of liability to income-tax.

K.B. Div. (Shearman, J.) } 1927. Feb. 24.

SOCIETE ANONIME DES GRANDS ETABLISSEMENTS DU TOUQUET PARIS-PLAGE v. BAUMGART.*

Gaming — Loan—Purpose of gaming—Cheque given in exchange—Action on the loan—Gaming Act, 1710 (9 Anne, c. 14), s. 1—Gaming Act, 1835 (5 and 6 Wm. IV., c. 41), s. 1.

Where a person lends money to another in a foreign country for the purpose of gaming, the game not being illegal by the law of that country, and receives from him a cheque for the amount, the lender, though not entitled to sue the borrower on the cheque in the English Courts, may sue him in those Courts on the loan.

This was an action in which the Société Anonime des Grands Etablissements du Touquet Paris-Plage, the proprietors of the casino at Le Touquet, sued Mr. Moss Baumgart, of 35, Osbaldeston-road, Stamford-hill, on three dishonoured cheques—two for £100 each drawn by the defendant on August 14, 1926, and one for £200 drawn by the defendant on August 15, 1926. Alternatively, they claimed £400 as money lent by the plaintiffs to the defendant.

The defendant alleged that the money was paid to him in respect of gaming and wagering transactions, and was not recoverable in law.

Mr. J. B. Melville appeared for the plaintiffs ; Mr. J. B. Matthews, K.C., and Mr. B. M. Goodman for the defendant.

Mr. MELVILLE said that while it was true that the cheques sued on were given in the casino, it was not true that the money received was for gaming ; it was for any purpose which the defendant might choose. The casino contained a theatre, two restaurants, and a reading-room, besides two gambling rooms, in one of which boule was played for small stakes, and in the other baccarat and chemin-de-fer.

It was very common for people known to the manager, or introduced by someone known to him, to come and get money in exchange for cheques. Such money might or might not be used at the tables ; it might be equally well used for hotel bills or travelling. The defendant was introduced to the manager by a Mr. Sydney Jay, and asked for £100, which, at the current rate of exchange, was 17,400f. That amount was handed to him in notes. A few hours later he came and asked for a further £100, and on the following day for £200.

M. André Jean Hughes, the manager of the casino, gave evidence corroborating counsel's opening statement.

In reply to Mr. MATTHEWS, in cross-examination, the witness agreed that the defendant might have said :—"I have lost all my money and want £100 to try my luck again." He never asked what people wanted it for. On the second occasion the defendant simply said that he wanted some more money. The three transactions were not all in one session. The defendant did not say that if he lost the third sum he would stop playing. If he (the witness) had known that the defendant had already lost £200 he would not have advanced the further £200.

Maître Augustin Jean Duhamel, a French advocate and a member of the English Bar, said that by French law the games in question were lawful, and an action could be maintained in the French Courts in respect of gaming losses or cheques given for gaming, or to recover money lent for gaming.

In cross-examination, the witness said that an action would lie either on the cheque or on the loan. He referred to a case of Depoux v. Ducis in the Cour de Cassation in 1922.

Mr. MATTHEWS, opening the case for the defendant, said that the material statute was the Gaming Act of 1710 (9 Anne, c. 14), section 1 of which stated :—

"All notes, bills, bonds, judgments, mortgages, or other securities or conveyances whatsoever given, granted, drawn or entered into, or executed by any person or persons whatsoever, where the whole or any part of the consideration of such conveyances or securities shall be for any money or other valuable thing whatsoever won by gaming or playing at cards, dice tables, tennis, bowls or other game or games whatsoever, or by betting on the sides or hands of such as do game at any of the games aforesaid, or for the reimbursing or repaying any money knowingly lent or advanced for such gaming or betting as aforesaid, or lent or advanced at the time and place of such play to any person or persons so gaming or betting, as aforesaid, or that shall during such play so play or bet shall be utterly void, frustrate and of none effect to all intents and purposes whatsoever. . . ."

The defendant was a young man who went to the casino with a large sum of money of his own. He was not, as Mr. Melville had rather suggested, an exploiter of the casino.

MR. JUSTICE SHEARMAN.—He had £400 from the casino, and now finds that he can't afford to repay. I am not concerned about the morality of it, but do not put a halo round him.

Mr. Moss Baumgart, the defendant, said that he was a commercial traveller, aged 27. He took with him to Le Touquet about £220 of his own money. He lost that, and Mr. Jay introduced him to the manager and then left.

He (the witness) told the manager that he had lost all the money he had and wanted another £100. Having received the money he went back to the gaming rooms and took the bank at chemin-de-fer in his turn. The £100 lasted him about an hour. He went back to the manager and told him that he had lost the £100 and would like another £100. That lasted about as long as the first. At about 12.30 a.m. he went to the manager again and said that he had lost the second £100. He asked if he could have another £200, and said that if he lost that he would not play any more. He went on till about 5.30 a.m., by which time he had lost it all. He did not play later on the Sunday, August 15. He remembered saying that as the hour was after midnight he must date his cheque the 15th.

In cross-examination the witness said that he did not pay his hotel bill; it was paid for him. It would be quite natural for the manager to think that he had expenses and was going to meet them.

M. Hughes, recalled, said that the defendant was wrong about the dating of the third cheque. They had to have cheques dated the day on which the session began, even though it lasted into the following morning.

Mr. Justice Shearman said that on the facts he accepted the plaintiffs' evidence rather than that of the defendant, but he thought that the money was advanced substantially for the purpose of gaming at the casino.

Mr. Melville said that in view of that finding he would not submit that he could succeed upon the cheques, but would rely on the cause of action for money lent.

Mr. Matthews said that there were three states of fact which might arise: (1) Where the action was on a cheque: that was settled by Moulis v. Owen (23 The Times L.R., 348; [1907] 1 K.B., 746). (2) The case where no cheque was given, but money was lent abroad. In that case also the law was clearly settled by Saxby v. Fulton (25 The Times L.R., 446; [1909] 2 K.B., 208).

Those cases gave no trouble. The difficulty arose in the third case, where money was lent for gaming and a security was given, but the plaintiff sought to discard the cheque and sue on the loan. The statute of 9 Anne was amended by the Gaming Act, 1835, by which, where the security was given contrary to the statute of Anne, the consideration was by the statute deemed to be illegal. He would submit that the plaintiff could not hark back to that consideration and sue on the loan. Before the statute of William IV., Lord Mansfield held, in Robinson v. Bland (1 W. Bl., 234), that there was no objection to falling back upon the consideration and suing for money lent.

There were two possible views of the effect of the statute of William IV. It might be argued that its effect was to prevent any action on the consideration at all, or that it was to protect assignees who took a cheque without notice. He referred to Applegarth v. Colley (10 M. and W., 723). In his submission the case was decided by Moulis v. Owen (supra) and Saxby v. Fulton (supra). He submitted that Quarrier v. Colston (1 Ph., 147) was not material.

The games played were legal in France, but in England there was a double-barrelled illegality. They were illegal games and played in a gaming house.

Mr. Melville referred to Société des Hôtels Réunis v. Hawker (29 The Times L.R., 578). He was stopped.

Mr. Justice Shearman said that he did not think that the point had ever been decided. The defendant exchanged three cheques with the plaintiffs' manager for French notes. He thought that the manager knew that the notes were to be used to a large extent for playing games which would be illegal games if played in this country. He was satisfied that they were lawful in France, and that money lent for those games could be sued for in France either on the security given or on the loan itself instead of the security.

It was well decided by Moulis v. Owen (23 The Times L.R., 348; [1907] 1 K.B., 746) that in such a case, if the plaintiffs sued on the cheque, the action was not maintainable. On the other hand, if they disregarded the cheque and relied on the consideration, Robinson v. Bland (1 W. Bl., 234) and, to some extent, Quarrier v. Colston (1 Ph., 147) were said to give the plaintiffs a right of action. It had been held in those cases that an action lay on a loan for gaming purposes where no security was given.

Although it was a curious state of affairs, he thought that he ought to follow Robinson v. Bland (supra), Quarrier v. Colston (supra), and Saxby v. Fulton (25 The Times L.R., 446; [1909] 2 K.B., 208). It did not seem reasonable to hold that if the plaintiffs had not taken a cheque they could succeed, but that because they did so they could not, and he thought that they were entitled to recover on their alternative claim.

INGLE v. FARRAND.*

Revenue—Income-tax—Clerk in employment of county council—Assessment for 1921-22 under Schedule E—Schedule D the proper Schedule—Alteration of law by statute—Schedule E made proper Schedule—Subsequent additional assessment for 1921-22 under Schedule E—Whether statute retrospective—Income Tax Act, 1918 (8 and 9 Geo. V., c. 40), s. 125—Finance Act, 1922 (12 and 13 Geo. V., c. 17), s. 18.

The appellant, a clerk in the employment of a county council, was assessed in December, 1921, to income-tax for 1921-22 under Schedule E, though at that time he ought to have been assessed under Schedule D. On July 20, 1922, the Finance Act, 1922, was passed, and that statute by s. 18 (1) made Schedule E the proper Schedule and provided by subsection (6): "The provisions of subsection (1) and subsection (3) of this section shall have effect and shall be deemed always to have had effect, for the purpose of any assessment to income-tax which is made or becomes final and conclusive after the first day of May, nineteen hundred and twenty-two, in respect of any employment (other than that of a weekly wage-earner employed by way of manual labour) under any public department, or under any company, society or body of persons or other employer mentioned in Rule 6 of the Rules applicable to Schedule E."

In September, 1922, owing to a revision of the appellant's salary and bonus, an additional assessment under Schedule E was made on the appellant for 1921-22 under s. 125 of the Income Tax Act, 1918. In fact the appellant had already paid more under Schedule E than if he had originally been properly assessed under Schedule D on figures including the revised salary and bonus.

Held (Lord Atkinson dissenting), that s. 18 (6) of the Finance Act, 1922, had not the retrospective effect of validating the additional assessment under Schedule E.

Decision of the Court of Appeal ([1925] 2 K.B., 728) reversed.

This was an appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal ([1925] 2 K.B., 728) reversing a judgment of Mr. Justice Rowlatt upon a case stated by the Commissioners for the General Purposes of the Income Tax Acts for the parish of St. Martin-in-the-Fields.

The appeal was against an additional assessment to income-tax in the sum of £77 made on the appellant on September 13, 1922, in respect of the financial year 1921-22, and the substantial question raised by the appeal was whether such additional assessment was rendered valid by virtue of the provisions of section 18, subsections 1 and 6, of the Finance Act, 1922.

The facts of the case and the material provisions of the Act of 1922 are set out in the opinion of the Lord Chancellor.

Mr. Konstam, K.C., and Mr. J. L. D. Ridsdale appeared for the appellant; the Attorney-General (Sir Douglas Hogg, K.C.) and Mr. R. P. Hills for the respondent.

The Lord Chancellor: My Lords, this is an appeal against an additional assessment to income-tax in the sum of £77 made on the appellant on September 13, 1922, in respect of the tax year 1921-22, and raises a question as to the effect of section 18 of the Finance Act, 1922. The amount in dispute is small; but the case is said to be a test case, the result of which will affect a large number of assessments made in respect of that tax year.

The appellant is an assistant clerk in the employment of the London County Council, and receives a salary and bonus. It had been the practice of the Revenue authorities to assess him (with some other persons in the same position) under Schedule E of the Income Tax Act, 1918, as the holder of a "public office or employment of profit." On July 16, 1921, he returned his income for the tax year 1921-22 as £359; and on December 21, 1921, a notice was given assessing him to tax on that amount in accordance with Schedule E. In fact a revision of his salary and bonus in the month of September had increased his income for the year to £436; but this was of course unknown to him when he made his return, and was also unknown to the Revenue authorities when they made the assessment. There was no appeal against the assessment on £359, and it became final and conclusive under section 136, sub-section (1), of the Income Tax Act, 1918, in the month of January, 1922.

On March 2, 1922, this House gave judgment in the case of Great Western Railway Company v. Bater (38 The Times L.R., 448; [1922] 2 A.C.1), and by that judgment (which reversed the decision of the Court of Appeal) held that a clerk in the employment of a railway company did not hold a "public office or employment" within the meaning of the Income Tax Acts and accordingly was assessable, not under Schedule E on his actual profits for the year of assessment, but under Schedule D on the average amount of his profits and gains for the three preceding tax years. It has been assumed throughout these proceedings that this decision applied to persons in the position of the appellant; and this assumption has not been contested by the Attorney-General on the present appeal. Upon this footing the appellant ought, as the law stood in December, 1921, to have been assessed, not on £359, but on £259, which was the average amount of his remuneration for the three preceding years; but as the time for appeal had gone by, the assessment of £359 could not be, and has not been, disputed by the appellant.

On July 20, 1922, the Royal Assent was given to the Finance Act, 1922, and by section 18 of that Act (so far as it is material to the present case) it was enacted as follows:—

"18.—(1) Such profits or gains arising or accruing to any person from an office, employment or pension as are, under the Income Tax Act, 1918, chargeable to income-tax under Schedule D . . . shall cease to be chargeable under that schedule and shall be chargeable to tax under Schedule E, and the Rules applicable to that schedule shall apply accordingly subject to the provisions of this Act.

"(3) Rule 7 of the Rules applicable to Schedule E (which relates to the charge of tax in respect of offices and employments of profit held under a railway company), shall apply to all offices and employments held under, and pensions paid by, a railway company.

"Provided that nothing in this subsection shall affect the provisions relating to the quarterly assessment and the collection of income-tax in the case of weekly wage-earners employed by way of manual labour.

"(6) The provisions of subsection (1) and subsection (3) of this section shall have effect and shall be deemed always to have had effect, for the purpose of any assessment to income-tax which is made or becomes final and conclusive after the first day of May, nineteen hundred and twenty-two, in respect of any employment (other than that of a weekly wage-earner employed by way of manual labour) under any public department, or under any company, society or body of persons or other employer mentioned in Rule 6 of the Rules applicable to Schedule E."

There is no doubt that the appellant, as the holder of an office or employment (though not a public office), falls within the provisions of subsection (1) of the above section, so as to be chargeable in respect of the tax year 1922-23 and subsequent years under Schedule E of the Act; nor is there any doubt that his employment comes within the description contained in the concluding words of subsection (6) as being held under an employer mentioned in Rule 6 of the Rules applicable to Schedule E.

On October 13, 1922, the Commissioners of income-tax gave notice to the appellant of an additional first assessment of £77, being the amount by which his remuneration had been increased in September, 1921, the notice being headed "Notice of additional assessment under Schedule E in the case of persons undercharged in the first assessment." Against this additional assessment the appellant appealed to the General Commissioners, who decided against him and confirmed the assessment subject to a case stated for the opinion of the High Court. The case was argued before Mr. Justice Rowlatt, who discharged the assessment; but on appeal to the Court of Appeal that Court held that full retrospective effect must be given to section 18 of the Act of 1922, and that the effect of subsection (6) of that section was that, in considering the validity of the additional assessment, the original assessment under Schedule E must be deemed to have been in accordance with law ; and they accordingly reversed the decision of Mr. Justice Rowlatt and restored the additional assessment. The appellant has now appealed to this House.

My Lords, with the greatest respect for the opinion of the learned Judges of the Court of Appeal, I am unable to agree with their decision As the law stood in December, 1921, the original assessment then made on the appellant not only was not insufficient, but exceeded by £100 the sum at which he should have been assessed. Now the jurisdiction of the Commissioners to make an additional first assessment upon the appellant arose (if at all) under section 125 of the Income Tax Act, 1918, which provides that such an additional assessment may be made if the surveyor discovers that a person chargeable has been "undercharged" in the first assessment; and how the appellant, who was not undercharged but was overcharged to the amount of £100 in the original first assessment, can come within these words, I am unable to discover. It is true that subsection (6) of section 18 of the Act of 1922 provides that for the purpose of "any assessment" made after May 1, 1922, in respect of the profits of an employment there described the provisions of subsection (1) shall be deemed always to have had effect ; but, even if it be assumed that the expression "any assessment" there used includes an additional first assessment, still the only result of that enactment is to substitute Schedule E for Schedule D so far as that additional assessment is concerned, and not to validate that assessment if it is for other reasons invalid.

The argument for the Crown appears to be that, so soon as the surveyor considers (whether rightly or wrongly) that he has discovered an undercharge in an assessment made in a previous year, and gives notice of an additional assessment in respect of the supposed undercharge, then section 18 (6) requires that the rules under Schedule E shall be applied, not only to the additional assessment, but also incidentally to the earlier assessment to which the additional assessment relates, although that earlier assessment was made and became conclusive before May 1, 1922. It appears to me that this construction gives no effect to the limiting words "for the purpose of any assessment to income-tax which is made or becomes final and conclusive after the first day of May, 1922"; for if on the mere making of an additional assessment after the date there mentioned subsection (1) is to have effect as regards an assessment which was made and became conclusive before that date, then the limiting words might as well have been omitted altogether. Those words appear to me to mean that, while you are to apply Schedule E for the purpose of assessments made after May 1, 1922, and also for the purpose of assessments made before that date which had not then become final and conclusive, you are not to apply it to assessments which were made and became conclusive before that date ; and in the present case it is only if Schedule E is applied to the earlier assessment, which was made and became conclusive before May 1, 1922, that the earlier assessment is found to be insufficient. The words "and shall be deemed always to have had effect," upon which so much stress was laid in the Court of Appeal, appear to me to apply quite naturally to an assessment which though made before May 1 had not become final or conclusive on that date ; but I do not think that they can, without running counter to the limiting words which appear later in the section, be applied to an assessment which at that date had actually become final and conclusive.

The argument may be put in another (and alternative) way. Let it be assumed in favour of the Crown that for all the purposes of the additional assessment Schedule E must be applied, and that the appellant ought to be and ought always to have been assessed to tax in respect of the sum of £77 mentioned in that assessment ; even then you have only got half-way. You have still to consider whether on that footing there has been an undercharge in the earlier year, and in so doing you must apply to the assessment of that year the law which obtained when it was made ; and if in the present case that course is followed, it will be found that there was in fact no undercharge. The appellant has paid the full tax both in respect of the amount at which he should rightly have been assessed in December, 1921, and in respect of the additional sum since discovered by the surveyor ; and while I agree that effect must be given (so far as the context allows) to the retrospective words contained in section 18, subsection (6), of the Act of 1922, I cannot hold that the effect of those words is to make the appellant liable to pay more.

The result is that I find myself in agreement with the conclusion of Mr. Justice Rowlatt in this case, and I am of opinion that the appeal should be allowed and that the judgment of the Court of Appeal should be discharged and the order of Mr. Justice Rowlatt restored with costs here and below, and I move your Lordships accordingly.

Lord Atkinson.—My Lords : I regret very much that I find myself unable to concur in the judgment which has just been delivered by my noble friend on the Woolsack and I take a different view from him.

The appellant in this case was at all material times a second clerk in the employment of the London County Council. His duties were of a clerical character. His remuneration took the shape of a yearly salary with an added bonus. In the year 1921-22 his salary was £194 7s. 3d., the bonus £241 9s. 2d., making together £436 6s. 5d. On October 6, 1921, he was first assessed for income-tax for the financial year 1921-22 in respect of his office on the sum of £359. It is not disputed that this assessment was made under Schedule E ; neither is it disputed that, having regard to the decision in the case of Great Western Railway Company v. Bater (38 The Times L.R., 448 ; [1922] 2 A.C., 1), he was not liable to be assessed under that Schedule, inasmuch as the office he held was not of a public nature, and, therefore, that he was properly assessable under Schedule D on the average of the profits and gains received by him in respect of his office during the three years immediately antecedent to the year of assessment. It is not disputed that had this latter method been adopted he would have been assessed only on a sum of £259 14s. 5d., practically £100 less than the sum at which he had been actually assessed. On December 21, 1921, he received notice from the Income Tax Authorities that he had been assessed on the sum of £359, yet notwithstanding the aforesaid facts, he never objected to this assessment, never appealed against it or otherwise questioned it, but paid the amount of the income-tax found to be due by him on the assumption that the higher of the two possible assessments was the proper and valid one, and in paragraph 3 of his case it is stated that he does not now seek to disturb this assessment on £359.

The 99th section of the Income Tax Act of 1918 requires that the assessors shall within the time directed by the precept of the General Commissioners give a particular notice to every person chargeable within the limits wherein they act, requiring him within such time as shall be limited by the precept to prepare and deliver to the assessors all such lists, declarations and statements as are required by this Act to be delivered. The 100th section provides that every person chargeable under this Act, when required to do so by any general or particular notice given in pursuance of the Act, shall within the period limited by such notice prepare and deliver to the assessor a true and correct statement in writing, as required by the Act, signed by him, containing amongst other things the amount of the profits or gains arising to him from each and every source chargeable according to the respective schedules, estimated for the period, and according to the provisions and rules of the Act. By subsection 4, it is provided that every person upon whom such a particular notice has been served by an assessor requiring him to deliver a statement of any profits or gains or income in respect of which he is chargeable under Schedules D or E, shall deliver a statement in the form required by the notice whether or not he is so chargeable. A penalty can be inflicted for the omission to comply with this notice.

In the case stated it is set forth that the first assessment was made on the appellant on October 6, 1921, and that notice thereof was given to him on December 21, 1921. The first matter to be considered is the force and effect of an assessment.

In the oft-cited case of Allen v. Sharp (2 Ex., 352), Baron Parke at page 366 uses these words : "An assessment not appealed from stands precisely in the same situation as one confirmed after appeal." That statement has been quoted, apparently with approval, by Mr. Justice Avory in Rex v. Bloomsbury Income Tax Commissioners (31 The Times L.R., 565 ; [1915] 3 K.B., 768, at p. 790).

The subject of assessment, its methods and consequences, are dealt with fully in Part VI. of the Income Tax Act of 1918. I have already referred to the section which imposes upon a person in the receipt of an income the statutory duty of making a return of that income. The 107th and some of the following sections of this Statute prescribe the action to be taken if the taxpayer neglects to discharge this duty. The first-named of these sections enacts that "a person who neglects or refuses to deliver, within the time limited in any general or particular notice, or wilfully makes delay in delivering a true and correct list, declaration, or statement, which he is required under this Act to deliver shall—(a) if proceeded against before the general commissioners, forfeit a sum not exceeding twenty pounds and treble the tax which he ought to be charged under this Act, and such penalty shall be recovered in the same manner as any other penalty under this Act, and the increased tax shall be added to the assessment ; or (b) if proceeded against by action or information in any court forfeit a sum of fifty pounds." Then comes in subsection 2 the following important provision : "The commissioners shall also proceed to assess or cause to be assessed every such person who makes default as aforesaid." By section 112 it is enacted that "if the assessor does not receive a statement from a person liable to be charged to tax, he shall, to the best of his information and judgment—(a) make an assessment upon that person of the amount at which he ought to be charged under Schedules A, B, and E." Under subsection (b) he must "estimate the amount at which that person ought to be charged under Schedule D, and make a return to the commissioners of the name and address of that person and any other particulars which the commissioners may require." The following section (section 113) requires that every assessor shall deliver to the commissioners on or before the day appointed by them his certificates of assessments under Schedules A, B, and E, and all statements and lists which have been received by him before the appointed day. Subsequent provisions prescribe the use the commissioners may make of these documents. I have referred to these provisions and the machinery set up by them to show that the first assessment made against the appellant is a formal and valid thing ; that it cannot now be set aside or even qualified, although it was in fact based on a wrong schedule. Nor can the additional assessment be, in my view, dealt with as if its validity depended on the result as it were of an account to be taken between the appellant and the Income Tax Department, and the additional assessment be held invalid because the appellant was overcharged £100 on the first assessment.

Section 125 of the Act of 1918 deals with additional assessments. It provides that if the surveyor discovers that any properties or profits chargeable to tax have been omitted from the assessment, he may make an additional assessment. The appellant's case comes within this provision. He has not delivered any statement, and he was undercharged on the first assessment, even if it was rightly based on Schedule E. Under that Schedule E he ought to have been assessed on an income of £436 6s. 5d., instead of on an income of £359. The first assessment was not appealed against. The fact that some of the income of the taxpayer was omitted from it would not make it invalid. If it be taken as valid and binding as on its face it must, in my view, be taken, then the appellant was undercharged to the amount of £77.

Your Lordships were referred to several authorities laying down the principle upon which the question should be determined whether a statute acts retrospectively or not. Amongst those authorities Smith v. Callander ([1901] A.C., 297) and Lord Justice Lindley's judgment in Lauri v. Renad (8 The Times L.R., 536, 637 ; [1892] 3 Ch., 402) were included. The rule which according to those authorities is to be applied is thus stated in Maxwell on Statutes, page 382. "It is a fundamental rule of English law that no statute shall be construed so as to have a retrospective operation unless such a construction appears very clearly in the terms of the Act or arises by necessity and distinct implication." If, however, a clause in a Statute says in so many plain words that the Statute shall have retrospective operation, then it must not be construed so as to defeat those express words. Now in the present case it is not disputed that the first assessment was made on October 6, 1921, that notice of it was duly given to the appellant on December 21, 1921, that he did not appeal against or question it in any way and that it consequently became valid and binding. On September 13, 1922, after May 1, 1922, the additional assessment, the subject of this appeal, was made. The words of subsection 6 of section 18, of the Finance Act, 1922, enact as plainly as words can that subsections 1 and 3 of section 18 shall have retrospective operation. The words run thus :—

"The provisions of subsection 1 and subsection 3 of this section shall have effect and shall be deemed always to have had effect, for the purpose of any assessment to income-tax which is made or becomes final and conclusive after May 1, 1922." I do not know what more direct and conclusive language could be used to make those provisions of this Statute (to which the Royal Assent was given on July 20, 1922) retrospective in its operation for the purpose indicated. I confess I am utterly unable to construe those words so as to put the additional assessment outside their real application. I think that they clearly and directly apply to it and I am consequently of opinion that the appeal fails. If this construction of this Statute enables the income tax authorities to bring up State demands against a taxpayer under the form of additional assessments, that evil should be corrected by legislation, not by a faulty construction of a retrospective clause in an existing statute.

The other noble and learned LORDS concurred in the judgment of the Lord Chancellor.

GILBEY v. GILBEY.*

Divorce—Maintenance—Husband's large income—Principles governing award of maintenance to wife—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1907 (7 Edw. VII., c. 12), s. 1 (1) (2)—Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925 (15 and 16 Geo. V., c. 49), s. 190 (1) (2).

In fixing the amount of maintenance to be awarded to a wife on dissolution of marriage, the Court is not bound by any arithmetical rule to allot a definite proportion of the husband's income, or by the practice of the Ecclesiastical Courts in fixing alimony after divorce a mensa et thoro. Where the husband has an ample fortune over and above the needs of the matrimonial home, the maintenance to be awarded to the wife must be dependent on what is necessary to maintain her station in life.

Kettlewell v. Kettlewell (14 The Times L.R., 96 ; [1898] P., 138) followed.

The parties were married on January 26, 1884. On July 1, 1912, they entered into a deed of separation whereby the husband agreed to pay the wife during their joint lives the sum of £1,600 a year, and, should he predecease her, he agreed that his executors should pay her the sum of £800 a year for the remainder of her life. There was a provision that in the event of a reconciliation and a resumption of cohabitation, or of a dissolution of the marriage or a judicial separation, the annuity should cease. On October 20, 1925, the wife petitioned for divorce on the ground of her husband's cruelty and adultery, and after the verdict of a jury a decree nisi was granted to the wife on March 23, 1926. On April 9, 1926, the wife filed a petition for permanent maintenance, and on September 26 the decree nisi was made absolute.

The registrar in his report dated December 1, 1926, found that the husband's gross income was about £24,300 a year, derived mainly from a business concern. He reported in favour of the husband's being ordered to secure to the wife for her life the annual sum of £3,500 less tax, and that he be ordered to pay her during their joint lives or until further order the further annual sum of £500 less tax.

Section 190 of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, re-enacting section 1 (1) and (2) of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1907, provides :—

" (1) The Court may, if it thinks fit, on any decree for divorce or nullity of marriage, order that the husband shall, to the satisfaction of the Court, secure to the wife such gross sum of money or annual sum of money for any term, not exceeding her life, as having regard to her fortune, if any, to the ability of her husband and to the conduct of the parties, the Court may deem to be reasonable, and the Court may for that purpose order that it shall be referred to one of the conveyancing counsel of the Court to settle and approve a proper deed or instrument, to be executed by all the necessary parties, and may, if it thinks fit, suspend the pronouncing of the decree until the deed or instrument has been duly executed.

" (2) In any such case as aforesaid the Court may, if it thinks fit, by order, either in addition to or instead of an order under subsection (1) of this section, direct the husband to pay to the wife during the joint lives of the husband and wife such monthly or weekly sum for her maintenance and support as the Court may think reasonable :

" Provided that—. . . where the Court has made any such order as is mentioned in this subsection and the Court is satisfied that the means of the husband have increased, the Court may, if it thinks fit, increase the amount payable under the order. . . ."

Mr. R. F. BAYFORD, K.C., who appeared with Mr. T. BUCKNILL for the wife, moved to vary the registrar's report by increasing the annual sum to be secured to the wife during her life from £3,500 to £4,500, making the total maintenance £5,000 a year less tax. He submitted that the Court should not depart from the practice derived from that of the ecclesiastical courts of allowing one-third of the joint income (in this case the wife had no separate estate) up to £15,000 of such income. The amount of maintenance was not limited to £3,000 a year as suggested in Hulton v. Hulton (32 The Times L.R., 319 ; [1916] P., 57). It was suggested in Sykes v. Sykes (13 The Times L.R., 579 ; [1897] P., 306) and Kettlewell v. Kettlewell (14 The Times L.R., 96 ; [1898] P., 138) that £3,000 per annum would be an adequate jointure for the widow of a very wealthy man, and therefore an adequate allowance for such a man's wife by way of maintenance. But £5,000 a year now meant an actual income of £3,768 after deduction of tax, and as regards the remainder its purchasing value was much less than in the 'nineties. In fact £5,000 now was worth less than £3,000 then.

The Hon. VICTOR RUSSELL, appearing for the husband, submitted that the decreased purchasing power of money and the heavy increase in taxation affected the husband's income just as much as the wife's. The gross income of just over £24,000 was reduced by taxation to about £13,000 a year. By the separation deed of 1912 the wife accepted an income of £1,600 a year during their joint lives, which was a guide to the Court as to the wife's scale of maintenance and accustomed mode of life before dissolution of the marriage.

* Reported by WILLIAM LATEY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The PRESIDENT.—I have no information as to the husband's income in 1912.

Mr. RUSSELL said that the husband's income fluctuated according to the profits of a business in which he was interested, and submitted that the registrar's report be adopted.

The PRESIDENT delivered a written judgment in which he stated the facts reproduced above and said :—

Before the Registrar, the respondent claimed that the petitioner's maintenance should be determined by and with regard to the terms of a separation deed made in 1912, in the lifetime of the respondent's father, which secured to the petitioner an income of £1,600 during the joint lives and £800 for her life in case she should survive the respondent. The Registrar rightly took the view that this deed, made in view of an intended continuance of the marriage state, could not govern the decision of the Court after dissolution of the marriage, and the respondent's contention was not insisted on before me save to the extent to which the amount of the agreed income bears upon the question of the petitioner's accustomed mode of life and usual scale of maintenance before the petition for divorce.

On the petitioner's behalf, it was contended before me that after a divorce, as after judicial separation, regard must be had to a rule derived from the practice of the Ecclesiastical Courts so that in a normal case a wife who has obtained dissolution of the marriage shall be secured one-third of the husband's income. I was invited to proceed on the footing of a rule of settled application in cases where the total income in question is below, say, £1,500 per annum and upon consideration of cases like Sykes v. Sykes (13 The Times L.R., 579 ; [1897] P., 306), Kettlewell v. Kettlewell (14 The Times L.R., 96 ; [1898] P., 138), and Hulton v. Hulton (32 The Times L.R., 319 ; [1916] P., 57), to exercise a discretion as to the increased annuity to be awarded in respect of a larger fortune, and to say that the increased burden of taxation in this country and the decreased value of money since these several cases were decided justify and require reconsideration of the limits within which the suggested rule of practice ought to to be regarded as obligatory.

On the respondent's behalf it was submitted that regard is had in all such cases to the sources of the husband's income and to the question whether they are of a permanent or of a precarious character ; and reliance was placed, as before mentioned, on the separation deed as evidence of an agreed scale of living.

It is always necessary to bear in mind in cases like the present, that the practice as to alimony which was observed in the Ecclesiastical Courts does not govern, as of course, the amount of maintenance after dissolution of marriage. By the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, and sections 16, 17, and 22 of that Act in particular, the practice in the Ecclesiastical Courts must be duly regarded in awarding alimony upon judicial separation and in some other cases, subject always to the judicial discretion of the Court. As to any permanent provision after dissolution of marriage, the rule applicable is that contained in the Statutes which confer and control the power of the Court to award such maintenance, formerly the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, section 32, the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1866, section 1, and the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1907, section 1, subsection 1, now re-enacted in the Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, section 190. These provisions deal with maintenance and support. The sidenote to section 32 of the Act of 1857 was "alimony." What is to be secured is such gross or annual sum as the Court shall deem reasonable having regard to the fortune, if any, of the wife, the means of the husband and the conduct of the parties, or a monthly or a weekly sum for maintenance and support. It is no doubt true that the considerations of good sense and fairness which apply in fixing alimony must have due weight in determining the proper award for maintenance, if such an award is required. The considerations urged on behalf of the petitioner can properly be taken into account in determining the reasonable sum which is to be fixed. But the assumption of a fixed arithmetical rule and an indispensable process of applying that rule simpliciter, or in a form dependent for its modifications upon other arithmetical considerations, is erroneous, in that it disregards the nature of the duty imposed upon the Court by the statutes. In the discharge of this duty the Court is not bound by the practice of the Ecclesiastical Courts.

A third of the husband's means might well be what is required for the wife's maintenance, when those means consist of an income which has sufficed for and has been expended on the requirements of the matrimonial home. But when, beyond everything called for by such requirements in the most comprehensive view of them, he possesses an ample fortune of which he can dispose for external purposes, the amount of his income affords no definite guidance as to what sum is required for his personal, domestic, and social expenses, and what sum will supply to his sometime wife the necessaries, comforts, and advantages incidental to her station in life. It is useful, too, to bear in mind, in distinguishing the award of permanent maintenance from the award of alimony in the Ecclesiastical Courts, that alimony after divorce a mensa et thoro was limited to the joint lives of the parties, and that under the express terms of the statutes permanent maintenance may be secured for the life of the petitioner, as it will be in this case. The annuity or periodical payment for life is obviously the better and more advantageous provision.

The judgment of Lord St. Helier in Kettlewell v. Kettlewell (supra) and the award of maintenance made in Hulton v. Hulton (supra) illustrate the true view as to maintenance. Each case deals with a petitioner where the divorced respondent was a man of large fortune, and in each what was deemed reasonable was so deemed, not with regard to a notional rule granting to the petitioner a life interest in a defined proportion of her husband's fortune, but on the broader grounds indicated in the statute. In Kettlewell v. Kettlewell (supra) the maintenance provided for was at the rate of £3,000 a year (including £1,400 a year under the marriage settlement) against an income of £19,000. In Hulton v. Hulton (supra) it was £5,000 less tax, reducible to £3,500 on re-marriage, against an income estimated by the petitioner at £70,000 and admitted to be £29,000. A test was applied in Kettlewell v. Kettlewell (supra) which had been suggested in the Court of Appeal in Sykes v. Sykes (supra), and has often been found useful, and is useful here : would the proposed maintenance have been an adequate portion if the petitioner had become the widow of the respondent ? I am satisfied that the submission of the registrar has been arrived at with proper regard to the law applicable and to the facts of this case, and, whether I regard it in the light of the decisions to which I have referred, or independently in order to form my own opinion of what is reasonable, I am satisfied of the adequacy of the maintenance proposed. I accordingly confirm this report.

Prob., Divorce, and Adm. Div. (Lord Merrivale, P., and Hill, J.) } 1927. Feb. 8.

WALLER v. WALLER.*

Husband and wife—Jurisdiction of justices—Separation order — Husband's application for rescission—Time limit for proceeding—Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848 (11 and 12 Vict., c. 43), ss. 1, 11—Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895 (58 and 59 Vict., c. 39), ss. 7, 8.

An application by a husband under the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, s. 7, for the discharge of an order for maintenance on the ground of adultery committed by his wife since the date of the order is a "complaint" within s. 1 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848, upon which the justices "shall have authority by law to make any order for the payment of money or otherwise." Such an application is therefore subject to the time limit of six months provided in s. 11 of the Act of 1848. The justices have no jurisdiction to discharge an order under the latter part of s. 7 of the Act of 1895 unless complaint of an act of adultery by the wife subsequent to the order is brought within six months of the time when the adultery was committed.

On March 4, 1912, Mrs. Vannagasta Lilian Waller, having made a complaint that her husband, Charles Waller, had deserted her, was granted a separation order by the Windsor justices directing that she should no longer have to cohabit with her husband, and that he should pay her £1 a week for maintenance. On August 27, 1926, on the husband's complaint, a summons was issued against the wife to show cause why the order should not be rescinded, on the ground that since the order was made, i.e., in 1915, she had committed adultery. After hearing the evidence the justices on November 4, 1926, discharged the separation order. The wife appealed.

The Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, section 7, provides:—

"A court of summary jurisdiction, acting within the . . . district, in which any order under this Act or the Acts mentioned in the schedule hereto, or either of them, has been made, may, on the application of the married woman or of her husband, and upon cause being shown upon fresh evidence to the satisfaction of the court at any time, alter, vary, or discharge any such order, and may upon any such application from time to time increase or diminish the amount of any weekly payment ordered to be made, so that the same do not in any case exceed the weekly sum of two pounds.

If any married woman upon whose application an order shall have been made under this Act, or the Acts mentioned in the schedule hereto, or either of them . . . shall commit an act of adultery, such order shall upon proof thereof be discharged."

Section 8 of the same Act provides:—

"All applications under this Act shall be made in accordance with the Summary Jurisdiction Acts. . . ."

The Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848, section 1, empowers justices to issue summonses (inter alia) "in all cases where a complaint shall be made . . . upon which . . . they have . . . authority by law to make any order for the payment of money or otherwise."

Section 11 of this Act provides:—

"In all cases where no time is already or shall hereafter be specially limited for making any such complaint . . . such complaint shall be made . . . within six calendar months from the time when the matter of such complaint . . . arose."

Mr. G. O. Slade, for the appellant wife, founded his appeal inter alia on the grounds: (1) That the justices were wrong in law in that more than six months had elapsed between the date of the second complaint and the date of the act of adultery alleged against the wife, and that there was therefore no jurisdiction to discharge the separation order; (2) That the justices were wrong in law in discharging retrospectively the order as from September 30, 1915, the date upon which the justices had found as a fact that adultery had been committed by the wife; (3) That the justices' finding was against the weight of evidence, and that they improperly admitted in evidence an undated letter purporting to be a confession by the wife of an act of adultery in 1911, prior to the date of the separation order.

Counsel argued that under the sections of the 1895 and 1848 Acts cited above the six months' time limit applied in this case, and that the words "at any time" in section 7 of the former Act referred only to applications to alter, vary, or discharge an order upon fresh evidence. These words were omitted from the second part of the section dealing with the discharge of an order by reason of the wife's adultery. He referred to Ellis v. Ellis (12 The Times L.R., 514; [1896] P., 251) and Outerbridge v. Outerbridge (43 The Times L.R., 33) as to the retrospective effect of the order of November, 1926.

The President:—In Ellis v. Ellis (supra) there was a charge of neglect.

Mr. J. W. Eddy, for the respondent, submitted that the words "at any time" governed the whole of section 7 of the 1895 Act. He cited Weightman v. Weightman (22 The Times L.R., 362). In that case more than six months after the separation order had been made the husband discovered that the wife had committed adultery before the order was made. This was held by the President, Sir Gorell Barnes, and Mr. Justice Bargrave Deane to be fresh evidence justifying the discharge of the order. The then President said that the six months' limit did not apply in that case at all.

Mr. Slade replied that the application in Weightman v. Weightman (supra) was held to be in effect one for a new trial. He added that the husband in the present case was taking proceedings for divorce.

Lord Merrivale.—This case raises some important points. The state of facts out of which the proceedings between the husband and wife arose is that many years ago—namely, in 1912—an order had been made on the wife's complaint that she be no longer bound to cohabit, that the custody of the three children of the marriage, who were named, be committed to her while under the age of 16, and that the husband should pay her a weekly sum of £1 for her maintenance. The husband seems not to have been regular in his compliance with that order, but, except that he was once committed to prison, it is said in 1915, because of long arrears under the order, no material incident between 1915 and 1926 has been brought to the notice of the Court. In 1926 the husband made a complaint before the justices that since the date of that order the wife had committed an act of adultery, and a summons was issued to the wife to appear before the justices to show cause why the order of 1912 should not be revoked. The parties duly appeared, they had legal assistance, and the husband claimed to prove, and was held by the justices to have proved, a series of facts which show that the wife, in 1911, that is, before the order of 1912, and in 1915, had committed adultery with one Rowe.

The justices had a considerable body of evidence before them, and they had a document which, upon serious grounds, they believed to be a written admission by the wife that in 1911 she had been guilty of an act of adultery with the man Rowe, and they had other evidence that in 1915 she had been guilty in like manner. They had a substantial case before them. The complaint and the summons depended upon an act of adultery since the date of the order, so that the jurisdiction of the justices under the summons rested upon an alleged act of adultery in 1915. The justices, after a careful hearing, as I think, of all that could be said upon both sides, proceeded to discharge the order as from the date of the alleged adultery of 1915, and they discharged it by an order with retrospective effect so as to annul the liabilities of the husband which had arisen under the order during the period between 1915 and the date of the hearing—liabilities which are said to amount between those two dates to a very large sum.

The wife appeals on the ground that the justices could only discharge the order as from the date of the order of discharge. The contrary proposition has not really been argued, and it has not been argued, at any rate, in the sense in which the other questions in the case have been argued, but I can have no doubt that the power of the justices was to make an order which should take effect as from its date.

The wife therefore succeeds, in my judgment, as to that ground of appeal with regard to the point of time at which the justices' order should take effect.

Next after that point it is submitted that the justices improperly admitted evidence. It is said that they were wrong in receiving what was alleged to be a written confession by the wife of an act of adultery which was not the act of adultery relied upon in the charge. If the justices had had a written confession of a previous act of adultery and no proof of any subsequent misconduct, that would have been a very cogent complaint, but the justices seem to me to have had evidence of adultery before and after the date at which the order had been made, and, having regard to the practice of this Court, and I think to the common sense of the matter, I do not see my way to hold as a matter of law that an adulterous relationship in 1911 might not be evidence to support a charge of adultery in 1915, or that admitted adultery of 1911 might not be admissible to explain the terms in which, as was alleged, an admission was made of adultery said to have been committed in 1915.

So, though I regard with apprehension an admission of evidence which is not strictly relevant to the charge which the justices have to consider, I cannot say that the justices were wrong in point of law in receiving proof of a previous relationship of the parties. A ground upon which they might easily have gone wrong would have been the mode in which they applied that proof. I think that the second ground of complaint fails.

There is another ground of appeal based upon the terms of a section in the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, which, subject to modification in the recent Statute of 1925, governs the jurisdiction of the justices upon complaints of this kind. Section 7 of the 1895 Act makes two classes of provisions. It provides that justices, after an order has been made within their jurisdiction under the Statute, can hear either husband or the wife to show cause upon fresh evidence why the justices should not alter, vary, or discharge any such order. With regard to that provision, it is comprehensive enough to be employed at any time. No doubt its primary purpose is to enable justices upon fresh evidence to retry an issue, but its effect is not exhausted by retrial of an issue. Its effect extends, in the specified case of change in the means of the parties, to the consideration and variation of an order upon matters which have occurred since the making of the order. I am not professing to delimit the operative effect of the respective parts of the provisions in the first part of section 7, but I need say only this, that that part of the section deals with matters which may be dealt with at any time.

Within that part of the section, upon a complaint properly made, it was open to the justices to receive proof that their order of 1912 had been an unjust order, because the wife was an adulterous wife, and if the summons which was before the justices when they made the order now appealed from had proceeded in respect of the adultery of 1911, it may well be that the justices would have felt it their duty to deal with the order of 1912. No summons was before them which provided for a rehearing of the case on which the order had been made. What was before them was a charge of subsequent adultery.

Now the question is, whether the comprehensive provision in the first part of the section, which enables the justices at any time to discharge an order upon new evidence, relates to this case, in which evidence of adultery subsequent to the order was received and acted upon, although it was evidence of an act of adultery alleged to have taken place eleven years before the hearing before the justices.

On behalf of the appellant it has been said that the second part of the section relates specifically to this matter, and that the jurisdiction of the justices, in respect of acts of adultery after the order, is to discharge the order under the second part of the section whereby if any married woman upon whose application an order shall have been made shall commit an act of adultery "such order shall upon proof thereof be discharged."

There is no doubt of the peremptory authority of the justices to discharge an order upon proof of an act of adultery committed after the making of the order. It may have been the intention of the Legislature that that should be the extent of the authority of the justices with regard to that class of misconduct. What has happened here is that, the order being 14 years old, an act of adultery which was eleven years old has been alleged with no particulars of it upon a summons issued in August, 1926. The wife appeals against the order of the justices, so far as this ground is concerned, upon the authority of section 11 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848, which by reference is incorporated in the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act of 1895.

In order to see the effect of the Summary Jurisdiction Act of 1848 upon the Act of 1895, it is necessary to have a clear regard to its terms. The first section provides that in all cases where an information shall be laid "that any person has committed or is suspected to have committed any offence or act within the jurisdiction of such justice or justices for which he is liable by law, upon a summary conviction for the same before a justice or justices of the peace, to be imprisoned or fined," that act of his may be the subject of a summons which will direct him to appear before the justices. This case is not within that provision. There is no information here for any offence within the jurisdiction of the justices for which the defendant on the summons, the wife, was liable to be imprisoned or fined, or otherwise punished within the meaning of the distinction in the Act of 1848.

But there is another power besides that of summoning persons guilty or suspected of being guilty of offences. That power relates to cases "where a complaint shall be made to any such justice or justices upon which he or they have or shall have authority by law to make any order for the payment of money or otherwise." There is a like provision that in every such case it shall be lawful for the justices to issue a summons requiring the appearance of the accused party before them. That is the provision of section 1 of the Act of 1848, and section 11 limits the time for proceeding to within six calendar months from the time when the matter arose.

The first question here is whether the summons to the wife in this case was issued upon a complaint within the meaning of section 1 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act of 1848. The complaint which is referred to there is a complaint in a case where the justices have authority by law to make an order for the payment of money, or otherwise, and those who are familiar with summary jurisdiction know that increasingly, as time has gone on, matters within the jurisdiction of the justices where they have authority to make an order, which are not matters punishable by fine or imprisonment but are matters upon which they have jurisdiction, are brought before the justices by summons on a complaint. This is not a complaint on which the justices had authority to make an order for the payment of money. The ordinary complaint under the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, would have been such a complaint—the complaint which invokes in the first instance the jurisdiction of the justices.

The real question on this part of the case is whether the matter alleged is a matter of complaint in respect of which the justices have authority to make an order otherwise than for payment of money. In my judgment the order which they made discharging the order of 1912 is included within the terms of section 1 of the Act of 1848. It is not an order for the payment of money, but it is an order otherwise than for the payment of money. It is an order to discharge an order for the payment of money. The complaint was one on which the justices had jurisdiction to find the accused person, so far as that jurisdiction extends, guilty of adultery. In my judgment, therefore, when the justices dealt last year with a complaint that the wife, the now appellant, had been guilty of adultery in 1915, and proceeded thereupon to make an order for discharge of a previous order, that was a proceeding which was outside the jurisdiction of the justices by reason that within the meaning of section 11 the matter of such complaint arose at the time when the alleged act of adultery was committed—namely, in 1915.

It may well be said—at least the observation will occur—does not such a view place a husband who has a guilty wife in a difficulty and in a prima facie unjust position? There was a time when that observation could have been made more effectively than it can now, but if a husband, who is under an order for the payment of money for the maintenance of his wife, takes so little notice of her doings that he is not aware for 12 years whether she is living chastely or not, it may be thought that he prefers to pay rather than take care. But there is this further to be said, that at this time by means of the provisions for poor persons litigation, especially in this Division, there is abundant opportunity for a man whose wife has been guilty of adultery, and has not put himself in an impossible position as a complainant, to proceed to obtain a divorce.

When the justices made an order finding the now appellant, the wife, guilty of adultery in 1915 upon a complaint made in August of last year, they were outside their jurisdiction. My view is that the justices have power to discharge orders for payment of money to a wife if complaint of an act of adultery of the wife is brought within six months of the time when it has been committed. For those reasons, in my opinion, this appeal must succeed in this way, that the order must be discharged, but that the proceeding must be remitted to the justices in order that they may do what in their judgment justice requires either by hearing the parties upon a new complaint, or in any other mode within their jurisdiction. But upon the new complaint it must be borne in mind that, if there are reasons why the act of adultery alleged to have occurred in 1911 is not available to the complainant, the justices will hear those reasons. The appeal succeeds, and the case ought to be remitted to the justices.

Mr. Justice Hill.—I agree. I think the justices have proceeded upon the view that the case came within the last sentence of section 7 of the 1895 Act. They set aside an order on proof of adultery, however long ago that adultery took place. Application to vary or discharge on fresh evidence may be made at any time, but otherwise it seems to me that section 11 of the 1848 Act applies. In this case six months from the adultery which is the cause of complaint had elapsed, and that being so I agree that the justices were not under any compulsion under the second sentence of section 7 to set this order aside, and that it must go back to them to consider the circumstances on a rehearing and see whether they think it is a case in which they ought to set aside the order upon the evidence that will be then tendered to them.

But it is satisfactory to know that there is always open to the husband a remedy which is a much more satisfactory remedy for him to pursue, and one which he indicated he had some intention of pursuing—namely, to petition for a divorce in this Court, and no injustice and no hardship are being inflicted upon him by the course we have pursued.

The PRESIDENT.—Then the order is set aside in the mode I have indicated.

Court of Appeal. (Scrutton and Atkin, L.JJ.) } 1927. Feb. 22.

WHITE v. SMITH.*

County Court—Practice—Action claiming relief under Moneylenders Acts—Commenced in High Court—Claim limited to £100—Transfer to County Court—"Contract"—Moneylenders Act, 1900 (63 and 64 Vict., c. 51), s. 1—County Courts Act, 1888 (51 and 52 Vict., c. 43), s. 65—County Courts Act, 1919 (9 and 10 Geo. V., c. 73), s. 1.

By s. 65 of the County Courts Act, 1888, as amended by s. 1 of the County Courts Act, 1919: "In any action commenced in the High Court, where—(1) the plaintiff's claim is founded either on contract or on tort and the amount claimed or remaining in dispute . . . does not exceed £100, whether the action could or could not have been commenced in a County Court, . . . either party may . . . apply to the Court or a Judge for an order that the claim . . . shall be transferred" to the County Court.

Where a borrower from a moneylender issues a writ in the High Court, claiming relief under the Moneylenders Acts, the claim being limited to £100, such a claim is one founded on contract within the meaning of s. 1 of the County Courts Act, 1919, and can be transferred to the County Court for trial under that section.

This was an appeal from an order of Mr. Justice Swift at Chambers, affirming an order of a District Registrar, ordering an action commenced in the High Court to be transferred to the County Court for trial.

The plaintiff, a borrower from a moneylender, commenced an action by a writ claiming under the Moneylenders Act, 1900, the reopening of a moneylending transaction between the plaintiff and the defendant. He also claimed a declaration that the interest charged therein was excessive, and that the transaction was harsh and unconscionable, accounts and inquiries, payment of the amount found due to the plaintiff, and other and necessary relief under the Moneylenders Acts.

The plaintiff applied by summons to have the action transferred to the County Court for trial, his claim being limited to £100.

The District Registrar ordered that if the plaintiff should pay the defendant his (the defendant's) costs to be agreed or taxed, the action should be transferred to the County Court, and his order was affirmed by Mr. Justice Swift at Chambers.

The defendant appealed.

Mr. H. C. Dickens appeared for the appellant; and Mr. R. F. Levy for the respondent.

* Reported by T. W. MORGAN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

LORD JUSTICE SCRUTTON, in giving judgment, said that the question to be decided arose in the following way:—A borrower from a moneylender desired to exercise the right given to him by the Moneylenders Act, 1900, and to have the transaction reopened, and to have it determined whether the transaction was harsh and unconscionable, and whether the interest charged was excessive, and to have an account and inquiries, and if it should be found that he had overpaid interest to have the amount found to have been overpaid repaid to him.

The borrower had applied to have the action remitted to the County Court for trial, and had restricted the amount of his claim to £100, in order to have the action tried in the County Court. The section dealing with the transfer of actions commenced in the High Court to the County Court was section 1 of the County Courts Act, 1919, which contained the words "action . . . founded . . . on contract." The question depended on whether the plaintiff's action was founded on contract.

There had been some discussion on the meaning of the words "founded on contract" (in a different section), in Bryant and Another v. Herbert (3 C.P.D., 389), a case that went to the Court of Appeal. In that case there was a difference of opinion between Lord Justice Bramwell and Lord Justice Brett with regard to the meaning of the words "in any action founded on contract" and "in any action founded on tort." Lord Justice Bramwell took the view that the words in question were not words of art, even as much as ex contractu or ex delicto would be. He said that they were plain English words and were to have the meaning which ordinary Englishmen would give them. But Lord Justice Brett did not agree with that view. He thought that they were technical terms having reference to the form of the action.

In Turner v. Stallibrass and Others ([1898] 1 Q.B., 56) the question was whether an action founded on an injury to a horse was an action founded on contract or on tort. It was said, on the one hand, that it was an action founded on tort, because the plaintiff, on proof that he delivered the horse to the defendants to be taken care of and that the horse was injured through the negligence of the defendants, showed a good cause of action for a tort, and he was not obliged to rely on any contract to maintain his action. It was said, on the other hand, that it was an action founded on contract—namely, the contract to keep the horse safely, and that without the contract of agistment no cause of action would have arisen and the plaintiff could not have launched his case. The Court of Appeal took the view that the action was founded on tort within the meaning of section 116 of the County Courts Act, 1888. Lord Justice Collins said, in giving judgment in that case, that the result of the cases appeared to be that, if the plaintiff could maintain his action by showing the breach of a duty arising at common law, he was not obliged to rely on a contract within the meaning of the rule; but if his cause of action was that the defendant ought to have done something, or taken some precaution, which would not be embraced by the common law liability arising out of the relation of bailor and bailee, then he was obliged to rely on a contract within the meaning of the rule.

Applying those observations to the present case, the question was: What was it that the plaintiff must prove in order to maintain his action? What he was seeking to do was to reopen a moneylending transaction. He could not get on at all unless he proved a contract. Therefore, in his (Lord Justice Scrutton's) opinion, the present action was an action

"founded on contract" within the meaning of section 1 of the County Courts Act, 1888, and could therefore be remitted to the County Court for trial.

LORD JUSTICE ATKIN agreed.

IN RE MADAME TUSSAUD AND SONS, LIMITED.*

Companies — Voluntary liquidation — Surplus assets—Rights of preference and ordinary shareholders.

This was a summons taken out by the voluntary liquidator to ascertain how the surplus assets were to be divided as between the Ordinary and the Preference shareholders in Madame Tussaud and Sons, Limited.

Sir T. Hughes, K.C., and Mr. Rawlence appeared for the liquidator; Mr. Jenkins, K.C., and Mr. Coumbe for the Preference shareholders; and Mr. Vaisey, K.C., and Mr. Bonner for the Ordinary shareholders.

SIR T. HUGHES said that the company had carried on business very successfully until 1925, when there was a fire. It was then determined to sell the land and what was salved out of the buildings and stock. The company was formed in 1889 with a nominal capital of £200,000, of which £75,000 was issued as Ordinary shares. In 1902 some 25,000 £1 Five per Cent. Preference shares were issued. About £71,000 was recovered from the insurance companies for loss of buildings, £81,000 for the contents, and £17,000 for profits. The surplus assets amounted to about £60,000.

MR. JENKINS said that unless one could find in the articles or documents something which defined the rights as between different classes of shareholders one was not at liberty to dissect the assets, which belonged to all the contributories. He referred to In re Bridgewater Navigation Company (7 The Times L.R., 360; [1891] 2 Ch., 317), Bishop v. Smyrna and Cassaba Railway Company (11 The Times L.R., 393; [1895] 2 Ch., 265), and Inland Revenue Commissioners v. Burrell (40 The Times L.R., 562; [1924] 2 K.B., 52). There was in the documents nothing which affected that proposition.

MR. VAISEY contended on the other hand that the fund, so far as it consisted of moneys which might have been distributed as profits, was distributable between the Ordinary shareholders only.

MR. JUSTICE EVE, in giving judgment, stated the facts, and said that prima facie the Preference shareholders were entitled to be placed in the same position as the Ordinary shareholders. It was said that the sum really represented profits. The question turned on the decision of the Bridgewater case (7 The Times L.R., 360; [1891] 2 Ch., 317). Could the Ordinary shareholders bring themselves within it? Having regard to the form of the articles he did not think that they could. Therefore the surplus assets were distributable among all the members of the company whether Preference or Ordinary shareholders in proportion to the amount of their shares.

IN RE LABRADOR BOUNDARY.*

Canada — Newfoundland—Labrador boundary.

According to the true construction of the relevant Statutes, Orders in Council, and Proclamations, the boundary between Canada and Newfoundland in the Labrador Peninsula is a line drawn due north from the eastern boundary of the bay or harbour of Ance Sablon as far as the 52nd degree of north latitude, and from thence westward along that parallel until it reaches the Romaine river, and then northward along the left or east bank of that river and its head waters to their source and from thence due north to the crest of the watershed or height of land there, and from thence westward and northward along the crest of the watershed of the rivers flowing into the Atlantic Ocean until it reaches Cape Chidley.

The accompanying map shows the boundary.

Their Lordships delivered their considered report in favour of the Colony of Newfoundland on the Special Reference to consider the question: What is the location and definition of the boundary as between Canada and Newfoundland under the Statutes, Orders in Council, and Proclamations?

Sir John Simon, K.C., Mr. Barrington-Ward, K.C., the Hon. W. J. Higgins, K.C. (Attorney-General for Newfoundland), Mr. W. T. Monckton, and Mr. C. H. Pearson appeared for the Colony of Newfoundland; Mr. H. P. Macmillan, K.C. (of the Scottish Bar), Mr. Geoffrion, K.C. (of the Canadian Bar), Mr. Maurice Alexander, K.C. (of the Canadian Bar), Mr. H. Stuart Moore, and Mr. C. P. Plaxton (of the Canadian Bar) for the Dominion of Canada.

* Reported by SIR W. J. SOULSBY, Barrister-at-Law.

The arguments, lasting 14 days, were heard in October and November last.

The LORD CHANCELLOR, in delivering their Lordships' report, said :—

The Government of the Dominion of Canada and the Government of the Colony of Newfoundland have petitioned his Majesty to refer to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council the following question :—

"What is the location and definition of the boundary as between Canada and Newfoundland in the Labrador Peninsula under the Statutes, Orders in Council and Proclamations ? "

That question has been referred to this Board under the Statute 3 and 4 Will. IV., c. 41, section 4, for its consideration and advice. The Board has accordingly heard evidence and arguments upon the matter, and has now arrived at a conclusion.

The Orders in Council and Proclamation upon which the decision must mainly depend were made in the year 1763, and it may seem strange that a question which affects (as it now appears) the jurisdiction over more than 100,000 square miles of territory has remained so long undecided. But an explanation is to be found in the fact that the region in dispute consists mainly of dense forests and bleak and inhospitable table-lands, of which the greater part is uninhabited (except by a few Indian families) and was until recently unexplored, being visited only occasionally by a few trappers in search of furs. The country has accordingly been regarded as having little or no value, and it is only in recent years, when the growing demand for paper has attracted attention to the vast quantity of timber suitable for pulping, that a serious controversy as to its ownership has arisen. The question of boundary was first raised in or about the year 1888, and was the subject of discussion at the Halifax Conference of 1892 ; but no solution was then reached, and it was not until the year 1903 that the Government of Canada, having been informed that the Government of Newfoundland had issued a licence for cutting timber in the neighbourhood of the Hamilton River, raised the question in a serious form. Since that time the matter has been the subject of close and skilled investigation, and it now comes before this Board for decision. The issue so raised is, as Lord Hardwicke said in another connexion, of a nature "worthy the judicature of a Roman Senate" (Penn v. Lord Baltimore, 1 Ves. Sen., 444) ; but the duty of the Board is not to consider where the boundary in question might wisely and conveniently be drawn, but only to determine where, under the documents of title which have been brought to their notice, that boundary is actually to be found.

The capture of Quebec in the year 1759 was followed by other British successes ; and by the Treaty of Paris, signed on February 10, 1763, the Most Christian King ceded to his Britannic Majesty in full right "Canada with all its dependencies as well as the island of Cape Breton and all the other islands and coasts (côtes) in the gulf and river of St. Lawrence and in general everything that depends on the said countries, lands, islands and coasts"—a description which included the whole of the great peninsula of Labrador, except such parts of it as had been already granted to the Hudson's Bay Company by their charter of 1670 and confirmed to them under the Treaty of Utrecht.
